BANDEAU FOR YOUNG LADY.

For pattern see Suppl., No. VIII, Figs. 19 and 20.

Oak Leaf Bandeau.

This bandeau is made of brown ribbon, trimmed with oak leaves of brown silk and gold cord, and bronze acorns. To make it, take a straight foundation, about thirteen inches long and an inch wide, cover it with brown silk, and set on the ends two long brown ribbons, to be tied under the chignon. Trim the bandeau in front with leaves and acorns, as shown in the illustration. The accompanying illustration shows a leaf of full size; this is made of double stiff lace, covered with brown silk, wired round the edge, and finished with fine gold cord.

See illustration, page 277.

MATERIAL: 1 oz. white twisted wool, black zephyr wool. This mitten is worked of white twisted wool, entirely in slip stitch. It is composed of the hand and the cuff; the latter is ornamented by a narrow border of wool stitched in. Begin the mitten at the under edge of the hand; cast on 40 stitches and join; after which crochet 10 rounds of slip stitch, always inserting the needle in the front part of the stitch of the last round. The work has something the of the cuff. Crochet the cuff to the hand, and draw a narrow elastic through the upper part of the cuff, in order to fasten it more tightly. Lastly, work the border. This consists of single threads of the black worsted, half an inch long, which are fastened at the end by a short stitch.

Lady's Morning Slipper.

MATERIALS: Strips of colored flannel, white flannel, black silk, narrow black and white woolen braid, a narrow strip of black and white fur, wadding.
This slipper is warm and easily made of cheap materials. The upper and sole are both made of braided strips of flannel sewed together. For the upper, take three strips of flannel $\frac{1}{2}$ inch in width; then lay them together at half this width and braid firmly. Next put them together according to the pattern (Fig. 41), so that they shall be smooth, and overcast them together on the wrong side. The braids for the sole are double this width, and are arranged around instead of parallel, according to Fig. 42. Then place on the sole one thickness of wadding; line with white flannel, and lay a corded edge of white flannel around the edge. Sew the sole through the lining in several places; then join the sole and upper from the wrong side; turn the slipper, and trim the outer edge of the upper with a narrow binding of black taffeta. Lastly, trim this with the two rows of fur, and cover the edge with narrow black and white woolen braid.

Toilette Box, with Cushion.

This pretty box is a tasteful addition to a dressing-table. The foundation consists of a round pasteboard box and cover, about eight inches in diameter and four inches high. Cover this with pink silk, with a layer of wadding between on the outside and the bottom of the inside, laying the silk plain on the outside and pleated within; then trim the outside of the box, in the manner shown in the illustration, with puffings of muslin, together with tatting rosettes, edging, and insertion, the illustrations and descriptions of which are given herewith. Guipure lace can be substituted if preferred. The cover is edged with a narrow fluting of pink ribbon. Bows of pink ribbon complete the trimming.

See illustration, page 277.

This insertion is worked in fine crochet cotton, and is composed of a row of rings, every two of which are joined; and the whole is bordered by 2 rows of chain stitches.

Work as follows: * 2 double stitches (ds.); 4 picots (p.); separated each by 1 ds.; 1 ds.; 1 long p.; 10 ds. separated each by a picot; 1 long p.; 4 times alternating 1 ds.; 1 p.; after which 2 ds.; join this row in a ring; work close on this a second similar ring, and tie the thread to the end of that remaining at the beginning of the last ring. Repeat from *; but in the first ring of each two following, instead of forming a middle picot, fasten to the middle picot of the last ring. When this has reached the desired length, border it on both sides by means of a chain stitch row; in this alternating 5 chain stitches with 1 single crochet in each long picot.

Tatting Edging for Toilette Box.

See illustration, page 277.

This edging is worked with two shuttles and two threads, of which one serves as a foundation thread. Tie the two threads together; * make with one thread a ring, as follows: 4 double stitches (ds.); 1 short picot; 4 ds.; 1 long picot; 4 ds.; 1 short picot; 4 ds. Next turn the ring, and work 3 ds. over the foundation thread; then, with the working thread alone, a ring of 4 ds.; 1 picot; 4 ds.; and again 3 ds. over the foundation thread. After this turn the work, so that the first ring shall again be on the right side; and repeat from *, not forgetting to take up the last picot of the last ring, instead of forming the first picot of the following ring. The upper edge is formed by alternately joining a long picot of the large rings, and working between 5 ds. over the foundation thread.

Cloth Rug.

See illustration, page 277.

This rug is made of very cheap materials; namely, bits of cloth, which are cut in the form of leaves and laid so as to overlap each other. Each leaf is button-hole-stitched round the edge with red worsted, and a star is embroidered in the middle with the same in point russe, after which the leaf is sewed on the lining, which is of gray linen. The original is a yard and a quarter long and a yard wide. The ground-work is of black cloth, and the star in the middle is of brown and black cloth. The points of the star are of different shades of brown cloth. The rug is bordered all round with a strip of Angora cloth, two inches wide. Fig. 43 gives the pattern of the leaf used.

PAULINE PRY.

I.

WALK right in, Mrs. Gayhart, out of the rain. Sit down here by my air-tight stove, and make yourself comfortable. You are a stranger in Darymple, but I happen to know you by name. I am Miss Pauline Pry. Dare say you have heard of me since you came to the village. They say I am distantly related to the celebrated Paul Pry. Well, well, people will have their jokes, but I tell them I don't consider myself responsible for any thing my cousin Paul ever did. I don't inherit his peevish ways, or his obtrusive umbrella—wish I had an umbrella for your sake, Mrs. Gayhart. Never mind, I've got you here, and I'm in a social mood and mean to make you talk.

Jump down from my lap, pussy, I want to look out of the window.

Dear, dear! if there isn't Luise De Bruler, without any over-shoes on! It's of no use to beckon to her, she won't come in. Are you acquainted with the De Bruler girls? You may know them by the Bailey nose which has descended in a straight line from the maternal grandmother. But noses aside there is very little resemblance between Luise and Frances. I've a great mind to tell you a bit of a story about the two girls. You see I am a friend to every body, but Franc is rather my favorite. She used to be in the habit of dropping in here to see me and make me talk. She is a saucy chit; but there is nothing she appreciates better than my conversation.

Now Luise is a gentle little thing, can't listen to the mildest gossip without looking hurt. She needs "tempering," like a new axe, for I argue that if she was a little tougher she wouldn't be so tender. She loves Franc beyond all reason. She couldn't be hired to eat a cherry if she thought that child wanted it. There is such a thing as overdoing even the cardinal virtues, and Luise is so self-sacrificing that she puts me out of all patience.

It was the last thing she ever meant to do, to break Franc's heart; but you see Franc is a Spartan and hides her sufferings, and Luise is a little literary, and can't see what goes on before her nose.

It was about two years ago last March that James Payson came to town to study law. His mother was from one of the first families of Darymple—she that was Harriet Pomroy, but you wouldn't know any better for that.

The girls all smiled on James from the first, though I hardly saw why, for he was not a high-flyer; he attended to his own business, and didn't seem to be looking out for a wife. This I know to be a fact, for I recommended two or three young ladies to him, whereupon he laughed and told me his law-studies engaged his whole attention, so that really he had no time to think of matrimony. I shouldn't believe any man's word without evidence; but I took pains to investigate, and found that he was in the habit of spending his evenings at home, and seldom went out without his aunt and cousins.

So I am quite sure he hadn't the shadow of a matrimonial intention when he first began to call at Dr. De Bruler's. His acquaintance with those girls was purely accidental, springing up from his finding Franc's bosom-pin in the road. But dear me, you know, and I know, Mrs. Gayhart, how these things grow and grow out of the smallest provocation. I was absent at the time, and have always regretted it, for a word in season from me would have directed his attention to Frances instead of Luise, and thus prevented future mischief. I should have told him which was my favorite, and why; and if that wasn't sufficient I don't know but I might have informed him of Luise's scribbling propensity. That would have decided the matter at once.

It isn't generally known that Luise inclines that way. She never published any thing; but I happen to know, being a friend of the family, and having access to pigeon-holes and corner cupboards, I happen to know—no matter how, and pray don't mention it—that she is ambitious, and would be as much of a scribble-de-dee as any of them, if she only could.

Once I hinted to her that writing women were in danger of dipping the dish-cloth into the ink-stand, and she must look out for herself. I never saw her provoked before, but she was then. She said she would rather dip the dish-cloth into the inkstand a dozen times a day than to dip her fingers into other people's pies!

I resented the charge, I assure you, for I never yet read any of her productions, whether letters, manuscripts, or diary, unless it came right in my way. To tell you the truth, Mrs. Gayhart, I have never forgiven her that outburst, so unbecoming a lady!

But I was speaking of James Payson, you remember. I always regretted that he happened to fix his affections on Luise, though I certainly was not to blame. When I returned from my long visit at Pipton they were both looking as happy and foolish as you please. I am not one of those sour, single ladies who can't endure the sight of other people's happiness; on the contrary, I live, as it were, in the lives of others. This engagement irritated me, I must confess, but for purely benevolent reasons—I discovered that my dear little Frances was in trouble about it.

"Alas," thought I, when I first saw my pet after a six-months' absence, "and is there no one but Pauline Pry with a pair of eyes to see how matters are going?"

She had lost her appetite, and was fading into a shadow. She didn't sleep, for I stole into her room two nights in succession to see how she was, and both times she started up with a sigh, saying,

"Oh, Miss Pry, can't I be let alone even in my own chamber?"

There was so much irritation in her manner that I was confirmed in my suspicions that she had some secret heart-trouble, for nothing else is so wearing to the nerves.

I didn't then know the particulars of her case, but I felt it my duty to investigate. She was manifestly in love, but not with any young man in the village, for I had reviewed them all; nor with any one at a distance, for I had watched the post-office. I don't happen to be in her confidence, but I watched her as a cat does a mouse.

This I remarked, that she looked uneasy whenever I spoke of James Payson. I could not gain the least information regarding the engagement—how it came about, and when. She wouldn't give any opinion of her sister's choice; didn't know whether she was to settle in Africa or Asia; "supposed it was their own business, Miss Pry!"

To be sure! As if it were any the less mine, though, for all that!

"I understand from the neighbors," said I, "that he paid you some attentions at first, and it was hard to foresee which way his choice would fall. How is it, Franc?"

"He found my breast-pin," said she, coloring like a rose; "and if it would be any satisfaction for you to see it, here it is, Miss Pry."

Poor thing! She would have danced at her own funeral to keep up appearances. The way she braved it out before James! She was three or four different persons all in the course of one evening, frowning, laughing, and sentimental, by turns. Symptoms of unrequited love, Mrs. Gayhart! Don't I remember how Hiram Powers used to behave in my presence? He was so bashful finally that he never came to the point.

I was sorry for Franc. Luise went sailing along; never saw any body but James; wore pink ribbons, and looked like a beauty. Now, what was I to do? It is always my agonizing desire to know where the path of duty lies. What would you have done, Mrs. Gayhart; now candidly, under these circumstances?

What you would have done, my dear woman, depends upon your disposition; and what that is I have no means of judging. If you are noble and high-souled, you would have tried to set matters right; if you are weak and selfish, you would have held your tongue.

Now, I humbly hope I have some magnanimity; and I couldn't hold my tongue. I couldn't see this misery proceed. I went to Luise—yes, I did—and with tears in my eyes I laid before her the true state of the case, having first pledged her to secrecy. She was embroidering a pair of slippers for the beloved James. The work dropped on the floor. Her eyes were the size of walnuts. She didn't believe one word I said.

"Why, Miss Pry," laughed she, "of all the whimsies that ever I heard in my life this is the drollest! What do you mean by coming to me with such a story?"

"I mean," replied I, with pathos, "I mean that you are blighting your sister's young life; you are standing between her and the sun."

"But James loves me, not Franc," said Luise, as dignified as a queen.

"Yes, now," said I. "I don't deny that he does, or thinks he does. But how was it in the first place, my dear? Didn't he find her brooch in the mud, and didn't he say when he met her she had a piquant face and charming manners? Didn't they sing together like a pair of nightingales; and wouldn't they have been engaged this minute if you hadn't called off James's attention by spraining your ankle that night you came from the concert?"

"Dear me, Miss Pry, how do you find out about every thing?"

"People come to me and tell me, my child. Besides, I can see for myself."

"It's those spectacles of yours," said she, with a wise smile. "They magnify like the Craig microscope, so I have heard."

"Very well," said I, indignantly, for she touched a weak spot when she touched my eyes, "you are the girl who once accused me of dipping my fingers into other people's pies. Meddling is the last employment I shall take up! Gang your ain gait—only remember, my love, that every step is right over your sister's heart!"

Then I shut my lips together like a pair of nippers. But I observed that my words had not been without effect, for when Luise took up the slippers again her hands trembled, and she picked out more stitches than she put in. That evening she sat in a corner, while James turned over Franc's music; and I saw her watch them both from under her eyelashes. Luise can't sing a note. Franc was fairly radiant, and James looked perfectly absorbed. He hardly gave a glance at Luise; and I noticed she twisted her fingers together till they were red.

The next month the engagement was broken. I have never told any body these particulars except yourself, Mrs. Gayhart, and remember this is in confidence. People can't understand it. Jane Perry looked at me the other day and said she "hoped nobody had been meddling." Censorious girl!

I wish I knew how Luise managed it; but she keeps out of my way. She treats me as if I was a malefactor instead of a scrupulously conscientious woman. It seems hard, but that is the way of this ungrateful world. I felt the worst, though, when Franc herself, whom I have been trying to serve, said to me, with some tartness:

"Miss Pry, do you know I believe this is some of your officiousness?"

Officiousness indeed!

I see no chance yet for Frances; but time works wonders.

Must you go, Mrs. Gayhart? Do drop in again. Your conversation is really refreshing!

II.

Good-morning, Mrs. Gayhart. I thought I'd run in without ceremony, as you might like to hear further particulars.

I hadn't the least idea how people were going to take this to heart. You'd think there had been a funeral at Dr. De Bruler's; and Frances mopes and looks as spiritless as Luise. Do you suppose it's possible she'd rather have James for a brother than to lose him entirely? He attends closely to business, but looks like the chief mourner. What a stir a little plain-speaking has made, to be sure! But I certainly meant right, as you know, Mrs. Gayhart. They will all see who is their best friend one of these days.

I had an opportunity this afternoon, while Luise was visiting a sick neighbor, to look at her private journal. I thought it my duty to ascertain her exact state of mind. We are too apt to look upon the trials of others as no concern of ours. Was not Cain reproved for asking, "Am I my brother's keeper?" We ought to cultivate an interest in the private joys and sorrows of our kind. Far be it from me, this boasted indifference of Cain!

The diary was fragmentary and confused. As nearly as I remember the first words I read were like these:

"Fools rush in where angels fear to tread."

Oh, Pauline Pry! Pauline Pry!"

(What she meant by attaching my name to that line I should be pleased to know!)

"Do I indeed 'stand between her and the sun?' Poor little Frances! I will watch her with my own eyes. If they are not as keen they are more loving than the Craig microscope."

(Insulting girl!)

"Yes, I think I do see what I would give worlds to shut out."

(I don't get the precise words, Mrs. Gayhart, but this is the substance.)

"My darling little Franc is unhappy! How blind I have been!"

(Yes, Luise, you certainly have!)

"She is restless; spends hours alone in her chamber. I begged her to-day to confide in me. There was a strange glitter in her eyes as she replied, 'Oh, Luise, I love you dearly, but you are the last person I can tell it to! Bear with me, and don't blame me—don't blame me!' I pressed the unhappy girl to my aching heart, and almost made an inward resolve. Yes, I will try to give him up, God helping me. James admires Franc; he will learn to love her sometime; the music will draw them together. Then what will become of me, for I suppose I can't die!"

(Sentimental, you perceive! Then she continues a few days afterward.)

"I have said the words which separate us forever! I made no explanation; how could I? He can only consider me capricious. Dear James! I even refuse to see him. I can not trust myself. I am not wild; I can answer questions coherently, though I feel as if my brain were turning. Poor boy! I can bear it for him, because somehow I have an agonizing belief that he will some time be comforted. I ought to be glad of that, but I am not. Ah, Franc, Franc, this is all for you! One day you will be happy, but you will never guess how my heart has been torn for your sake. You will never dream of it, unless that ubiquitous Miss Pry—"

I might quote farther, Mrs. Gayhart, for I have a remarkable memory; but certain disparaging remarks about myself which follow would only call out your indignation.

I shut up the book, laid it in the southwestern corner of the drawer I took it from, put the key under the mat of the Cologne-stand, and Miss Luise will never be any the wiser for my peep into her pusillanimous heart.

All will go right—mark my word. James Payson went to a concert last night, so he is recovering. I went to the Doctor's to tea last night, and saw Luise eat waffles with a relish; no danger of suicide. Frances is actually the saddest of the three.

III.

Good-evening, Mrs. Gayhart. Don't you think the oddest thing has happened! Do keep it quiet, but Franc has been writing a novel! I thought it was Luise who scribbled; but the best of us will get deceived, and their handwriting is precisely alike, so I mustn't be too much ashamed of my mistake. It is this that has worn Franc to a shadow. I knew it was something. And now the publishers refuse it, of course—the novel, I mean. I happened to overhear the girls talking as I was accidentally shut up in the china-closet. The mystery to me is how Franc contrived to keep that novel out of sight. I never saw so much as a scrap of it in any nook or cranny of that house!

"It was foolish, I know," said Franc, "to attempt such a work; but I used to go in and get items out of Miss Pry, and I thought I had a good plot. Do forgive me, Luise; the concealment has worried me to death, but I was ashamed to let you know what I had undertaken. But now I have made a clean breast of it, and I feel better."

"You don't mean that this has made you positively unhappy, Franc?" said Luise, catching her breath. "This isn't what has pained those blue circles under your eyes and made you look like a ghost?"

"Do I look like a ghost? Well, this is all that ails me, Luise; why, what else did you think? Except your breaking your engagement, dear. Excuse me for mentioning a forbidden subject; but that has distressed me not a little. I was really learning to love James like a brother."

"You dear, tantalizing old darling," cried Luise, kissing the girl twenty times; "you precious sister! So you have been pining for a piece of wedding-cake."

I thought Luise was going into hysterics, and was mortally afraid she would come out with the whole story; but she only laughed, and cried, and acted a little wild, so that Franc kept asking if the cider hadn't gone into her head. I will give Luise the credit of keeping her own counsel.

You won't be surprised to hear, Mrs. Gayhart, that the engagement is renewed. Luise and James came together again by a kind of free-masonry, and nobody but you and I have the slightest idea what parted them. It is called a lovers' quarrel. We will both be quiet; I despise telling tales.

Luise did say to me yesterday: "It seems, Miss Pry, those sharp spectacles of yours deceived you on a certain occasion."

"True," said I, briskly; "but it has all turned out right, and my heart rejoices in the happiness of my dear friends. I feel that I deserve some gratitude for my good intentions. I meant right, and observe it when you will, Luise, the humblest effort made from a sense of duty is sure to prosper. If not in one way, it surely will in another."

Good-night, Mrs. Gayhart, I must run home and put my cat in her box of cotton-wool, and go to bed. I don't know when I have tripped off with a lighter conscience, I'm sure.

THE PANTHER'S PORTRAIT.

I WAS sitting in the studio of one of our leading artists the other day, watching him as he worked away at a chaotic-looking canvas, where I could dimly make out trees and mountains, but where he could, doubtless, see the glorious possibilities of form and color, which, in two or three months, will, perhaps, light up the walls of some fortunate gallery. We talked, or at least I did, until, probably in self-defense, the artist told me, if I liked, to look over his sketches, pointing at the same time to a kind of chest, which I found on examination was the receptacle for sketches, drawings, and studies of by-gone days. These were all tumbled in together in apparently true artistic disorder, but were really arranged by years, so that beginning at the top and working downward one could trace the summer sojournings of successive seasons. Here were studies among the Catskills, at Conway, in quiet New England meadows, a set of sea-coast sketches, and so on in endless variety, and of such interest that the artist's object was accomplished, and the talkative guest was effectually silenced.

After an hour or so I found myself looking through a series of studies made long ago in the wild regions of Northern Maine. While turning them over rather hastily, for the afternoon light was beginning to fade, I came upon three or four pencil sketches of a panther, sometimes alone and sometimes with two cubs. I was so struck by the life, vigor, and reality of these drawings that I took them nearer the window to examine them more at my leisure. While sitting there my friend, warned by the approaching twilight, laid by his pallet, and coming to my side looked down at the drawings which I held.

"Ah," said he, "so you have unearthed my panther portraits! I do not think they have seen daylight before for ten years."

"Where did you find so good a specimen?" I asked. "You must have bribed some Van Amburgh to give you a sitting."

"No," said he, "I paid no price save that of a nervous headache and a scolding all round from my family when I told them about it."

After a little judicious encouragement the artist told me the following singular story, which I give almost in his own words, for I wrote it out that same evening:

"In the summer of 1853 I selected Moose-head Lake as the headquarters of my sketching tour, and in the latter part of June found myself jolting over the fifty miles of mountain-road between Skowhegan and the lake. After sufficient martyrdom to insure my canonization, if physical suffering is the only requisite, we reached Greenville at the foot of the lake, and the next morning I went by boat to Kineo, where was an excellent old-style inn, and where I proposed to remain most of the summer. I bought a 'birch' (vernacular for canoe), and was soon accomplished in its management so that I could go any where within a reasonable distance. I painted Kineo and the Cove and Big and Little Spencer Mountains, and finally, yielding to the temptation which had been all summer slowly enticing me, I hired a guide and set off for Mount Katahdin, forty miles distant.

"Now, by taking a birch over the carry at the head of the lake one can strike the upper waters of the Penobscot, and avoiding the almost impenetrable forest between the lake and the mountain, can reach Katahdin by a delightful canoe journey. Of course I chose the longer and easier way in preference to the shorter and more difficult one. I pass over the various pleasures of that trip down the Penobscot, for Thoreau and Winthrop have described it much better than I can. Suffice it to say that in a few days we were fairly settled in an old logging camp, duly patched up by my guide. I was at work on one or two large studies of lake and mountain, and my companion had started off on a several days' prospecting tour for lumber to be cut during the following winter; this absence on his part being one of the articles of our contract.

"I found it rather lonely housekeeping, but pork and trout are easily cooked in the backwoods, and throwing one's plates into the fire greatly simplifies the operation of washing dishes, so, on the whole, I got along very well, and worked hard enough during the day to insure sound sleep at night. I was painting on the study from which I made the big picture that I sold to L—, and had pitched my umbrella on a small grassy plateau backed by a pile of rugged rocks, and looking out on a lovely sheet of water, wherein was reflected the noble form of Katahdin. This point was about a mile and a half from camp, and I daily paddled over at the proper hour to catch the best effect of light and shade.

"One afternoon, when the sun was about two hours high, and I was working with might and main to put on canvas an approximation to the color of the mountain-side before me, some magnetic influence, rather than any noise which I heard, caused me to turn my head and look to one side and a little behind me. I believe that my heart stopped beating and stood stock-still for at least three minutes. I was certainly incapable of motion, and I presume that this temporary paralysis is all that saved my life; for not twenty-five feet from me, her sleek summer coat shining in the hot August sun, and her scintillating eyes fixed in a steady, unwinking gaze upon me, sat a female panther. She had come to within that distance from me, over dead sticks and dry leaves, absolutely without noise; and there she sat observing me and my painting arrangements just as I have seen a common cat watch something which excited her curiosity.

"You can perhaps imagine the revulsion of feeling. A moment before I was absorbed in the contemplation of a scene perfect in its tranquillity, now I was looking into the fierce eyes of the most savage beast of the Northern forests. I was, as I said, transfixed for a few moments, but presently recovered myself sufficiently to reflect that my best plan was to keep still, and watch my opportunity to reach the birch, which I had placed high and dry on the beach. How I wished that I had, for once, violated the backwoods rule, and tied the birch instead of beaching her; for then I might have tried a run for life with some chance of success. Wishing, however, was in vain, and I could only stare at my terrible visitor, almost fearing to wink, lest she should construe it as an insult. She did not seem to be at all malignant, and at length lay down, still watching my umbrella and sketching-easel with feline curiosity. My neck was by this time beginning to ache with the twisted position in which I was obliged to hold it, and I presently heard a whirring noise which I at first thought was in my own brain, but which I soon discovered was the coffee-mill-like purring of the huge cat.

"It is astonishing how that noise quieted my nerves, for although it was like the purring of forty tom-cats rolled into one, it had an assuring sound, and I accepted it as a pledge of good-will. After a while I moved my foot a little, and finding no objection made, tried other movements, turned into an easier position, and presently laid down my pallet and brushes. At this the creature stopped purring and rose to her feet. I then for the first time saw her in the lithe grace of her full length. She was or looked larger than any specimen that I ever saw in a menagerie, and the grace and power of every motion impressed me even then, when I expected any minute to feel her teeth in my shoulder. She soon appeared satisfied of my pacific intentions, and was so rude as to yawn in my face, showing her white range of teeth and red throat in a way that was not pleasant. Then she lay down again, and stretched herself at full length on the sunny grass.

"As confidence returned I began to recall instances which I had read of singular tameness in wild beasts, and particularly of this very species. I began also to consider what a chance I was losing for making a study from nature, such as perhaps no artist ever dreamed of before. I turned the thing over in my mind, and determined to make the attempt. Even if my feline friend proposed to make me furnish her evening meal, it probably would not hasten that repast if I took her portrait meanwhile, and then, if I did get off clear, it would be quite a feather in my cap. So I quietly reached toward my sketch-book, which lay on the ground near by. The panther raised her head with a slight snarl, but made no further demonstration, except to change from her side to the ordinary reclining posture of her race.

"I began my sketch with a shaky pencil, when I heard a faint cry from among the rocks where the shadows were darkening. The panther heard it, too, for she started to her feet, looked from me to the rocks, seemed to hesitate, and then, on a repetition of the cry, bounded off with mighty leaps. The instant that her tail vanished behind the nearest rock I was on a keen run for the birch, and launched it, I venture to affirm, quicker than ever birch was launched before. Six strokes of the paddle carried me to a safe distance, and then, in a rather unnerved condition, I sat and looked back at the scene of my adventure. My retreat had not been conducted in the best order imaginable, for I had abandoned all my painting materials, but even the critical condition of a wet sketch left at the mercy of an unappreciative panther could not tempt me to land again; so, as my visitant did not show herself, I paddled reflectively homeward through the deepening twilight.

"I passed, as you may guess, an uneasy night, listening for the cry of my afternoon acquaintance; but toward morning I fell asleep, and did not awake until the sun was high in the heavens. A swim in the lake, assisted by my sound morning sleep and a trout breakfast, did away with the effects of the tremendous strain to which my nerves had been subjected, and I soon began to wish that I had been able to finish my hardly-begun portrait of Madame Panther. I could not get the idea out of my head. It haunted me just as a snatch of a song will sometimes haunt one's brain, until the head aches with the repetition which it can not prevent. I remembered having read the story of a Frenchman who, during the early history of this country, had a very remarkable adventure with a she-panther, an adventure something like mine, and I wondered if I too had fallen in with an admiring pantheress. I knew that all these creatures are governed in a great measure by habit, and I thought it probable that, at about the same hour, my acquaintance would revisit the scene of our meeting, so I determined not to disappoint her.

"My confidence in feline good faith not being implicit, I carefully reloaded my big army revolver, and started on what I am forced to admit was a crazy expedition. I soon came in sight of my white umbrella, which still stood where I had pitched it, and in half an hour more I was making fast the birch at the old place, with the important variation of tying instead of beaching her. Then, with a beating heart and my revolver at a full cock, I made my way cautiously up the beach. All was quiet; my easel had, however, been upset, and at the first glance I exulted to see that my sketch was right side up. My exultation was premature, for on examination I found that the broad paw of a panther had been set fairly on the canvas, making a blot seven inches wide, with well-defined claw points.

"After examining this rather disheartening sign-manual, I set up my easel and began a new sketch. I did not get along with it very fast, owing to the unceasing watch which I kept on all sides, and to the constant interruptions caused by chance noises. It still lacked about an hour of my former visit, when my keenly alive ears caught the sound of a stealthy tread. I instantly faced in the direction of the sound, sketch-book at hand and revolver all ready. In a moment she came out from behind an intervening rock, and I heartily wished myself safe on the water again, for she carried, cat-like, in her mouth a cub of a few weeks growth, while another blundered along in front of her. When she saw me she dropped her burden, and bounding over her young ones looked for a moment as savage as you can imagine, the hair on her back reversed, her eyes flashing, and every movement indicating a determination to fight if necessary. I, being the objective of this demonstration, did not admire her looks, and was preparing for defensive measures, when she seemed to recognize her former acquaintance, smoothed her ruffled 'back-hair,' and presently lay down where she stood, while the cubs, full of kitten-like play, rolled over one another with growls of make-believe rage.

"As soon as I dared take my finger off the trigger my pencil was at work, and I soon secured one of the sketches which you have seen. Madame Panther, whose maternal solicitude had not permitted her to purr as yet, speedily found her couch too shady and rough, and after a while led her family to the sun-burnt patch of grass, where in a few minutes she was purring away with as much satisfaction as a tabby by the kitchen fire. With the restlessness of a wild creature she now and then shifted her position, thus giving me opportunities to sketch her in various attitudes, which you may be sure I improved.

"At last all three of them went sound asleep, the cubs curling themselves against their mother's breast in a group which I could not have improved by posing. When I had carefully worked up this last group, and made notes of the color, I became aware that night was approaching, and the question of getting away presented itself. I fingered my revolver, but besides the danger, almost amounting to certainty, of not killing at the first fire, I had a feeling that it was taking an unfair advantage of a perfectly polite female to shoot her when she was sleeping with her family. She soon solved the difficulty by waking up, and just as the chill airs of evening began to creep from lake and forest she led her cubs back among the rocks. I gathered up my traps as quickly and quietly as possible, and was glad enough to be a dozen yards from shore when my gentle friend of the sunny afternoon hours appeared on the beach, in quite a fury at my having dared to move. I watched her until it was too dark to see her motions, and then paddled to camp, where I found my guide with a fine saddle of moose-meat, on which we supped, while I narrated my adventures, finding an incredulous auditor, until I showed him my sketch with the foot-prints on it. This he at once acknowledged as proof, and began immediately to clean his rifle, 'for,' said he, 'the durned critter may scent the meat to-night, and painters sometimes hunt in couples.'

"Sure enough, the male panther found us out that night, whether by scent or otherwise I do not know, for cats are said to depend on sight in their hunting excursions. At any rate there is his hide by the lounge yonder with a rifle-ball in the head and a revolver-bullet, just for show, in the region of the heart. We made one or two unsuccessful expeditions after my panther and cubs, for the raid on our camp by the paterfamilias destroyed my respect for the rest of the family; but we never could find them, so I can only hope that they have lived virtuous lives or died natural deaths."

ABSENCE.

To watch the long bright hours linger by;
To see the rosy flush of Morning break
O'er shore and sea, o'er upland, hill, and lake;
To see the Even darken, deepen, die;
To see the Moon her nightly duty take,
The soft grave glory of her royalty;
While evermore on heart and lip and eye
Weighs the dull sense of something lost, or gone,
That leaves no loveliness in things most fair,
No music in the ripple's whispering tone,
No glory in the golden autumn air,
No joy in life's rich hours told one by one:
This is the heavy cross the absent bear!

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

PARIS, January 9, 1868.

THE Emperor has been getting in his wood. Since the festivities of New-Year's which enlivened the court-yard of the Tuileries have closed a huge wood-pile has been deposited under the windows of that part of the palace which is occupied by the imperial household, and the wood-sawyers are stowing it away in the cellars.

The Parisian public would be very glad if this were the only form in which the activity of the Emperor's servants seems to betoken warm work. But they are apprehensive of other fires than those which are to be kindled of oak sticks in the fire-places of the palace. The armories are reported as too busy in manufacturing arms to be allowed any holiday at New-Year's, and the proposed law for a more sweeping conscription now under discussion in the "Corps Legislatif" is not unfrequently brought to mind in the streets as we see a long train of mounted men, each leading a second horse, come in over the military road, or meet in the dusk of the evening a train of army wagons, each heavily laden with a dozen cases such as rifles are packed in, drawn by smoking horses, who walk as innocently along the Rue de Rivoli toward the great barracks as if they were carrying bread and meat for the poor who resort to the Prince Imperial's cook-shops.

The Opposition journals are busy in comparing the recent pacific utterances of the Emperor with his present requirement, that the effective force of France be increased to one million two hundred thousand men. There is, in truth, perhaps no inconsistency. The Imperial idea of peace is well put in the contrast afforded by two brilliant frescoes which adorn the ancient ceiling of the hall of Henry II. in the Louvre. The God of War and the Genius of Peace are represented. Mars stands firmly upon his brawny feet well planted a little apart. But the gentle spirit of Peace, who is surrounded with bayonets and cutlasses, is a figure delicately balanced in the unstable position of one standing with the limbs crossed. This singular and insecure attitude, both feet being pressed to the ground in their reversed position, is the characteristic trait of the design.

But let us return to the wood-pile.

In Paris, on these snowy and foggy days, the chimney corner is the most popular place of resort for those who have one, and an attractive topic for those who have not. Some of the newly-built residences, as well as the churches, are warmed by hot-air furnaces. But the general public, of native habits, keep warm either by open fires of hardwood sticks, such as may be seen now in some luxurious and sensible parlors on Murray Hill, or by fires of coal, which many prefer on account of economy, or again, descending the scale of wealth, by stoves of white porcelain bound with brass and surmounted with a black marble top, from which a porcelain stove-pipe rises, or, lastly, by coarse thick wrappings over the shoulders, wooden over-shoes to keep the shoes from contact with the pavement, and a box of hot coals to warm the feet upon.

As one walks along the street now he pities the poor women that are seen, each sitting against a wall, or in a windy archway, protected only by a little folding screen, while watching the stock of fancy goods, or plated-ware, or jet ornaments she has for sale; but when she moves a little and one's eye falls on the foot-stove, glimmering warmly under her feet, pity turns to envy of that comfortable sensation she is enjoying.

When you enter the restaurant at this season the waiter asks you if you will have a "chaufferette" before he says any thing about dinner. The room indeed is well warmed, and, what is also important, it looks warm, by virtue of glowing fires in the grates; but when you get the chaufferette under your numb feet the delicious sensation of warmth begins to creep over you from every direction. There is sound philosophy in thus approaching the sensorium by all the avenues at once.

These chaufferettes are a universal convenience here. The cashier of a store sitting at his desk has one, and so has the blind beggar sitting at the church-door. They are used in carriages, and it is now proposed to introduce them into hackney-coaches. A cab on the stand ticketed "Foot-warmer within" would have the first call.

These little boxes of comfort are made in various ways. The most common are of perforated metal, strengthened and guarded with external ribs, and furnished with a handle like that of a pail. The safest and tidiest are little carpeted foot-stools, containing a square flat canister of tin, which can be slipped out and filled with hot water. A very convenient imitation can be extemporized with a tin canteen, such as may be bought at any tinman's shop, wrapped in a piece of carpet, and, if convenient, laid in a shallow box.

These foot-warmers were used by our serene great-grandmothers in America; and it is impossible to say how much of their placid temper was due to the genial circulation thus maintained. Perhaps it would save ungrateful complaining at the weather, and some simultaneous ill-humor at other things if, in our day, these little promoters of complacency were not wholly disused. Ill-temper does not always proceed from the heart, or, at least, some very sweet people become a little tart when contracted by hunger or pinched by cold.

The lodger, sojourning in Paris, like many moderate little households, and all the poor classes, buys his fuel by the pound. The sooty porter who attends on the little shops where fuel is sold brings on his back a bag of coal, containing a hundred or half a hundred pounds, or a similar weight of wood, and delivers it in whatever room of whatever story he is requested. When coal is sold in large quantities it is delivered in the same way. It is brought in large carts containing a great number of bags. The driver carries the bags in, empties them and brings them out, and piles them up on the sidewalk. The purchaser or his servant then comes out and counts the bags, by which he is assured of the quantity. This might be an improvement upon the slovenly and wasteful way in which coal is dumped on the sidewalks of American streets, and thence shoveled up, to spread its dust along the breeze, and to leave its dark penumbra upon the flagstones for a day or two.

For kindling, sticks about the size of lead-pencils are sold in bundles; and so are neat little knots of shavings soaked in resin or pitch, which look like red and yellow bows of coarse ribbon. In some shops are displayed for the same purpose festoons of large cones, such as the Bazar recently recommended to be used for making Santa Claus. Here those cones all go up chimney instead of coming down.

The philosophy of warm clothing requires a loose, open fabric, rather than a close, tight-fitting texture. It is found by scientific experiment that fibres of woolen, cotton, or other such substances as are employed in garments, form a better non-conductor when they are somewhat separated and interlace each other loosely, thus retaining a considerable bulk of air in their interstices, than when they are closely united in a compact tissue. For instance, ten ounces of wool scarcely twisted, as in the Berlin wools, and knit loosely, makes a warmer breakfast shawl than the same quantity of yarn close twisted and woven into a hard but thinner cloth. For this reason a straw or cotton-flannel insole is warmer than one of calf-skin, fur is warmer than two or three thicknesses of leather would be, a glove of a thick but porous skin, and not fitting too tight, is warmer than a firm, inelastic kid, and a cloth with a long nap on the inside, such as is now made for winter cloaks, is warmer than a plain cloth of the same weight.

No arrangement of fibre which art has been able to effect equals, in this respect, the disposition which Nature makes of the filaments composing the feathers on the breast of certain water-fowl, particularly the eider-duck. The innumerable fibres contained in one plumelet of this down, though bound to a common centre, seem to have what may be called a family antipathy to each other; for there are families in which repulsion seems to be the law instead of affinity. However close the members may be brought together for a time they rise apart, each standing upon its own separate dignity, when the external pressure is removed.

The eider and other down is much used in France for warm bed-covering. In many old families, and very commonly throughout the provinces, it is used in the cumbersome form of a huge pillow half as large as a feather-bed. It looks like a burden for a man, but its weight is hardly perceptible in its place. It is sewed into a red or yellow silk case, and adorns the lower half of the bed, where it makes itself felt upon the feet and limbs by warmth and not by pressure. These are called "edredons." The style now most commonly seen in Paris is a quilted counterpane, of varying thickness, covered in some brilliant-colored silk.

P.S. This letter, which is all about keeping warm in Paris, would be either too much or too little were I not to add, that, before mailing it, the sun came out warm, the snow and ice were all gone, the ladies, nurses, and children were to be seen in the daytime sunning themselves on the benches under the trees in the parks and public gardens; and in the evening, as late as seven o'clock, the loungers on the Boulevards were sitting in the open air in front of the cafés drinking coffee and smoking. But the fireside will doubtless come into fashion again very soon.

Crochet Rosette.

Work with fine crochet cotton. Begin the rosette from the centre with a foundation of 10 chain stitches (ch.), join this in a ring by a slip stitch (sl.), and crochet the 1st round: 3 ch., which take the place of 1 double crochet stitch (dc.), 15 times alternating, 1 ch., 1 dc. around the ring; and after this 1 ch., 1 sl. in the last of the first 3 ch., which serves as a double crochet.

2d round.—12 ch. * 1 single crochet (sc.) in the next dc.; 12 ch. From * repeat 14 times.

3d round.—* 1 sc.; 1 short double crochet (sdc.), 2 dc., 1 sdc., 1 sc., 1 sl. in the first 7 ch. of the next 12 chain of the last round; 1 sl., 1 sc., 1 sdc., 2 dc., 1 sdc., 1 sc. in the last 7 of the following 12 ch., thus missing 11 stitches; pass over the next sc. of the last round, repeat from * to the end of the round, and fasten the thread.

4th round.—6 sl. in the next 6 stitches; 1 sc. in the following sl. of the last round; * 1 ch., 1 sc. in the following stitch, 7 ch., missing 12 stitches; 1 sc. in the following stitch. Repeat 7 times from *, after which 7 ch., missing 12 stitches.

Tatting Rosette.

This rosette is worked in fine crochet cotton, and is designed for trimming make 8 double stitches, each separated by a picot; join these in a ring, and work into the next middle picot of the last round. From * repeat in the round till the rosette is finished, after which fasten the thread.

Crochet Insertion.

This is worked lengthwise in crochet cotton with 7 rounds as follows: On a proper foundation: 1st round.—All in slip stitch.

2d round.—On the other side of the foundation row 1 sc. (single crochet) in the 1st stitch; * 15 ch. (chain stitches); passing over 2 stitches, 1 sc. in the following stitch; 1 ch.; 1 p. (picot), this consists of 4 ch., 1 sc. in the 1st; 2 ch.; passing over 2 stitches, 1 sc. in the following stitch. Repeat from *.

3d round.—1 sc. in the 5th of the 1st 15 ch. of the last round; * 1 ch.; 1 sc. in the 6th following of these 15 ch., thus passing over 5 ch.; 2 ch.; 1 sc. in the 5th of the next 15 ch. Repeat from *.

4th round.—1 sc. around the 1st ch. of the last round; * 5 ch., 2 sc. in the next 2 ch., 5 ch., 1 sc. around the following ch. Repeat from *.

5th round.—1 double crochet in the 1st sc. of the 4th round; 3 ch.;

2d round—1 sl. (slip stitch) in each p.; between each 2 sl. 1 ch. Now crochet further on the under side of the p. row, putting the needle through the under part of the stitch, as follows:

3d round—1 sl. in the 1st stitch; * 2 ch. forming a p.; but here the p. must be fastened to the next stitch by 1 sl. Repeat from *.

4th round—1 sl. in the next p. of the former round; * 2 p.; after finishing the 2d p. omit here the last ch.; 1 sl. in the 2d following p. of the former round, thus passing over 1 p.; 7 ch.; 1 sl. in the 3d following p., thus passing over 2 p. Repeat from *.

5th round—1 dc. in the 1st stitch of the last round; * 3 p. The picots of this round must point downward; in order to form such, crochet

1 ch.; 1 sc. around the next ch. which lies between 2 dc. Repeat from *.

7th round—1 sc. in the 1st sc.; * 1 ch.; 4 p.; 1 ch.; 1 sc. in the next sc. Repeat from *.

See illustration, page 280.

This sash is made of black satin, ornamented with crochet rosettes, and is intended to be worn with black or dark silk dresses. The design is of black satin braid and enameled beads, and consists of a bow with two long ends, which is fastened by means of two crochet rings to a pleated satin belt. This belt is ornamented along the middle with little crochet rings. The bow consists of a bias strip of satin, three inches wide and ten inches long, which is arranged as shown in the engraving. The knot of the bow is composed of a strong wooden ring, $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches in diameter, which is wrapped with a bias strip of black satin and enameled bead braid; in the centre is a

ner. Finish the rings by sewing on the beads. The centre of the smaller rosettes is formed by a small button with black silk wound over it. The rings of the lower border are fastened together in working the second round.

Bretelles with Belt.

THESE bretelles are made of blue satin ribbon, two and a half and one and a half inches wide, and white blonde two inches wide, laid on a foundation of Swiss muslin, and fastened to a similar belt. Cut of the muslin two pieces each from Figs. 38 and 39, cover them with the broad ribbon, making a small pleat along the middle, and make a cross pleat in each of the front bretelles, along the dotted line in Fig. 38. Set the blonde along the straight line on the cut piece, making a fullness at the point, then sew the front bretelles fast at the back from 27 to 28, letting the back bretelles hang loose from the seam in imitation of a lappet. Now sew two pieces of the narrow blue ribbon on the front of the bretelles, as marked by * and • in Fig. 38, so as to cross each other, and cover the place where they are sewed on with a bow without ends of the same ribbon. Set the bretelles on a belt, consisting of black satin ribbon, an inch and a half wide, and of the necessary length, covered with double Swiss muslin, which is again covered with blonde. The belt closes at the back and sides. Finish with a bow with long ends of broad blue ribbon, edged on one side with blonde.

ARTICLES DE PARIS.

THE luxurious tastes of the Parisians and of the rest of the European world who do shopping in Paris, and the artistic taste of French artisans, have given rise to a class of manufactures, or rather we should say a style of design in certain articles, which are known under the name of "articles de Paris."

An "article de Paris" is an article of convenience, which is made in the similitude of something else, so that at first sight it appears to be a bijou intended merely to please the eye. This device of concealing a serviceable purpose under the image of a mere decoration is seen in a thousand forms in the shops of Paris; and every new season adds to the number and variety of these pretty fantasies.

A great favorite this season is a little imitation of a traveler's umbrellas and canes, as they often appear strapped together on the journey. It is about five inches long. There are the crooked handle of one umbrella, the round knob on another, the carved face appearing on the head of a cane, and the ivory tip of a parasol, all sticking out of one end of a leather case, which appears to be bound together by straps and buckles near the top and the bottom. It is called "Somebody's luggage." Judged by the eye merely it is a child's toy, intended to complete a doll's outfit. But when one of the supposed umbrellas is pulled out it proves to be a lead-pencil, another is a paper-cutter, the walking-stick turns out to be a penknife, and the parasol handle a pen-holder. Some are made more elaborate still, containing, under similar disguises, a ruler and sealing-wax, while the ferule of the case is made to open by touching a spring and a tiny inkstand appears. The whole is of the red Russia leather now so fashionable.

Another kindred article is what seems at first sight to be a very pretty imitation of an umbrella stand of metal, bronzed or gilt, with the umbrella closed, but not bound up, standing in it. If you should leave it on your library table and little Susy should come in, she would be perfectly justified in supposing that you had bought her an unusually beautiful gift, and in carrying it off immediately to its proper place in the doorway of her baby-house. It is in fact a pen-wiper; and the umbrella consists of a gilt wire or rod, to which are attached folds of silk suitable for the purpose. The stand or rack is calculated also to hold pencils and pen-handles.

Inkstands are a favorite article for the use of these humorous devices. Some are made in the form of the huge weights that were used on old-fashioned large scales. The ring at the top serves as a handle. The body is covered with Russia leather, or is finished in polished brass with the number of pounds enameled in blue letters on the front. Another is a fat bag of money, the open mouth of which appears filled to the brim with golden pieces. The lid lifts at one of the uppermost wrinkles. These are solidly made in metal, with all the artistic taste of bronzes. Others are made in bronze with most elaborate finish; for instance, a group of musical instruments, lying as the musicians have left them around the stand. The violin, which lies on the head of the big drum, serves as a knob to lift off the cover of the inkstand which the drum contains. In this way the article may be made in a disguise suitable to symbolize the ideas or the pursuits of any purchaser. One is in the form of a miniature fishing-basket, another looks like a model of a cadet's military cap; the broad visor lying flat on the table serves as a shallow pen-tray, and the brass button on the top lifts off the crown to disclose the ink.

Table-bells are made in fanciful forms. One is concealed by a horseshoe standing on the calks, with the head of the nails projecting far enough to serve as a rack for pen and pencils; while a jockey cap on the top of a whip-handle, or a stirrup hanging from its strap, forms the spring by which to strike the bell. A bell for the dinner-table is made in the form of a little lunch-table with a silver cloth and set with dishes, in the centre of which is a tall form of ice-cream, the rounded top of which constitutes the spring of the bell. All these are wrought of steel or brass, burnished, or in plated and gilded ware.

One of the prettiest articles in the silversmith's windows is a heron standing in the edge of water and surrounded by the stumps of reeds which seem to have been mown, though here and there a long drooping flag is left. This beautiful figure of chased silver is nothing but a toothpick stand. The butler sticks a quill pick into each of the stumps of reeds, and it is set on the dinner-table looking quite ridiculous. For the same purpose a silver peacock, with his tail spread, is used, the picks being stuck into his radiating feathers. Another design is a silver bear on his hind-legs, carrying a lantern in one hand and an open parasol in the other. The top of the parasol, which is of gilded metal, is pierced with a score of holes to receive the quills.

Perhaps more ingenuity is expended in the production of articles for the convenience of the smoker than in any other branch of this manufacture. Cigar-boxes, stands, and ash-receivers are made in such innumerable forms as to evade description. Articles for the toilette-table, too, form a striking class. Conspicuous among these is the design of a coach of state, all gilded, after the style of Louis XV., and drawn by silver horses, and mounted with driver and footmen. The whole is perhaps eighteen inches long. Looking in at the coach-window the portly bodies and round heads of two elegant toilette-bottles may be seen occupying the back seat.

Time-pieces seem somewhat to have escaped this fashion, but not entirely. A watch has been made extremely small, and concealed in the body of a gold beetle, whose red enameled wings rise when a spring is touched and uncover the face. In some of these watches the wings are studded with diamonds.

The season of New-Year's, when so many persons are perplexed for something new as well as pretty for gifts, calls forth a multitude of such articles. A great variety of them are adapted to the ephemeral use of bonbon boxes. Among these are figures like dolls dressed à la Japanese, or in historic or other fantastic costumes. One work-shop turns out little pleasure-yachts, well built and rigged, with capacious cabins for the sweet freight. Another, little sleighs with gilded figure-heads and bright steel runners, and a trunk strapped on behind. Another "artist" produces a model of a locomotive engine, say two feet long, constructed of polished steel and brass, with rosewood wood-work, and so massively wrought and delicately finished that it is not too much to call it magnificent; yet the resemblance is not pursued into the minutest details. A little inspection shows that it is not a working model, nor a figure to demonstrate the anatomy of the machine, but a sort of sugar-plum version of it—to borrow a musical phrase—a variation on the theme, in short an Article de Paris.

In the most attractive and successful productions of this nature three qualities are noticeable. First, the article, though not of any considerable importance individually, must be one having a general and common use, otherwise the manufacturer of odd or fantastic patterns will not find an adequate demand in the market. Second, the designer must be so possessed of the existing phase of taste and fashion in the community he serves as to embody the article in a "taking" form. And, third, the model or idea adopted as the foundation of the design must not be literally copied, but must be so deviated from or so adapted to the use in view that the result may show on its face that it is a humorous combination of two incongruous ideas.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE public journals of Washington took occasion last week, as a sort of introduction to Mr. Dickens's readings in that city, to quote largely from the chapter in "American Notes" in which the great novelist gives his impressions of men and things in the Capital received during his first visit to this country, in 1842. We will not make extended extracts; though they are peculiarly interesting just now (whatever allowances may be made for the strong impressions of the writer), as indicating what wonderful changes have been wrought in the seat of government during the last quarter of a century. This is a description of Dickens's hotel in 1842:

"The hotel in which we live is a long row of small houses fronting on the street, and opening at the back upon a common yard, in which hangs a great triangle. Whenever a servant is wanted, somebody beats on this triangle from one stroke up to seven, according to the number of the house in which his presence is required; and as all the servants are always being wanted, and none of them ever come, this enlivening engine is in full performance the whole day through. Clothes are drying in the same yard; female slaves, with cotton handkerchiefs twisted round their heads, are running to and fro on the hotel business; black waiters cross and recross with dishes in their hands; two great dogs are playing upon a mound of loose bricks in the centre of the little square; a pig is turning up his stomach to the sun, and grunting, 'That's comfortable!' and neither the men nor the women, nor the dogs, nor the pig, nor any created creature takes the smallest notice of the triangle, which is tingling madly all the time."

At this second visit of Mr. Dickens to Washington, in 1868, he took apartments at Welcker's Hotel-Restaurant, which seems to be the Delmonico's of Washington; where rooms are furnished to special parties, we understand, and where plenty of the choicest viands can be promptly served without any mad tingling of "the triangle," as we know by experience.

Moreover, the Washington of to-day has no gangs of slaves "linked to each other by iron fetters" in the open street. Mr. Dickens finds himself in a free capital, where the negro he pitied a quarter of a century ago is treated like a human being; where he votes and pays taxes; where he sends his children to the public schools; where he is his own master.

Mr. Dickens, on his first visit, called Washington the "City of Magnificent Intentions." "Spacious avenues, that begin in nothing and lead nowhere; streets, miles long, that only want houses, roads, and inhabitants; public buildings, that need but a public to be complete; and ornaments of great thoroughfares, which only lack great thoroughfares to ornament, are its leading features." Not so now; although imagination can look back twenty-five years and easily fancy the description not untrue then. The "magnificent distances" remain; but houses and inhabitants, public buildings with a public, spacious avenues which both begin and end in something, are now its leading features.

The Washington public received Mr. Dickens at his readings with cordiality—although perhaps not with so much enthusiasm as has been accorded to him in some other places. Some dissatisfaction was felt in regard to the sale of seats; but that has also been the case, more or less, every where. On the first evening of his reading Mr. Dickens's equanimity was somewhat disturbed by the very poor light—and with reason, too. Washington gas-light does not compare favorably with that of New York or Philadelphia, in general. Even the streets look dark and gloomy at evening. However, Mr. Dickens made the best of the difficulty, apologizing for the dim light, and expressing the hope that "Carroll Hall" would be illumined by the bright eyes of his hearers. And any mental disquietude which remained in the reader's mind seems to have been fully removed when, in the course of the "Christmas Carol," the ghost appeared and a warning "Bow-wow-wow" came from a dog in the audience, who was unfriendly to spirits. The audience roared, Dickens was convulsed with laughter, the audience cheered, and Dickens broke down again.

Mr. Dickens travels in a quiet and unassuming manner. We chanced to ride in the same car with him from Philadelphia to Washington. He and his party, consisting of Mr. Dolby and two or three assistants, occupied seats in our immediate vicinity. He read his newspapers, chatted a little, took his luncheon in the cars, and appeared like any ordinary traveler, excepting that the constant, annoying reference to tickets was ward off from him by previous arrangements of his agent, and that whenever the train made any lengthy stop, and he got out of the cars to look about, he was always accompanied by one of his party. In Washington he was observed to visit the public buildings here and there, and doubtless made favorable mental comparisons between Washington in 1842 and Washington in 1868.

A young lady, while waltzing at a party recently, met with a very sad accident, which should put others upon their guard. She was "backing" in the dance when her foot caught in her dress, and she fell with great force on the back of her head, becoming instantly insensible. She is in a critical state. The fall caused four large pins which were fastened in her chignon to pierce her skull and brain.

A very novel suit for divorce was instituted in Detroit a short time ago. A young lady and gentleman at an evening party joked each other about being married, and in the same spirit of jest that prompted the bantering, proceeded to the residence of a clergyman, where the ceremony was performed, the minister, however, not being let into the secret, but supposing the marriage to be in earnest, and the intention of the parties bona fide, to become husband and wife. The affair being afterward revealed to the clergyman as a joke, he seriously declared that they were a great deal too much married! Consequently the chagrined maiden appealed to the Court to have her silly joke set aside, and annulled by judicial form. Her request was granted—and most likely she will be careful about her second marriage! If marriage that can be called where the parties have no real intention of linking their fortunes for life.

And concerning divorces; the Arabs have a wise practice. When married people seek a separation, the Cadi orders them to live for some time with a discreet and austere man of the tribe, that the latter may examine their life and see on which side blame lies. This elderly man makes a report at the expiration of the appointed time, and this report is the foundation on which the Cadi builds his judgment of divorce. Experience has demonstrated that there is no better method of restoring peace in families. The husband and wife, put thus on their good behavior, resume the manners of courting days. Each strives to be more amiable than the other, and it is often a puzzle to ascertain where the fault lies—and difficulties come to a comfortable and natural settlement.

It is strange how many serious accidents occur from pure carelessness with regard to poisonous substances. A while ago a woman in Hoboken died from the effects of Paris green, which she put by mistake into her tea instead of sugar. She went to the pantry without a light, her cup of tea in her hand, and put into it, as she supposed, a spoonful of sugar. But some Paris green, procured for the purpose of killing cockroaches, was close by the sugar, and the mistake made so easily was fatal. More recently a woman in Alabama put arsenic in her flour by mistake for soda, the consequence of which was the death of the whole family—herself, her husband, and three children. In the household arrangements every poisonous substance should be kept distinct and separate from eatables, and if possible, labeled with great care.

A traveler who recently (considering the distance) dined in Peking, thus describes a Chinese dinner: "The first course consisted of a kind of square tower formed of slices of breast of goose and of a fish, which the Chinese call 'cow's head,' with a large dish of hashed tripe and hard eggs of a dark color preserved in lime. Next came grains of pickled wheat and barley, shell-fish unknown in Europe, enormous prawns, preserved ginger, and fruits. All these are eaten with ivory chopsticks, which the guests bring with them. On grand occasions the first dish is always bird's nest soup. The second course was a ragout of sea-snails. Their taste resembles that of the green fat of turtle. The snails were followed by a dish of the flesh covering the skull of sturgeons, which is very costly, as several heads are required to make even a small dish. Next was a dish of shark's fins mixed with slices of pork and a crab salad; after these a stew of plums and other fruit, the acidity of which is considered a corrective for the viscous fat of the fish; then mushrooms, pulse, and ducks' tongues, which last are considered the ne plus ultra of Chinese cookery; deer's tendons—a royal dish which the Emperor himself sends as a present to his favorites; and Venus's ears, a kind of unctuous shell-fish; lastly, boiled rice, served in small cups, with acanthus seeds preserved in spirits, and other condiments. Last of all, tea was served."

A new "wedding" has been "invented." It occurs at a very short interval after the "sugar wedding"—which is thirty days after marriage—and is called the "vinegar wedding."

CORD AND CREESE;

OR,

THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XXIX.

BEATRICE'S JOURNAL.

October 30, 1848.—My recovery has been slow, and I am still far from well. I stay in my room almost altogether. Why should I do otherwise? Day succeeds day, and each day is a blank.

My window looks on the sea, and I can sit there and feed my heart on the memories which that sea calls up. It is company for me in my solitude. It is music, though I can not hear its voice. Oh, how I should rejoice if I could get down by its margin and touch its waters! Oh how I should rejoice if those waters would flow over me forever!

November 15.—Why I should write any thing now I do not know. This uneventful life offers nothing to record. Mrs. Compton is as timid, as gentle, and as affectionate as ever. Philips, poor, timorous, kindly soul, sends me flowers by her. Poor wretch, how did he ever get here? How did Mrs. Compton?

December 28.—In spite of my quiet habits and constant seclusion I feel that I am under some surveillance, not from Mrs. Compton, but from others. I have been out twice during the last fortnight and perceived this plainly. Men in the walks who were at work quietly followed me with their eyes. I see that I am watched. I did not know that I was of sufficient importance.

Yesterday a strange incident occurred. Mrs. Compton was with me, and by some means or other my thoughts turned to one about whom I have often tried to form conjectures—my mother. How could she ever have married a man like my father? What could she have been like? Suddenly I turned to Mrs. Compton, and said:

"Did you ever see my mother?"

What there could have been in my question I can not tell, but she trembled and looked at me with greater fear in her face than I had ever seen there before. This time she seemed to be afraid of me. I myself felt a cold chill run through my frame. That awful thought which I had once before known flashed across my mind.

"Oh!" cried Mrs. Compton, suddenly, "oh, don't look at me so; don't look at me so!"

"I don't understand you," said I, slowly.

She hid her face in her hands and began to weep. I tried to soothe her, and with some success, for after a time she regained her composure. Nothing more was said. But since then one thought, with a long series of attendant thoughts, has weighed down my mind. Who am I? What am I? What am I doing here? What do these people want with me? Why do they guard me?

I can write no more.

January 14, 1849.—The days drag on. Nothing new has happened. I am tormented by strange thoughts. I see this plainly that there are times when I inspire fear in this house. Why is this?

Since that day, many, many months ago, when they all looked at me in horror, I have seen none of them. Now Mrs. Compton has exhibited the same fear. There is a restraint over her. Yes, she too fears me. Yet she is kind; and poor Philips never forgets to send me flowers.

I could smile at the idea of any one fearing me, if it were not for the terrible thoughts that arise within my mind.

February 12.—Of late all my thoughts have changed, and I have been inspired with an uncontrollable desire to escape. I live here in luxury, but the meanest house outside would be far preferable. Every hour here is a sorrow, every day a misery. Oh, me! if I could but escape!

Once in that outer world I care not what might happen. I would be willing to do menial labor to earn my bread. Yet it need not come to that. The lessons which Paolo taught me have been useful in more ways than one. I know that I at least need not be dependent.

He used to say to me that if I chose to go, on the stage and sing, I could do something better than gain a living or make a fortune. He said I could interpret the ideas of the Great Masters, and make myself a blessing to the world.

Why need I stay here when I have a voice which he used to deign to praise? He did not praise it because he loved me; but I think he loved me because he loved my voice. He loves my voice better than me. And that other one! Ah me—will he ever hear my voice again? Did he know how sweet his voice was to me? Oh me! its tones ring in my ears and in my heart night and day.

March 5.—My resolution is formed. This may be my last entry. I pray to God that it may be. I will trust in him and fly. At night they can not be watching me. There is a door at the north end, the key of which is always in it. I can steal out by that direction and gain my liberty.

Oh Thou who hearest prayer, grant deliverance to the captive!

Farewell now, my journal; I hope never to see you again! Yet I will secrete you in this chamber, for if I am compelled to return I may be glad to seek you again.

March 6.—Not yet! Not yet!

Alas! and since yesterday what things have happened! Last night I was to make my attempt. They dined at eight, and I waited for them to retire. I waited long. They were longer than usual.

At about ten o'clock Mrs. Compton came into my room, with as frightened a face as usual. "They want you," said she.

I knew whom she meant. "Must I go?" said I.

"Alas, dear child, what can you do? Trust in God. He can save you."

"He alone can save me," said I, "if He will. It has come to this that I have none but Him in whom I can trust."

She began to weep. I said no more, but obeyed the command and went down.

Since I was last there months had passed—months of suffering and anguish in body and mind. The remembrance of my last visit there came over me as I entered. Yet I did not tremble or falter. I crossed the threshold and entered the room, and stood before them in silence.

I saw the three men who had been there before. He and his son, and the man Clark. They had all been drinking. Their voices were loud and their laughter boisterous as I approached. When I entered they became quiet, and all three stared at me. At last he said to his son, "She don't look any fatter, does she, Johnnie?"

"She gets enough to eat, any how," answered John.

"She's one of them kind," said the man Clark, "that don't fatten up. But then, Johnnie, you needn't talk—you haven't much fat yourself, lad."

"Hard work," said John, whereupon the others, thinking it an excellent joke, burst into hoarse laughter. This put them into great good-humor with themselves, and they began to turn their attention to me again. Not a word was said for some time.

"Can you dance?" said he, at last, speaking to me abruptly.

"Yes," I answered.

"Ah! I thought so. I paid enough for your education, any how. It would be hard if you hadn't learned any thing else except squalling and banging on the piano."

I said nothing.

"Why do you stare so, d—n you?" he cried, looking savagely at me.

I looked at the floor.

"Come now," said he. "I sent for you to see if you can dance. Dance!"

I stood still. "Dance!" he repeated with an oath. "Do you hear?"

"I can not," said I.

"Perhaps you want a partner," continued he, with a sneer. "Here, Johnnie, go and help her."

"I'd rather not," said John.

"Clark, you try—'you were always gay,'" and he gave a hoarse laugh.

"Yes, Clark," cried John. "Now's your chance."

Clark hesitated for a moment, and then came toward me. I stood with my arms folded, and looked at him fixedly. I was not afraid. For I thought in that hour of who these men were, and what they were. My life was in their hands, but I held life cheap. I rose above the fear of the moment, and felt myself their superior.

Clark came up to me and stopped. I did not move.

"Curse her!" said he. "I'd as soon dance with a ghost. She looks like one, any how."

He laughed boisterously.

"He's afraid. He's getting superstitious!" he cried. "What do you think of that, Johnnie?"

"Well," drawled John, "it's the first time I ever heard of Clark being afraid of any thing."

These words seemed to sting Clark to the quick.

"Will you dance?" said he, in a hoarse voice.

I made no answer.

"Curse her! make her dance!" he shouted, starting up from his chair. "Don't let her bully you, you fool!"

Clark stepped toward me and laid one heavy hand on mine, while he attempted to pass the other round my waist. At the horror of his polluting touch all my nature seemed transformed. I started back. There came something like a frenzy over me. I neither knew nor cared what I said.

Yet I spoke slowly, and it was not like passion. All that I had read in that manuscript was in my heart, the very spirit of the murdered Despard seemed to inspire me.

"Touch me not," I said. "Trouble me not. I am near enough to Death already. And you," I cried, stretching out my hand to him, "THUG! never again will I obey one command of yours. Kill me if you choose, and send me after Colonel Despard."

These words seemed to blast and wither them. Clark shrank back. He gave a groan, and clutched the arm of his chair. John looked in fear from one to the other, and stammered with an oath: "She knows all! Mrs. Compton told her."

"Mrs. Compton never knew it, about the Thug," said he, and then looked up fearfully at me. They all looked once more. Again that fear which I had seen in them before was shown upon their faces.

I looked upon these wretches as though I had surveyed them from some lofty height. That one of them was my father was forgotten. I seemed to utter words which were inspired within me.

"Colonel Despard has spoken to me from the dead, and told me all," said I. "I am appointed to avenge him."

I turned and went out of the room. As I left I heard John's voice:

"If she's the devil himself, as I believe she is," he cried, "she's got to be took down!"

I reached my room. I lay awake all night long. A fever seemed raging in all my veins. Now with a throbbing head and trembling hands I write this. Will these be my last words? God grant it, and give me safe deliverance. Amen! amen!

CHAPTER XXX.

SMITHERS & CO.

THE Brandon Bank, John Potts, President, had one day risen suddenly before the eyes of the astonished county and filled all men with curious speculations.

John Potts had been detestable, but now, as a Bank President, he began to be respectable, to say the least. Wealth has a charm about it which fascinates all men, even those of the oldest families, and now that this parvenu showed that he could easily employ his superfluous cash in a banking company, people began to look upon his name as still undoubtedly vulgar, yet as undoubtedly posse sing the ring of gold.

His first effort to take the county by storm, by an ordinary invitation to Brandon Hall, had been sneered at every where. But this bank was a different thing. Many began to think that perhaps Potts had been an ill-used and slandered man. He had been Brandon's agent, but who could prove any thing against him after all?

There were very many who soon felt the need of the peculiar help which a bank can give if it only chooses. Those who went there found Potts marvelously accommodating. He did not seem so grasping or so suspicious as other bankers. They got what they wanted, laughed at his pleasant jokes, and assured every body that he was a much-beloved man.

Surely it was by some special inspiration that Potts hit upon this idea of a bank; if he wished to make people look kindly upon him, to "be to his faults a little blind, and to his virtues very kind," he could not have conceived any better or shorter way toward the accomplishment of so desirable a result.

So lenient were these people that they looked upon all those who took part in the bank with equal indulgence. The younger Potts was considered as a very clever man, with a dry, caustic humor, but thoroughly good-hearted. Clark, one of the directors, was regarded as bluff, and shrewd, and cautious, but full of the milk of human kindness; and Philips, the cashier, was universally liked on account of his gentle, obsequious manner.

So wide-spread and so active were the operations of this bank that people stood astonished and had nothing to say. The amount of their accommodations was enormous. Those who at first considered it a mushroom concern soon discovered their mistake; for the Brandon Bank had connections in London which seemed to give the command of unlimited means, and any sum whatever that might be needed was at once advanced where the security was at all reliable. Nor was the bank particular about security. John Potts professed to trust much to people's faces and to their character, and there were times when he would take the security without looking at it, or even decline it and be satisfied with the name.

In less than a year the bank had succeeded in gaining the fullest confidence even of those who had at first been most skeptical, and John Potts had grown to be considered without doubt one of the most considerable men in the county.

One day in March John Potts was sitting in the parlor of the bank when a gentleman walked in who seemed to be about sixty years of age. He had a slight stoop, and carried a gold-headed cane. He was dressed in black, had gray hair, and a very heavy gray beard and mustache.

"Have I the honor of addressing Mr. Potts?" said the stranger, in a peculiarly high, shrill voice.

"I'm Mr. Potts," said the other.

The stranger thereupon drew a letter from his pocket-book and handed it to Potts. The letter was a short one, and the moment Potts had read it he sprang up and held out his hand eagerly.

"Mr. Smithers, Sir!—you're welcome, Sir, I'm sure, Sir! Proud and happy, Sir, to see you, I'm sure!" said Potts, with great volubility.

Mr. Smithers, however, did not seem to see his hand, but seated himself leisurely on a chair, and looked for a moment at the opposite wall like one in thought.

He was a singular-looking old man. His skin was fresh; there was a grand, stern air upon his brow when it was in repose. The lower part of his face was hidden by his beard, and its expression was therefore lost. His eyes, however, were singularly large and luminous, although he wore spectacles and generally looked at the floor.

"I have but recently returned from a tour," said he, in the same voice; "and my junior partner has managed all the business in my absence, which has lasted more than a year. I had not the honor of being acquainted with your banking-house when I left, and as I had business up this way I thought I would call on you."

"Proud, Sir, and most happy to welcome you to our modest parlor," said Potts, obsequiously. "This is a pleasure—indeed I may say, Sir, a privilege—which I have long wished to have. In fact, I have never seen your junior partner, Sir, any more than yourself. I have only seen your agents, Sir, and have gone on and done my large business with you by writing."

Mr. Smithers bowed.

"Quite so," said he. "We have so many connections in all parts of the world that it is impossible to have the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with them all. There are some with whom we have much larger transactions than yourself whom I have never seen."

"Indeed, Sir!" exclaimed Potts, with great surprise. "Then you must do a larger business than I thought."

"We do a large business," said Mr. Smithers, thoughtfully.

"And all over the world, you said. Then you must be worth millions."

"Oh, of course, one can not do a business like ours, that commands money, without a large capital."

"Are there many who do a larger business than I do?"

"Oh yes. In New York the house of Peyton Brothers do a business of ten times the amount—yes, twenty times. In San Francisco a new house, just started since the gold discoveries, has done a business with us almost as large. In Bombay Messrs. Nickerson, Bolton, & Co. are our correspondents; in Calcutta Messrs. Hoster-mann, Jennings, & Black; in Hong Kong Messrs. Naylor & Tibbetts; in Sydney Messrs. Sandford & Perley. Besides these, we have correspondents through Europe and in all parts of England who do a much larger business than yours. But I thought you were aware of this," said Mr. Smithers, looking with a swift glance at Potts.

"Of course, of course," said Potts, hastily; "I knew your business was enormous, but I thought our dealings with you were considerable."

"Oh, you are doing a snug business," said Smithers, in a patronizing tone. "It is our custom whenever we have correspondents who are sound men to encourage them to the utmost. This is the reason why you have always found us liberal and prompt."

"You have done great service, Sir," said Potts. "In fact, you have made the Brandon Bank what it is to-day."

"Well," said Smithers, "we have agents every where; we heard that this bank was talked about, and knowing the concern to be in sure hands we took it up. My Junior has made arrangements with you which he says have been satisfactory."

"Very much so to me," replied Potts. "You have always found the money."

"And you, I suppose, have furnished the securities."

"Yes, and a precious good lot of them you are now holding."

"I dare say," said Smithers; "for my part I have nothing to do with the books. I merely attend to the general affairs, and trust to my Junior for particulars."

"And you don't know the exact state of our business?" said Potts, in a tone of disappointment.

"No. How should I? The only ones with which I am familiar are our American, European, and Eastern agencies. Our English correspondents are managed by my Junior."

"You must be one of the largest houses in London," said Potts, in a tone of deep admiration.

"Oh yes."

"Strange I never heard of you till two years ago or so."

"Very likely."

"There was a friend of mine who was telling me something about some Sydney merchants who were sending consignments of wool to you. Compton & Brandon. Do you know them?"

"I have heard my Junior speak of them."

"You were in Sydney, were you not?"

"Yes, on my last tour I touched there."

"Do you know Compton & Brandon?"

"I looked in to see them. I think Brandon is dead, isn't he? Drowned at sea—or something of that sort?" said Smithers, indifferently.

"Yes," said Potts.

"Are you familiar with the banking business?" asked Smithers, suddenly.

"Well, no, not very. I haven't had much experience; but I'm growing into it."

"Ah! I suppose your directors are good business men?"

"Somewhat; but the fact is, I trust a good deal to my cashier."

"Who is he?"

"His name is Philips, a very clever man; a first-rate accountant."

"That's right. Very much indeed depends on the cashier."

"He is a most useful and reliable man."

"Your business appears to be growing, from what I have heard."

"Very fast indeed, Sir. Why, Sir, in another year I expect to control this whole county financially. There is no reason why I shouldn't. Every one of my moves is successful."

"That is right. The true mode of success in a business like yours is boldness. That is the secret of my success. Perhaps you are not aware," continued Mr. Smithers, in a confidential tone, "that I began with very little. A few thousands of pounds formed my capital. But my motto was boldness, and now I am worth I will not say how many millions. If you want to make money fast you must be bold."

"Did you make your money by banking?" asked Potts, eagerly.

"No. Much of it was made in that way, but I have embarked in all kinds of enterprises; foreign loans, railway scrip, and ventures in stock of all sorts. I have lost millions, but I have made ten times more than ever I lost. If you want to make money, you must go on the same plan."

"Well, I'm sure," said Potts, "I'm bold enough. I'm enlarging my business every day in all directions."

"That's right."

"I control the county now, and hope in another year to do so in a different way."

"How so?"

"I'm thinking of setting up for Parliament—"

"An excellent idea, if it will not injure the business."

"Oh, it will not hurt it at all. Philips can manage it all under my directions. Besides, I don't mind telling a friend like you that this is the dream of my life."

"A very laudable aim, no doubt, to those who have a genius for statesmanship. But that is a thing which is altogether out of my line. I keep to business. And now, as my time is limited, I must not stay longer. I will only add that my impressions are favorable about your bank, and you may rely upon us to any extent to co-operate with you in any sound enterprise. Go on and enlarge your business, and draw on us for what you want as before. If I were you I would embark all my available means in this bank."

"Well, I'm gradually coming to that, I think," said Potts.

"Then, when you get large deposits, as you must expect, that will give you additional capital to work on. The best way when you have a bank is to use your cash in speculating in stocks. Have you tried that yet?"

"Yes, but not much."

"If you wish any thing of that kind done we will do it for you."

"But I don't know what are the best investments."

"Oh, that is very easily found out. But if you can't learn, we will let you know. The Mexican Loan just now is the most promising. Some of the California companies are working quietly, and getting enormous dividends."

"California?" said Potts; "that ought to pay."

"Oh, there's nothing like it. I cleared nearly half a million in a few months."

"A few months!" cried Potts, opening his eyes.

"Yes, we have agents who keep us well up; and so, you know, we are able to speculate to the best advantage."

"California!" said Potts, thoughtfully. "I should like to try that above all things. It has a good sound. It is like the chink of cash."

"Yes, you get the pure gold out of that. There's nothing like it."

"Do you know any chances for speculation there?"

"Yes, one or two."

"Would you have any objection to let me know?"

"Not in the least—it will extend your business. I will ask my Junior to send you any particulars you may desire."

"This California business must be the best there is, if all I hear is true."

"You haven't heard the real truth."

"Haven't I?" exclaimed Potts, in wonder. "I thought it was exaggerated."

"I could tell you stories far more wonderful than any thing you have heard."

"Tell me!" cried Potts, breathlessly.

"Well," said Smithers, confidentially, "I don't mind telling you something which is known, I'm sorry to say, in certain circles in London, and is already being acted on. One-half of our fortune has been made in California operations."

"You don't say so!"

"You see I've always been bold," continued Smithers, with an air of still greater confidence.

"I read some time since in one of Humboldt's books about gold being there. At the first news of the discovery I chartered a ship and went out at once. I took every thing that could be needed. On arriving at San Francisco, where there were already very many people, I sold the cargo at an enormous profit, and hired the ship as a warehouse at enormous prices. I then organized a mining company, and put a first-rate man at the head of it. They found a place on the Sacramento River where the gold really seems inexhaustible. I worked it for some months, and forwarded two millions sterling to London. Then I left, and my company is still working."

"Why did you leave?" asked Potts, breathlessly.

"Because I could make more money by being in London. My man there is reliable. I have bound him to us by giving him a share in the business. People soon found out that Smithers & Co. had made enormous sums of money in California, but they don't know exactly how. The immense expansion of our business during the last year has filled them with wonder. For you know every piece of gold that I sent home has been utilized by my Junior."

Potts was silent, and sat looking in breathless admiration at this millionaire. All his thoughts were seen in his face. His whole heart was laid bare, and the one thing visible was an intense desire to share in that golden enterprise.

"I have organized two companies on the same principle as the last. The shares are selling at a large premium in the London market. I take a leading part in each, and my name gives stability to the enterprise. If I find the thing likely to succeed I continue; if not, why, I can easily sell out. I am on the point of organizing a third company."

"Are the shares taken up?" cried Potts, eagerly.

"No, not yet."

"Well, could I obtain some?"

"I really can't say," replied Smithers. "You might make an application to my Junior. I do nothing whatever with the details. I don't know what plans or agreements he may have been making."

"I should like exceedingly to take stock. How do the shares sell?"

"The price is high, as we wish to confine our shareholders to the richer classes. We never put it at less than £1000 a share."

"I would take any quantity."

"I dare say some may be in the market yet," said Smithers, calmly. "They probably sell at a high premium though."

"I'd pay it," said Potts.

"Well, you may write and see; I know nothing about it."

"And if they're all taken up, what then?"

"Oh—then—I really don't know. Why can't you organize a company yourself?"

"OH!" CRIED MRS. COMPTON, SUDDENLY, "OH, DON'T LOOK AT ME SO; DON'T LOOK AT ME SO!"—[SEE CHAPTER XXIX.]

"Well, you see, I don't know any thing about the place."

"True; that is a disadvantage. But you might find some people who do know."

"That would be very difficult. I do not see how we could begin. And if I did find any one, how could I trust him?"

"You'd have to do as I did—give him a share of the business."

"It would be much better if I could get some stock in one of your companies. Your experience and credit would make it a success."

"Yes, there is no doubt that our companies would all be successful since we have a man on the spot."

"And that's another reason why I should prefer buying stock from you. You see I might form a company, but what could I do?"

"Could not your cashier help you?"

"No, not in any thing of that sort."

"Well, I can say nothing about it. My Junior will tell you what chances there are."

"But while I see you personally I should be glad if you would consent to give me a chance. Have you any objection?"

"Oh no. I will mention your case the next time I write, if you wish it. Still I can not control the particular operations of the office. My control is supreme in general matters, and you see it would not be possible for me to interfere with the smaller details."

"Still you might mention me."

"I will do so," said Smithers, and taking out his pocket-book he prepared to write.

"Let me see," said he, "your Christian name is—what?"

"John—John Potts."

"John Potts," repeated the other, as he wrote it down.

Smithers rose. "You may continue to draw on us as before, and any purchases of stock which you wish will be made."

Potts thanked him profusely.

"I wish to see your cashier, to learn his mode of managing the accounts. Much depends on that, and a short conversation will satisfy me."

"Certainly, Sir, certainly," said Potts, obsequiously. "Philips!" he called.

Philips came in as timid and as shrinking as usual.

"This is Mr. Smithers, the great Smithers of Smithers & Co., Bankers; he wishes to have a talk with you."

Philips looked at the great man with deep respect and made an awkward bow.

"You may come with me to my hotel," said Smithers; and with a slight bow to Potts he left the bank, followed by Philips.

He went up stairs and into a large parlor on the second story, which looked into the street. He motioned Philips to a chair near the window, and seated himself in an arm-chair opposite.

Smithers looked at the other with a searching glance, and said nothing for some time. His large, full eyes, as they fixed themselves on the face of the other, seemed to read his inmost thoughts and study every part of his weak and irresolute character.

At length he said, abruptly, in a slow, measured voice, "Edgar Lawton?"

At the sound of this name Philips started from his chair, and stood on his feet trembling. His face, always pale, now became ashen, his lips turned white, his jaw fell, his eyes seemed to start from their sockets. He stood for a few seconds, then sank back into a chair.

Smithers eyed him steadfastly. "You see I know you," said he, after a time.

Philips cast on him an imploring look.

"The fact that I know your name," continued Smithers, "shows also that I must know something of your history. Do not forget that!"

"My—my history?" faltered Philips.

"Yes, your history. I know it all, wretched man! I knew your father whom you ruined, and whose heart you broke."

Philips said not a word, but again turned an imploring face to this man.

"I have brought you here to let you know that there is one who holds you in his power, and that one is myself. You think Potts or Clark have you at their mercy. Not so. I alone hold your fate in my hands. They dare not do any thing against you for fear of their own necks."

Philips looked up now in wonder, which was greater than his fear.

"Why," he faltered, "you are Potts's friend. You got him to start the bank, and you have advanced him money."

"You are the cashier," said Smithers, calmly. "Can you tell me how much the Brandon Bank owes Smithers & Co.?"

Philips looked at the other and hesitated.

"Speak!"

"Two hundred and eighty-nine thousand pounds."

"And if Smithers & Co. chose to demand payment to-morrow, do you think the Brandon Bank would be prompt about it?"

Philips shook his head.

"Then you see that the man whom you fear is not so powerful as some others."

"I thought you were his friend?"

"Do you know who I am?"

"Smithers & Co.," said Philips, wearily.

"Well, let me tell you the plans of Smithers & Co. are beyond your comprehension. Whether they are friends to Potts or not, it seems that they are his creditors to an amount which it would be difficult for him to pay if they chose to demand it."

Philips looked up.—He caught sight of the eyes of Smithers, which blazed like two dark, fiery orbs as they were fastened upon him. He shuddered.

"I merely wished to show you the weakness of the man whom you fear. Shall I tell you something else?"

Philips looked up fearfully.

"I have been in York, in Calcutta, and in Manila; and I know what Potts did in each place. You look frightened. You have every reason to be so. I know what was done at York. I know that you were sent to Botany Bay. I know that you ran away from your father to India. I know your life there. I know how narrowly you escaped going on board the Vishnu, and being implicated in the Manila murder. Madman that you were, why did you not take your poor mother and fly from these wretches forever?"

Philips trembled from head to foot. He said not a word, but bowed his head upon his knees and wept.

"Where is she now?" said Smithers, sternly. Philips mechanically raised his head, and pointed over toward Brandon Hall.

"Is she confined against her will?"

Philips shook his head.

"She stays, then, through love of you?"

Philips nodded.

"Is any one else there?" said Smithers, after a pause, and in a strange, sad voice, in which there was a faltering tone which Philips, in his fright, did not notice.

"Miss Potts," he said.

"She is treated cruelly," said Smithers. "They say she is a prisoner?"

Philips nodded.

"Has she been sick?"

"Yes."

"How long?"

"Eight months, last year."

"Is she well now?"

"Yes."

Smithers bowed his head in silence, and put his hand on his heart. Philips watched him in an agony of fright, as though every instant he was apprehensive of some terrible calamity.

"How is she?" continued Smithers, after a time. "Has she ever been happy since she went there?"

Philips shook his head slowly and mournfully.

"Does her father ever show her any affection?"

"Never."

"Does her brother?"

"Never."

"Is there any one who does?"

"Yes."

"Who?"

"Mrs. Compton."

"Your mother?"

"Yes."

"I will not forget that. No, I will never forget that. Do you think that she is exposed to any danger?"

"Miss Potts?"

Smithers bowed.

"I don't know. I sometimes fear so."

"Of what kind?"

"I don't know. Almost any horrible thing may happen in that horrible place."

A pang of agony shot across the sombre brow of Smithers. He was silent for a long time.

"Have you ever slighted her?" he asked at last.

"Never," cried Philips. "I could worship her—"

Smithers smiled upon him with a smile so sweet that it chased all Philips's fears away. He took courage and began to show more calm.

"Fear nothing," said Smithers, in a gentle voice. "I see that in spite of your follies and crimes there is something good in you yet. You love your mother, do you not?"

Tears came into Philips's eyes. He sighed.

"Yes," he said, humbly.

"And you are kind to her—that other one?"

"I love her as my mother," said Philips, earnestly.

Smithers again relapsed into silence for a long time. At last he looked up. Philips saw his eyes this time, no longer stern and wrathful, but benignant and indulgent.

"You have been all your life under the power of merciless men," said he. "You have been led by them into folly and crime and suffering. Often you have been forced to act against your will. Poor wretch! I can save you, and I intend to do so in spite of yourself. You fear these masters of yours. You must know now that I, not they, am to be feared. They know your secret but dare not use it against you. I know it, and can use it if I choose. You have been afraid of them all your life. Fear them no longer, but fear me. These men whom you fear are in my power as well as you are. I know all their secrets—there is not a crime of theirs of which you know that I do not know also, and I know far more."

"You must from this time forth be my agent. Smithers & Co. have agents in all parts of the world. You shall be their agent in Brandon Hall. You shall say nothing of this interview to any one, not even to your mother—you shall not dare to communicate with me unless you are requested, except about such things as I shall specify. If you dare to shrink in any one point from your duty, at that instant I will come down upon you with a heavy hand. You, too, are watched. I have other agents here in Brandon besides yourself. Many of those who go to the bank as customers are my agents. You can not be false without my knowing it; and when you are false, that moment you shall be handed over to the authorities. Do you hear?"

The face of Smithers was mild, but his tone was stern. It was the warning of a just yet merciful master. All the timid nature of Philips bent in deep subjection before the powerful spirit of this man. He bowed his head in silence.

"Whenever an order comes to you from Smithers & Co. you must obey; if you do not obey instantly whatever it is, it will be at the risk of your life. Do you hear?"

Philips bowed.

"There is only one thing now in which I wish you to do any thing. You must send every month a notice directed to Mr. Smithers, Senior, about the health of his daughter. Should any sudden danger impend you must at once communicate it. You understand?"

Philips bowed.

"Once more I warn you always to remember that I am your master. Fail in one single thing, and you perish. Obey me, and you shall be rewarded. Now go!"

Philips rose, and, more dead than alive, tottered from the room.

When he left Smithers locked the door. He then went to the window and stood looking at Brandon Hall, with his stern face softened into sadness. He hummed low words as he stood there—words which once had been sung far away. Among them were these, with which the strain ended:

"And the sad memory of our life below
Shall but unite us closer evermore;
No act of thine shall loose
Thee from the eternal bond,
Nor shall Revenge have power
To disunite us there!"

With a sigh he sat down and buried his face in his hands. His gray hair loosened and fell off as he sat there. At last he raised his head, and revealed the face of a young man whose dark hair showed the gray beard to be false.

Yet when he once more put on his wig none but a most intimate friend with the closest scrutiny could recognize there the features of Louis Brandon.

"AT THE SOUND OF THIS NAME PHILIPS STARTED FROM HIS CHAIR, AND STOOD ON HIS FEET TREMBLING."

Round after round they wound before
The task was wholly done,
And if their fingers touched, the blood
Straight to his cheek would run;
And if the knotted silk she chid
Her voice through every vein
Went with a thrill of joy, throughout
The winding of the skein.

Round after round, until the end,
And when the end was there
He knew it not, but sat with hands
Rais'd in the empty air:
The ringing of the merry laugh
Startled his dreaming brain,
And then he knew his heart ensnar'd
In winding of the skein.

A VALENTINE.

SHE that is fair, though never vain or proud,
More fond of home than fashion's changing crowd;
Whose taste refined even female friends admire,
Dress'd not for show, but rob'd in neat attire;
She who has learn'd, with mild forgiving breast,
To pardon frailties, hidden or confessed;
True to herself, yet willing to submit,
More sway'd by love than ruled by worldly wit:
Though young, discreet—though ready, ne'er unkind,
Blest with no pedant's, but a woman's mind:
She wins our hearts, toward her our thoughts incline,
So at her door go leave my valentine.

KNOW YE THE FAIR ONE.

Know ye the fair one whom I love?
High is her white and holy brow;
Her looks so saintly, sweet, and pure,
Make men adore who come to woo;
Her neck, o'er which her tresses hing,
Is snow beneath a raven's wing.

Her lips are like the red-rose bud,
Dew-parted in a morn of June;
Her voice is gentler than the sound
Of some far heard and heavenly tune;
Her little finger, white and round,
Can make a hundred hearts to bound.

My love's two eyes are bonnie stars,
Born to adorn the summer skies;
And I will by our tryst-thorn sit,
To watch them at their evening rise:
That when they shine on tower and tree,
Their heavenly light may fall on me.

SILENT LOVE.

You say I love not, 'cause I do not play
Still with your ringlets, and kiss time away;
By love's religion, I must here confess it,
The most I love when I the least express it!
Small gifts find tongues; full casks are ever found
To give, if any, yet but little sound:
Deep waters noiseless are; and this we know,
That chiding streams betray small depth below;
So when love speechless is, it doth express
A depth of love, and that depth bottomless.
Now since my love is tongueless, know me such
Who speaks but little, 'cause I love so much.

TO A LADY WITH A BOUQUET.

FLOWERS are love's truest language: they betray,
Like the divining rods of Magi old,
Where priceless wealth lies buried, not of gold,
But love—strong love, that never can decay!
I send thee flowers, O dearest! and I deem
That from their petals thou wilt hear sweet words,
Whose music clearer than the voice of birds,
When breathed to thee alone, perchance may seem
All eloquent of feelings unexpress'd.
Oh, wreath them in those tresses of dark hair!
Let them repose upon thy forehead fair,
And on thy bosom's yielding snow be press'd!
Thus shall thy fondness for my flowers reveal
The love that maiden coyness would conceal!

OUR VALENTINES.

TO SAINT VALENTINE.

"HAIL! Bishop Valentine! whose day this is;
All the air is thy diocese,
And all the chirping choristers
And other birds are thy parishioners:
Thou marriest every year
The lyric lark and the grave whispering dove;
The sparrow that neglects his life for love,
The household bird with the red stomacher;
Thou mak'st the blackbird speed as soon
As doth the goldfinch or the halcyon—
This day more cheerfully than ever shine,
This day which might inflame thyself, old Valentine!"

THE WINDING OF THE SKEIN

RING after ring the golden floss
About his fingers roll'd:
He thought—"Her hair is brighter yet,
It has the truer gold."
I read this in his eyes, that strove
To turn from her in vain,
And loath'd my raven tresses through
The winding of the skein.

WOMEN.

Ye are stars of the night, ye are gems of the morn,
Ye are dew-drops whose lustre illumines the thorn;
And rayless that night is, that morning unblest,
When no beam in your eye lights up peace in the breast.
And the sharp thorn of sorrow sinks deep in the heart,
Till the sweet lip of woman assuages the smart;
'Tis hers o'er the couch of misfortune to bend,
In fondness a lover, in firmness a friend;
And adorn'd by the bays or enwreath'd with the willow,
Her smile is our meed, and her bosom our pillow.

THE BACHELOR'S DILEMMA.

"By all the sweet saints in the Missal of Love,
They are both so intensely, bewitchingly fair,
That, let Folly look solemn, and Wisdom reprove,
I can't make up my mind which to choose of the pair.

"There is Fanny, whose eye is as blue and as bright
As the depth of spring skies in their noontide array;
Whose every soft feature is gleaming in light,
Like the ripple of waves on a sunshiny day.

"There is Helen, more stately of gesture and mien,
Whose beauty a world of dark ringlets enshrouds;
With a black, regal eye, and the step of a queen,
And a brow like the moon breaking forth from the clouds.

"But since I must fix on or on black eyes or blue,
Quickly make up my mind 'twixt a Grace and a Muse;
Pr'ythee, Venus, instruct me that course to pursue Which even Paris himself had been puzzled to choose."

Thus murmured a Bard, predetermined to marry,
But so equally charmed by a Muse and a Grace,
That though one of his suits might be doomed to miscarry,
He'd another he straight could prefer in its place.
So trusting that Fortune would favor the brave,
He asked each in her turn, but they both said him nay:
Lively Fanny declared he was somewhat too grave,
And Saint Helen pronounced him a little too gay.

CHILDREN'S FALSEHOODS.

A GREAT deal of allowance is to be made for the deviations from truth in their statements which children so readily fall into at an early age, for we shall see by a little reflection that the idea of veracity, as a duty binding on the conscience, does not come from instinct, but is acquired by experience and instruction. We tell the truth when our words represent mental conceptions which correspond with outward realities. We tell falsehoods—using the word here in its most general sense—when our words represent mental conceptions which do not correspond with—that is, were not produced by, outward realities.

To make the meaning plain, let us suppose that a child five years of age, sitting on a piazza behind the house, sees a cat catch a mouse. She says to her mother afterward at supper-time that she saw the cat catch a mouse—that is, speaking philosophically, she clothes the mental image of the outward reality which memory brings to her mind in words.

The next day, sitting in the same place in a musing mood, an image presents itself to her mind of a mouse in the yard pursuing and catching a cat. The impression in this case may be, for aught we know, in our almost entire ignorance of the exact state and exact action of the immature and half-developed cerebral organs, nearly or quite as vivid as in the other case. At supper-time memory, as before, recalls this second image. She clothes the then present image in words, just as she did the other, without being at all cognizant of the nice distinction arising from the fact that the one impression had its origin in an outward reality, and the other in a phantasm of the mind, perhaps equally real to her.

The distinction between these two things is a very nice one. Even grown people are continually confounding them—how often and how much only the wisest men and the profoundest thinkers are aware. They witness a scene, or look upon a group of objects to-day. There is formed upon the sensorium, that is, within those organs of the brain which take cognizance of objects of sight, an image of the scene. This image is awakened directly by the action of the outward objects. The next day we conceive of the scene again; but now the image, in its renewal, is not awakened by the action of the outward object. We call it a remembrance.

The third day something calls the image to the mind again. This second repetition is a remembrance too, and we imagine it to be a remembrance of the original image, whereas there is abundant reason to believe that it is very often only the remembrance of the remembrance; that is, that the second repetition is not a remembrance of the original image, but of the first repetition of it, for it often has combined with it elements which the original reality did not supply, and which must have been subsequently furnished by the imagination or by other recollections. Thus, with each repetition of an image once presented to our mind, new elements are introduced, or new modifications are made by the imagination, unconsciously to ourselves; so that after a considerable lapse of time, on comparing the conception which the mind finally retains with the original reality when we have the opportunity to recur to it, we are surprised to find how erroneous our notion has become.

This is the true explanation of the tendency of stories to grow in magnitude and change in character so much by successive repetitions, when circulating even among honest people. With the particulars which were observed by the narrator, or were communicated to him, others, suggested by the imagination, by associations, or by the other laws of connection under which the various mental states mingle with and modify each other, come and incorporate themselves, and can not afterward be separated. One of the greatest sources of difficulty in the way of ascertaining the truth by the examination of even honest witnesses in courts of justice, is the impossibility of their analyzing the impressions on their minds at the time, which are really the only direct subjects of their testimony, so as to separate those elements which were the impress of the original reality from those subsequently supplied by the imagination or by the mingling of one remembrance with the fragmentary portions of another.

Now, if mature minds, even the most honest, thus confound the impressions made by realities with those which arise from the fancy, how can we expect young children to draw the clear and ready distinction between them that we often seem to require?

Besides this difficulty, of always accurately distinguishing between what is really remembered to be a fact from what is only imagined to be such, there is the additional perplexity—and a very great perplexity it often is for a child—in understanding in what cases it is incumbent upon us that our words should correspond with the outward reality, and in what cases they may not. We read to our children, or relate to them from our own invention, fictitious tales; we tell them that the cat is in the fiddle, and that the cow jumped over the moon; we put them on our back, and say that we are a horse and are going to give them a ride, and say a thousand other things that have no correspondence with any outward reality. But when, poor things, they say any thing to us which has its origin only in their own fancy, we are often very much shocked, and rebuke them severely for the heinous sin they have been guilty of in telling a lie. But the falsehoods for which we reprove them are different, some one will say, from these. True; but how are the children to know this difference until they have learned it by proper instruction?

The moral of all this is, that a love of truth and a sense of the obligation to adhere to it, both in respect to their general nature and to the boundaries which limit and define them, are principles which we are not to expect to find implanted in the mind by any natural instinct. They must be gradually acquired, as the process of mental development goes on. The mother must therefore not be distressed or pained, as a young mother often is, to find that her child is not restrained by some native impulse from ever falsifying his word, nor too sternly rebuke or punish his early deviations from truth. To speak the truth is something that he has to learn. There are two ways, indeed, in which he may learn it. It may be inculcated by the kind, patient, gentle, and loving instructions of his father and mother; or it may be beaten into him by the cuffs, rebuffs, ill usage, and other difficulties, which he meets with in the experience of life, when he is detected in deviating from the truth in any of the forbidden ways.

Some mothers may be disposed to call in question the correctness of the views advanced in these paragraphs, on the ground that their children, as they allege, were always accustomed to tell the truth, of their own accord, from the beginning. But it is a curious fact that though we can find multitudes of mothers who will say that they never knew such and such a child to tell a lie, you can never find a grown person who will not admit that he told lies when he was a child by the dozen. Indeed, the mother herself, when pressed, virtually gives up the point. If you question her closely, by asking "Do you mean to say that your boy never, in his earliest infancy, said what was not true?" "Oh! of course," she will reply, "I don't mean when he was a very little child, and did not half know what he was saying." This is a surrender of the whole point at issue. What the mother means in such a case is that her boy learned to appreciate the obligation of truth and veracity when very young, and that when this was once learned he was very conscientious in the observance of it; and this is doubtless true of a great many children.

It may perhaps be said that these remarks apply only to the milder kind of untruths told by children, and that they do not take into account the much more serious class of falsehoods, such, namely, as are willfully and deliberately uttered, with a view to the accomplishment of some sinister or selfish design. This is very true. Although the principles here laid down apply with most of their force to this second class of offenses, there are some considerations peculiarly pertaining to them, which, however, must be presented at some other time.

THE WITCH-FINDER.

THIS is the title of a most exciting story, which has just been commenced in that very excellent family literary journal, the New York Weekly. It is from the pen of the great romancer, LEON LEWIS, and is decidedly the greatest of all that writer's great works. The story is strictly historical of the scenes as drawn from that era in the history of Salem when innocent men, women, and children were hung, burned, and drowned as witches. It is without doubt the most exciting as well as the most instructive romance of modern times. See the advertisement on the next page.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS.

In Oil and Water-Colors.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS are fac-simile reproductions of oil and water color paintings, so faithfully and skillfully done that it requires the experience of an expert to detect the difference between them and the originals.

For every purpose of decoration—for parlors, sitting-rooms, drawing-rooms, nurseries, or chambers—nothing so exquisitely beautiful as these Chromos can be obtained for the same amount of money. No other ornaments of the same cost are so admirably calculated to adorn a home; to cultivate a love for Art among the people at large; to brighten up the dwellings of every class of our citizens; and to teach the rising generation, by their silent yet refining influence, to love the beautiful in Art and in Nature. Hitherto Art has been aristocratic in its associations—none but the wealthy classes could afford to buy fine works of art; but chromo-lithography has changed all that, and brought exquisite paintings within the reach of every family. It is doing for Art what the printing press did for Literature. Let no family henceforth be without a few classical books, and one or two masterly paintings. Both should be regarded as indispensable to complete a home.

Send for "PRANG'S CHROMO: a Journal of Popular Art," and see what we have done and are doing to popularize Art. It will be sent to you free. Address L. PRANG & CO., Boston.

A BOOK FOR ST. VALENTINE'S DAY.

THE LOVERS' DICTIONARY. A Poetical Treasury of Lovers' Thoughts, Fancies, Addresses, and Dilemmas. Indexed with nearly Ten Thousand References as a Dictionary of Compliments and Guide to the Study of the Tender Science. Post 8vo, Cloth, $3 50; Gilt Edges, $4 25.

A very happily-chosen and numerous collection of love poems from all authors, but so arranged that lovers can make it a lexicon of compliments if they wish. In these 700 pages what lover can not find the wherewith to express his passion? Who shall go away unsatisfied, saying there is not enough?—Springfield Republican.

The volume has evidently been edited with great care, the comprehensive index alone implying a great deal of intelligent labor.—Boston Transcript.

This book may be termed unique. We have seen few collections of the poetry of the affections so well prepared for instantaneous reference. The "Dictionary" portion is a veritable novelty, and we can well suppose it will be studiously consulted by that happy-unhappy, that blest-unblest class, for whom it is especially compiled.—Philadelphia Post.

A choice winnowing of the pure and beautiful in love-writing.—N. Y. Evening Gazette.

A GREAT ANNOUNCEMENT.

Will be commenced in No. 16

(Ready Feb. 18) of

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY,

THE BEST STORY AND SKETCH PAPER OF THE AGE,

A THRILLING TALE,

ENTITLED

THE WITCH-FINDER;

OR, THE HUNTED MAID OF SALEM.

By LEON LEWIS,

Author of

"The Silver Ship," "The Water Wolf," "Syrin, the Jewess," &c., &c.

A thoroughly authentic history of Salem Witchcraft has yet to be written. In the books treating of this subject the atrocities that were perpetrated by the Witch-Testers were classed as almost pardonable offenses, because committed under the delusion that the victims were gifted with supernatural powers, and could at will afflict any person with the most direful physical and mental ailments—such as blindness, deformity, or insanity. In those days every person who suddenly became ill at once proclaimed that he was bewitched, and began recalling to mind the female on whom he had last looked, and who, it was thought, had prostrated him by the power of witchcraft. The suspected party, as was natural, generally proved to be some unfortunate woman against whom the invalid had long harbored a spirit of unfriendliness. The relatives of the sick person were at once summoned. After listening to the story of the individual supposed to be bewitched, they would proceed in a body to the dwelling of the unsuspecting victim, drag her forth, publicly accuse her of Witchcraft in having afflicted their suffering relative, and make her submit to

THE WITCH-FINDER'S TEST.

Tears and entreaties were of no avail; the expostulations of friends only made matters worse by leaving them open to suspicion, and it often happened that in endeavoring to shield the unfortunate victim from the fury of the superstitious multitude even the friends of the supposed witch were compelled to undergo the tortures of

THE WITCH-FINDER'S TEST.

These tests were as numerous as they were atrocious and diabolical, and frequently resulted in the death of the victim. When proved guilty of Witchcraft, death by the most cruel means was of course the sentence; but it was not a rare occurrence for to put an end to the victim's sufferings by death just as she was about to be declared innocent.

At this distant day, and in this age of enlightenment, there will be found many who will discredit the following brief description of one of the many tests resorted to by

THE HEARTLESS WITCH-FINDER.

The Salemites believed that it was impossible to drown a witch—that if thrown into a river she would certainly be able to make her way to the shore. Acting upon this belief, when a woman was suspected of Witchcraft, she would be compelled to undergo the WITCH-FINDER'S DROWNING TEST.

She would be dragged to the nearest river, and plunged in at a considerable distance from the shore. In case the woman succeeded for a time in keeping her head above the surface of the water, that was considered positive evidence that she was a Witch, and she would be stoned to death as she struggled with the remorseless waves. In this test the only proof of the woman's innocence of Witchcraft was when she could not swim, and therefore sank to rise no more. Innocent or guilty, it was death in either case! By drowning she proved herself innocent; but if it appeared probable that she could save her life by swimming, she was stoned like a cat until she drowned.

Even cruelty more atrocious than this was put in practice by

THE WITCH-FINDER.

Private quarrels and ancient grudges were avenged by accusing innocent people of Witchcraft. Young wives were ruthlessly torn from loving husbands, accused before the gaping, ignorant, and superstitious populace,

BRANDED AS WITCHES, and after being marched through the town, that every body might look their last upon the

FEMALE DEMONS,

the terrified women were given over to the villainous wretches who had achieved notoriety as

WITCH-FINDERS.

The remarkable story which is soon to appear in

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY,

is a reliable exposé of the atrocities enacted in the DAYS OF SALEM WITCHCRAFT.

The tale is founded on authentic records and data, and is entitled

THE WITCH-FINDER;
or,
THE HUNTED MAID OF SALEM.

The plot of the story is original, although it has for its basis an accurate account of the cruelties that were perpetrated during the period of

SALEM WITCHCRAFT.

Among the principal characters portrayed in this exciting story is

THE WITCH-HUNTER.

The most disreputable person in Salem, at the time of the Witchcraft excitement, was a man named BOARDBUSH, who had achieved a devilish notoriety as a Volunteer Accuser, a Witch-Tester, or Witch-Discoverer. This heartless miscreant practiced various juggleries, under pretense of distinguishing a witch from an innocent person, such as drawing blood, saying the Lord's Prayer backward, &c.

THE HUNTED MAIDEN.

Another interesting personage of those times was HESTER WAYBROOK, the daughter of a colonial merchant—a beautiful and noble-hearted girl, whom the villain BOARDBUSH persecuted with his attentions, and afterward hunted as a Witch.

THE WHITE ANGEL OF SALEM.

A third and most remarkable personage of those dark days was a mysterious being who appeared in Salem when the delusion was deepest. She possessed the aspect of a young lady; but a strange peculiarity was noticed in her appearance—she was strangely white, and her skin shone so brilliantly that many supposed her to be an angel. She went about doing good, opposing the Witch-Hunters, releasing prisoners, helping widows and orphans, &c.

Whoever would have full particulars concerning these and a score of other inhabitants of Salem in the days of Witchcraft, must read the thrilling and beautiful narration just drawn from the historical collections of Massachusetts, and entitled

or,

THE HUNTED MAID OF SALEM,

BY

LEON LEWIS,

which will be commenced in No. 16 of

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY.

The great success of the NEW YORK WEEKLY is in a measure due to the scrutiny exercised in compiling the contents, so that the slightest offensive word or passage may be avoided. Heads of families, fully aware that we expunge from our manuscripts every expression that might contaminate the young, present to their wives and children, fully confident that its teachings will have a beneficial effect, and that its stories, while they inculcate good morals, also exhibit the punishment that must attend vice.

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY

The contents of

are varied to suit the popular taste; they are instructive, entertaining, and amusing. The thoughtful will find in subjects that will induce reflection; the knowledge-seeker will be edified, and will learn the social habits peculiar to various parts of the world; while the humorously inclined can always find in the quaint writings of JOSH BILLINGS, PHILANDER DOESTICKS, MARK TWAIN, JOHN QUILL, and other humorists, something that will provoke merriment and laughter.

As we have not space to particularize at great length the numerous features of THE NEW YORK WEEKLY, we will just mention some of the standing attractions:

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.—A department in which the editor indulges in familiar chat with his correspondents, replies to various queries put to him, and disseminates information that is of the greatest popular interest.

THE KNOWLEDGE BOX.—In this column will be found Domestic Receipts, Scientific Notes, Hints to Farmers and Gardeners: in fact, suggestions that will prove useful to all classes of society.

ITEMS OF INTEREST.—The important events of the world are epitomized in this column, and their essence given in pithy sentences.

PLEASANT PARAGRAPHS.—This department is entirely devoted to articles of a humorous nature, and it forms an excellent dessert to the mental feast which the columns of the NEW YORK WEEKLY contains every week.

The above are the regular departments of

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY,

besides which we have

SKETCHES OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

LOVE SKETCHES,

SKETCHES OF ADVENTURE,

SKETCHES OF BORDER LIFE,

SEA SKETCHES.

With such attractions, who can wonder that

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY

is considered

THE BEST LITERARY PAPER PUBLISHED?

IT SHOULD BE BORNE IN MIND THAT IN No. 16 OF THE NEW YORK WEEKLY WILL BE COMMENCED "THE WITCH-FINDER; OR, THE HUNTED MAID OF SALEM." THE NEW YORK WEEKLY IS FOR SALE BY EVERY NEWS AGENT. PRICE SIX CENTS PER COPY.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to us.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

BOGUS OR IMITATIONS.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

EVENING DRESSES.

Low corsage and short sleeves. Bertha cut in points and trimmed with piping and silk fringe to match the fourreau. Frill of lace round the neck of the corsage. Hair adorned with white roses.

skirt of white silk, trimmed with satin piping. Low corsage and short sleeves. Under-waist of puffed lace. Hair trimmed with a wreath of lily of the valley. Chignon of long curls.

tulle, trimmed with fringe, and confined by rings. Low corsage and short sleeves. Low necked puffed lace under-waist. Bretelles of the same material as the corsage, with ends crossing each other on the shoulder, through a ring, and trimmed with fringe. Similar ends ornament the front of the corsage.

LITTLE KATE.

SOFT blue eyes, and nut-brown hair,
Kissed by the wind to wave and curl,
A dimpled cheek, and forehead fair,
Has little Katie, an orphan girl.

She chose a seat close to my own,
"For I've none to love," said she, "but you.
The rest have mothers, but I have none.
Let me sit beside you, teacher—do?"

And I, of course, could not say nay
To a lonely little orphan child.
So at my side I bid her stay,
And oh, how sweetly my Katie smiled!

And every day she closer creeps,
Until she touches my easy chair;
And in my book she slyly peeps,
To see if her name for bad be there.

And if it is, a sober shade
Steals quickly over her cheek and brow,
And with her hands together laid,
She softly says, "I'm a good girl now."

My love for her I can not tell,
My love is perfect for Little Kate,
E'en though at times she fails to spell,
Or drops on the floor her noisy slate.

I know how soon the tears would come
In her loving eyes if I should chide
At blotted page or careless sum!
And when my patience is sorely tried,

I think of Him who lived of old—
How He took in His arms each little child.
From age to age the tale is told,
How He spoke to all in accents mild,

"Oh! let them come—forbid them not."
Precious command by the dear Lord given.
I bless His name, that in my lot
I teach the children—of such is heaven.

RUNNING DOWN.

RUNNING DOWN is an expressive phrase, much used by physicians, and one which they have frequent occasion to apply to the men and women of modern life. It is used ordinarily to describe a deterioration of health where positive disease, though imminent, does not yet exist. By "running down" is meant that the springs of life are giving way under a too prolonged tension and a forced and perverted service.

The experienced medical eye detects in the victims of the excessive excitement and overwork which seem inseparable from our civilization indications of vital derangement, long before this finds utterance in serious complaint. The physician remarks the meagre frame becoming daily more tenuous, the face "pinched, complexionless," and shriveled, the unsteady eye, the spasmodic knitting of the brow, the tremulousness of the lip, the restless movement and feverishness of the whole body, and an artificial strength which does not indicate an innate vigor, but a weakness aroused by excitement to irregular effort. In addition to these physical indications he observes a want of mental repose, an irritable temper, and a capricious eagerness for excitement of all kinds. These are to him clear proofs of a nervous system inordinately agitated, which has already seriously deranged the vital functions, and will, if not quieted, soon pervert and arrest them, causing disease and death. Men and women are both equally liable—the former from overwork in business, and a too exclusive and eager pursuit of gain, and the latter from too much devotion to household duty, prolonged nursing, confinement at home, or excessive indulgence in fashionable dissipation. Both also become similarly affected from the immoderate use of artificial stimulants, not only of wine and spirits, but opium and such medicaments as ether and chloroform, which are more generally taken than is suspected.

The victim as yet is hardly conscious of any derangement of his health. He is certainly not well, but he does not consider himself ill. He feels what the French call malaise, a sense of uneasiness, and what he himself vaguely terms nervousness. This, however, is at first only experienced during his rare moments of repose. Excitement makes him either forgetful of or insensible to it.

This condition of the human body is full of danger. When the nervous system is thus evidently overtaxed, it loses the vigor necessary to resist the impression of the multifarious agents of disease. The body not only becomes an easy prey to any prevailing epidemic, but is endangered by every change of temperature or diet. This state of the nervous system, moreover, is the preliminary stage of dyspepsia, hysteria, paralysis, softening of the brain, insanity, and those other diseases the frequency of which is distinctive of our modern civilization.

For those who are thus affected there is but one escape from danger, and that is by fleeing the cause. Whatever may be the excitement, whether of business or pleasure, it must be at once abandoned. Unfortunately the subjects of this disorder in the beginning suffer so little, and find it so easy to obtain immediate relief that they are almost indifferent to its existence. They must not, however, wait to be driven by the goad of acute pain to take the path of safety, for that may not be applied until it be too late, and delay in these nervous affections is especially dangerous. The ordinary means resorted to for relief, and which consist of stimulants, give but temporary ease, and finally aggravate the disease, for though they first excite and supply an artificial strength, they subsequently depress and weaken. Their use, moreover, by persons with their nervous system thus disordered is, unless carefully guarded by prudence, almost certain to lead to a habit of drunkenness. Medical men have at last become so conscious of this fact that, while they reproach themselves for a too profuse administration of stimulants in the past, they have determined to be more sparing in the future.

When the cause which produced the disease is once removed the cure is easy. The patient must fortify his physical health by outdoor exercise and a nutritious diet, and give a wholesome tone to his nervous system by such occupations and amusements as gently enliven the mind without unduly exciting it. Travel, with its ever-recurring novelties and distractions, is of all remedies the most effective.

HARDENED AGAINST PERILS.

THE public mind is intolerant of satiety. It soon bristles up even against its semblance. And editors know this very well, and are wisely particular to avoid the ding-dong style of modern persistence. Milton gives us a capital example for imitation when he says:

"But thy words, with grace divine Imbued, bring to their sweetness no satiety."

The perils of our condition in this country have been so often and so vigorously handled by press and pulpit that we are tempted to ask, "Why is so little effect visible?" Extravagance is not frightened into sober thoughtfulness, and recklessness drives as full a head of steam as ever. High living is still an epidemic. Imaginary wants and ideal luxuries, the veriest fictions of fugitive caprice, are so clamorous for gratification that they can hardly be appeased. All this, too, is in the face of immediate danger. The signs of the times are laughed at. "On with the dance!" drowns every other cry. The "handwriting on the wall" has no alarm for our iron nerves, and we sneer at those who, like the old king, are smitten with shuddering at their impending doom.

Doubtless we are prone to a lavish use of hyperboles. This miserable habit has so blunted the sensibilities of our people that a really earnest appeal in forewarning us of peril is instantly set down to the credit of ambitious rhetoric. But allowing for this, the genuine instincts of the heart are not dead; all classes of society know their interests as well as they ever did; calamity and disaster have lost none of their horrors, nor is the imagination less keen to apprehend coming ills. And yet, in the presence of the sternest facts, men and women refuse to see the crisis which hangs over us, and which, if delayed, is only accumulating a heavier store of evil to burst upon our heads.

Whatever explanation may be given of this anomaly, it is evident that we have an overweening confidence in ourselves and in our resources. Success—such success as we have enjoyed—success that has apparently set aside some of the recognized laws of political economy—has quite inflated us with the idea that we are competent to bear any amount of strain. If disease is assailing our vitals, what of that so long as the constitution is robust? The real danger lies just here. So far from our prosperity enabling us to defy the laws that determine sound social health and security, that very prosperity has put us more completely under the regulation of these laws and rendered us more rigidly amenable to the destiny they ordain. If we have multiplied our industry, have we not equally multiplied our risks? and if we have extended our interests until they are complicated with the whole business-world, so that indeed there is not a climate nor a soil in any latitude or under any sky which is not a party to our fortunes; if such are our connections and such our liabilities, can we afford to indulge in this silly bombast about our strength and capacity when we were never so much at the mercy of circumstances? It is bad enough to have our carrying-trade so largely reduced; to be depressed by the failure of the cotton crop to do more than pay the cost of production; to be left to a currency that rests on the contingencies of wind and weather; but the worst of all is the indifference we evince to these portentous facts, and the stolid skepticism with which we mock at the approach of a day of reckoning.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Mrs. Grundy.

MY DEAR MRS. GRUNDY,—I do not know what you will say upon receiving a letter from me, and, if it were courteous, I should say that I do not care. A quiet person who goes up and down in the world as I do, making his little comments upon manners, ought not to be able to excuse himself to himself if he did not say a word to you or of you. And as I have sometimes spoken of you pretty severely—I did so last week at the Abyssinian ambassador's in Washington, for instance—I am perfectly willing to speak to you. Now, my dear Madame, it is useless to deny your position—and your influence. I might as well question the rank and influence of Queen Victoria. And yet I defy you or any of your court ever to display so simple, and sweet, and lovely a domestic character as that lady reveals in her recently published journal of her vacations in the Highlands.

No; nobody who visits among the nobility, or who has distant glimpses of them—like your present correspondent—would even presume to deny that Semiramis did not rule so despotically as you. I say nobility—you will observe—and I say precisely what those of whom I speak secretly feel. No newly-rich lady in London ever sighed and struggled more to enter titled doors than good innocent fools strain and puff to enter a certain circle nearer home. Do you suppose that circle doesn't know it, and smile at it loftily? And what a goal to be sure! Can any sensible human being imagine any thing more amusing than a serious wish to be invited to those ponderous dinners of Mrs. Pound and Mrs. Hundredweight? They are the very ideal of dullness. I do not believe that the higher circles of any city at any period ever furnished a more prodigious example of oppressively solemn stupidity. They are dinners in twelve courses and four hours. They are feasts from which every element that redeems feasting is eliminated. And yet poor little Mrs. Ounce is ceaselessly unhappy, and is fast driving Ounce to his club and to somewhere else, because she can not, by any arts or by any expense, contrive to be invited to Mrs. Pound's.

Now, who is to blame for her silly unhappiness and for the tragedy which I plainly see is coming—for Ounce is forced to spend more than his income, and his home is virtually ruined? You, Mrs. Grundy, and nobody but you. Upon your head will rest the responsibility for all the sorrow that impends over that household that ought to be so tranquil and so happy. It is you who confer nobility upon the Pounds and the Hundredweights. For, good Heaven! who are they? In what manner do they differ from Ounce, that the silly little woman should break her heart with despair of their dinners? They don't differ at all. I can remember old Grandfather Pound perfectly well: a coarse, shrewd man, who began with nothing, saved his cigars, and made money. The family arms is a gold eagle, the crest is a dollar. You can not make any thing more of it. In my grandfather's time—he was a shoemaker—Grandpa Pound sold a pennyworth of snuff over his small counter, and I hope he did it honestly. But that is the whole history. The ponderous Pound dinners came out of old Pound's snuffbox. Scratch a Russian, and you find a Cossack. Scratch one of those banquets, to partake of which little Mrs. Ounce is murdering her husband, and you will find Maccaboy. Is that a thing to sigh and toil your life away for? And she does it in obedience to you, Mrs. Grundy. She hears you say and say again that it is the thing of things to dine at the Pounds or at the Hundredweights—and their story is the same, only it is hats instead of snuff—and because you say it she believes it, and all the rest follows.

What is the rest? Why, Madame, you ought to know better than I. Ounce, after a hard, exciting day down town, comes home to dinner and to rest. He has a family—a wife and child whom he dearly loves—at least he certainly dearly loves the child. He is tired; he wants relaxation and repose. No; Mrs. Ounce informs him that he is to go at half past ten to Mrs. Tilbury's in full dress. She disappears as soon as dinner is over to prepare. The boy—he is only three—must go to bed. Ounce takes a nap, to be able to endure the ordeal. At nine, or after, drowsy and cross, he goes up to dress; at the appointed hour he follows his wife into the carriage; cowers in a corner lest he should tumble her dress; reaches the Tilburys', pulls on his gloves; bows and smiles at the hostess; sees his wife whirling for a couple of hours in the embrace of Zany and all the rest of them; stands and strolls and sits about while she dances the German until three; goes home with a wife horribly out of temper because Miss Nugget has a new set of amethysts while she had to wear the old turquoises; and at seven in the morning must be stirring to eat a solitary breakfast, and be down at work again in reasonable season.

And all this tomfoolery because you gravely say that this is the thing to do! Yet neither I nor any body else ever heard you say that any generous or noble thing was to be done. On the contrary, I have known a lovely girl—I have no hesitation in naming her; it was Lily Agnus—standing at the window and seeing a poor little child crying with cold and hunger in the pitiless weather, and on the way to the door to go out and speak to her and comfort her, arrested by her governess, or even by her mother, with the question, "My dear, what would Mrs. Grundy say?" For my part I really don't know and I don't care, Madame, what you would say. But I know very well what I should say to you—and it would be something that you are not used to hear.

For who are you, after all, who sit, the superb tyrant of man and woman in society? Life is a perpetual masquerade to you; but an old observer learns to detect your disguises. When I hear somebody whisper, "What do they say about Tom's engagement to Mary?" I know you. You are an old mole, Madame, if you will allow me, and you work in the ground very fast. "They" is only one of your vague masks. The questioner means you, and he is anxious to know your opinion. Or a mother says to her daughter, "What will people think if you drive out with Charles Edward?" She is merely asking what Mrs. Grundy says about it. "People" is a very diffusive name for you. And your influence in this direction extends very much farther than I used to suppose, for you have acquired an extraordinary power even over the politicians.

Why, Madame, I fancy that I tell you no secret when I say that there are a great many members of Congress even who think of you and you only by day and by night; who make speeches and motions with a sole view to your hearing and your approval, and who are always painfully wondering whether Mrs. Grundy smiles or frowns. When the Honorable Boreas Horn—I think you know him very well—exhibits his daring act of the flight upon the back of the eagle, or his other pleasing moral performance of ascending amidst fire-works to the capital of some one of the lofty columns of the great temple of our liberties; or when the same gentleman defies effete despotisms and hurls proud scorn upon the catiff minions of foreign power—as Elizabeth did at Parma and at Spain—does the honorable gentleman imagine that the exhibition is not understood? Does he suppose that we, quiet readers of the newspapers, are not perfectly aware that he is addressing Mrs. Grundy, and is only anxious to know what she says about it? There was one honest man who confessed it. He scorned to address his unfortunate fellow-members, and told them frankly that he was talking for Buncombe—which, for some reason, the politicians all suppose to be the name of your country residence. I am a pretty faithful reader of the debates, and as I see that so many honorable gentlemen do exactly what he did, I wish they had the honesty to say so.

Yet, Madame, although I have studied the matter faithfully, I have never been able to ascertain the reason of this absurd subservience to you and your supposed judgment. I am very sure that I never knew of any forlorn cause—and that is the test—which received your countenance. Church fairs—oh yes! You are a lady-patroness always. A popular charity—yes again. Mrs. Grundy always approves if Mrs. Pound and Mrs. Hundredweight are lady-managers. But the limits are very strict within which you confine your action, and whatever the occasion, it is never until it is what is called fashionable that your name appears, or that any body who is influenced by you takes an active or even nominal part. Madame, I say that the forlorn causes are the tests. When a king comes, crowned and em-purpled, and his Goldstick in waiting knocks at your door, who so profound in prostration, who so rosy with blushes of gratitude and delight as Mrs. Grundy? But when the beggar, the outcast, the pariah beseeches a shelter, whose eye so stony, whose heart so frozen, who so spectrally contemptuous as Mrs. Grundy?

Madame, some have entertained angels unaware; but who has not turned them away? Naked and hungry comes the Lord of Life, the outcast, the pariah, and it is you who feed him not, it is you who do not clothe him. But you go to the Pound dinners and the Hundredweight balls, and, mysterious Madame—for who of us all has ever seen you?—you sacrifice thousands of victims, body and soul. Here, in this city of New York, it is you, and you only, who persuade the young man with four thousand a year to spend six thousand. It is you, and you only, who carry his trembling fingers to the money safe, or who guide them in the false signature. It is you who pull the trigger that sends the ball into his brain, and you who ride with him handcuffed to the State prison. Woman, you make men moral, and social, and political cowards. You smile us into infamy—you cajole us into despair. Yet of all your victims not one has ever seen you, and not one who in his sensible moments does not despise you.

I will appeal to my young friends, and to certain older ones whom I know, and who go to the ponderous Heavyweight performances, and I will ask them if there is no way of throwing off your Circean spell; and if every body with less than ten thousand dollars a year is an impertinence in society. I know such people,

Mrs. Grundy—people who really do not care what you say, and whom even the Pounds can not patronize; and I give you fair notice that I shall write to them upon this very subject.

With due respect, Madame,
Your servant,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

IT is no longer necessary to go abroad in search of the beautiful and pure in plate and jewels. There are in our leading establishments experts and gentlemen of taste whose pleasure it is to develop the beauties of the precious gems submitted to them. They are artists and treat each stone individually, cutting and mounting every one in the most appropriate way, and they delight in producing sets of plate that are real works of art, by reason of their original and harmonious design and cunning workmanship.

Nor is it incumbent on the purchaser to select from the variety of specimens that are displayed ready-made. If there is any favorite idea that he wants carried out as a memorial of a dead friend, or a testimonial to a living one, let him but consult these connoisseurs, and their skill and inventive genius and correct taste are brought to bear in perfecting and enhancing the beauty of the design.

SILVER-WARE.

Antique styles are now in vogue. The choice lies between classical design of pure shape and simple outlines, the Egyptian severe and dignified, and Moorish fancies ornamented with arabesques of flat chasing.

A dinner and dessert service of solid silver has just been presented by Mr. Peabody to Cyrus W. Field, "in commemoration of an act of high commercial integrity." It consists of thirteen pieces, and is a combination of the Grecian and Egyptian styles. The epergne, or centre-piece, for fruit and flowers is lined with gold. The pedestal supporting the bowl is a statuette of the Genius of America, borne up by a globe on which the zodiac and stars are finely wrought. Medallion profiles of the donor and recipient of the gift ornament the sides of each piece. The English lion rampant serves as handles to the covers. The presentation inscription which we have quoted is engraved on each piece, together with the coat of arms—a hand bearing the globe aloft in the clouds—and the motto of the Field family—Sans Dieu Rien—Without God Nothing.

A breakfast service of solid silver made here and exhibited at the Paris Exposition has but five pieces—kettle with spirit-lamp, coffee-urn and tea-pot, cream-pitcher and sugar-basin. It is in the gorgeous Moorish style, and the arabesque chasing is wrought in the most exquisite manner. The price is $1600.

A tea and coffee service, weighing 100 ounces, is designed for a bridal present. The style is antique, with very little chasing. Another, valued at $1300, consists of eight pieces, among them a kettle, coffee-urn, chocolate-pot, and separate ones for black and green teas. Doves are billing on the covers, and a wreath of delicate tracery surrounds each piece.

An ice-bowl, highly polished, rests on a base of frosted silver that represents thick slabs of ice. Icicles surround the edge of the bowl. Polar bears clamber up the sides by way of handles, and Arctic scenes, Esquimaux, rein-deer, and skaters are engraven underneath. $400 is the price.

An immense cup, given to the victor at the Shanghai races in California, is valued at $3000. The handles are formed by winged figures crowning the victor. Medallions of groups of horses ornament the basin. Another cup, or goblet rather, with a cover, is for the first-born of the Class of '65 at West Point. The cup proper is a cannon-ball, of massive silver, highly polished, and without ornament, resting on a column formed of the insignia of the different corps—muskets and swords represent infantry, sabres for cavalry, cannon-swabs artillery, and pick-axe and spade the engineer corps. On the base is the motto "Es-sayons." Medallions of Venus, Cupid, Mars, and Minerva adorn the sides, and a cadet, armed cap-a-pie, stands sentinel on the top. The names of the class are engraved on the lid. The whole design is harmonious, and the workmanship is of rare beauty.

A costly epergne has lilies of engraved glass for holding flowers borne up by lily-leaves and stalk of frosted silver. At the foot of the pedestal is a statuette of Narcissus gazing upon himself in a mirror. Another centre-piece is intended for ices and bonbons. A large dish in the middle is surrounded by four smaller ones, all of which can be removed and used for other purposes. Still another has the massive Egyptian columns with head of the Sphinx on the base, and the pedestal of a fourth is a statuette of Meditation, a draped female figure, with the lace on her drapery most delicately traced.

A wine-pitcher and goblets are beautifully wrought in the style of Benvenuto Cellini. A Bacchus mounted on the handle pours the rich grape-juice from a ewer. A tripod of silver with a kettle and lamp for boiling an egg is called a bachelor's comfort. This one imitates the large kettles used for boiling maple-sirup. Another has a tea-kettle. Price $150.

A punch-bowl lined with gold is adorned with tracery representing a Bacchanalian procession and dance. A salad and oyster dish has medallions of Neptune with flowing beard inside the bowl, mermaids for handles, and fork and spoon like the sea-king's trident. On a cake-stand is a knife with a tiny saw on one side for icing; strawberries ornament the cover of a berry-bowl, salvers for cold relishes are provided with claw-like fork and spoon, and fishes are accurately represented on sardine-boxes.

Walnut cases cushioned with blue satin contain complete table outfits of forks, spoons, etc. There are ladles and cream-spoons, table, dessert, and tea spoons, large and small forks and dessert-knives. These are in several different styles—the Ionic, the Pompeian, the Grecian, and the Knickerbocker, the last of which is either perfectly plain, or with an engraved border and monogram.

Besides all these there are tête-à-tête sets for bridal presents, pitchers and salvers, wine-decanter and wine-coolers, tureens and urns, and vases for a single flower or for many, butter-dishes with knives notched to catch in the plate, goblets of pure gold, a stork with long bill for sugar-tongs, and table-bells of frosted silver and musical tone with Flora or Bacchus for handle, and many more useful and beautiful things in great variety and of most tasteful designs.

A word of advice given us by one of our first-class silversmiths may be of use to our readers. To clean silver the best plan is to dip it in boiling hot water, and wipe immediately with a soft cotton cloth; then polish with chamois skin. Linen rags and the whiting used for cleaning silver are both objectionable.

AMONG THE JEWELS.

The display of diamonds at the jeweler's is now more magnificent than it was during the holidays. A single case at one house contains $150,000 worth of these glittering gems. One set, costing $50,000, is made up of large stones of marvelous brilliancy; the oval pendants in the ear-drops are of extraordinary size, and the necklace contains some very large stones, graduating smaller toward the back. A solitaire ring at another house, valued at $10,000, is set in a massive gold hoop. A brooch and ear-drops is worth $14,000. The brooch is a cross formed by six large diamonds set in silver. The cutting and mounting of this set is most beautiful. A wonderful effulgence of light streams forth as if from a mountain of fire. The setting is of silver, simple and pure, without effort to display the beauty of stones that are able to rest upon their own merits. A necklace for $10,000 is mounted in the graceful fashion known among the craft as knife-edge setting. The diamonds are suspended on golden filaments, very strong, yet slender as a hair, and almost invisible, and the stones seem to rest on the flesh without support. A brooch made up of small diamonds represents a feather; another is a bird of paradise with rubies and emeralds in the gorgeous plumage. A humming-bird and butterfly, withopal wings and ruby and emerald eyes, are among the ornaments for the hair.

There are quaint barbaric designs, a Moorish set with long, square pendants constantly in motion, stars with ruby centres flashing forth a blaze of light, crescents with pendants in the Byzantine style, and doves, insects, and other emblems. One most exquisite brooch, at $245, is a flower-cup inclosing a circle of diamonds quivering about an opal of such varied colors that all the beauties of the rainbow seem imprisoned within it. This perfect stone is one of the Hungarian opals, a firm stone that does not fade like those brought from Honduras. Neither is it affected by the atmosphere of the body and by electricity. It is a fact that the South American opal will change its color, growing paler or more brilliant according as the wearer is excited or depressed, and this it is that has given rise to the superstition connected with these beautiful gems. We have already mentioned the chrysoprase; this beautiful stone, of an exquisite apple-green tint, is destined to great popularity. It is a species of chalcedony, nearly as hard as flint, and of Eastern origin, being one of the twelve stones of the Temple mentioned in the Apocalypse.

LAPIS LAZULI AND CAMEOS.

Lapis lazuli is a dark mazarine blue stone, rich and smooth like velvet. It is found in Persia, and is most rare and beautiful when impregnated with gold or silver. A choice set has a diamond marguerite incrusting the brooch and earrings, and is mounted in solid Etruscan gold. The price is $325.

Among the cameos we were especially pleased with a set of opals—pin, earrings, and buttons—a different Greek profile on each, surrounded with diamonds. Price $1400. On a Siberian topaz of rare size was cut a full face and bust of Cleopatra. Another in glazed jasper was a turbaned head, grave and majestic, in an enameled border. An emerald sphinx displayed a tiara and necklace of tiny diamonds. The setting was a gold and white enameled rope with diamond drops of water dripping from the ends. There were heads in chalcedony, and rare intaglios, and mythological subjects in sardonyx. One set, most beautifully carved, represented Orpheus searching for Eurydice, a lyre in one hand and a torch in the other.

MOSAICS AND ENAMEL.

A case of jewels just received from Geneva contains a Byzantine mosaic set in the Egyptian style, with hieroglyphics and symbols of faith, swans, pea-fowls, and bees.

An antique set of enamel, the subject virgin priestesses at the altar of Vesta, with diamonds and pearls incrusting, was set in Roman gold. Price $450. Another of black enamel and pearls and diamonds, suitable for half mourning, was in a light setting of frosted gold. $400.

In a third was a lovely face with diamond ornaments at the throat and in the hair—and the price only $130.

In the floral designs was a bunch of lilacs enameled on gold, with green leaves. A diamond dew-drop is in the centre of each flower. $500. Another was a cluster of violets with diamonds in the heart that vibrated with the slightest motion; and again there were tiny forget-me-nots in a souvenir pin.

For courtesies received we tender our thanks to Messrs. BALL & BLACK; TIFFANY & Co.; BROWNE & SPAULDING; and STARR & MARCUS.

PERSONAL.

LADY doctors are "coming in." Doctors ELIZABETH and EMMA BLACKWELL have a large practice in this city, as have Dr. HAYDON and Dr. LOZIER. In Philadelphia six ladies who practice medicine have incomes ranging from $3000 to $10,000. The highest income in New York of a lady doctor is $15,000. In Boston, Dr. ZAKRZEWSKA has a large and lucrative practice, keeps her carriage, and owns real estate. There are female doctors of note in Utica, Rochester, Elmira, and Milwaukee. In 1866 eighteen female students attended medical lectures at Bellevue Hospital.

The first London edition, 150,000 copies, of the Queen's last book was soon exhausted, although the price was about $5 50, greenbacks. Her copyright brought her about $50,000, gold. Her Majesty's private fortune is said to be some $25,000,000, or about half as much as Mr. ASTOR'S. The Queen has gained this year about 20 pounds avoirdupois.

At one of the late receptions of General and Mrs. DIX, crowded by the celebrities of the great world, the Etoile du Nord, as she is called (Mrs. RONALDS), was not only beautiful in a dress of cloudy tulle, starred with gold, but sang most exquisitely. Miss DIX, in white satin, the Misses BECKWITH, Miss LIPPINCOTT (the great Philadelphia heiress), the Turkish Ambassador, General and Madame MUSSALI, the latter wearing jewels of great splendor, Prince DE SAGAN, GUSTAVE DORE, Count OBRESKOFF, and other stars of the diplomatic world were there.

Mr. WILLIAM S. ANDREWS is the first member of the theatrical profession who has been elected a member of the Legislature of this State. He represents one of the Brooklyn districts; served in the army for three years; was nominated by the soldiers and endorsed by the Democrats. He played at the Winter Garden with BOOTH, and had in him the makings of a good actor.

The Rev. Dr. A. A. WILLETS is lecturing in Washington on "The Model Wife," who is said to resemble the "Steam Man"—stays at home and does all the work for a family of fifteen. It is esteemed a good lecture.

Mr. A. W. RICHMOND, of Dubuque, Iowa, eldest son of the late DEAN RICHMOND, has a coachman of the name of ARTHUR MAFIRY, who, with his sister, married to PAT SWEENEY, and an uncle, whose residence is unknown, have just had killed to them by an uncle in the Indies a fortune of $250,000 each. ARTHUR can now go over and get his money; come back and go to Congress.

NAPOLEON has accepted an invitation from the Sultan to visit Constantinople next summer. The Father of the Faithful liveth well and drinketh copiously of Champagne, albeit that fluid is forbidden in the Koran.

When the Empress CARLOTTA first heard of the execution of MAXIMILIAN she uttered a cry of anguish, which was immediately followed by a flood of tears. Then, resuming all the firmness of her character, she became calm. She observed that for some time past she suspected that a great calamity must have taken place.

Mr. W. D. HOWELLS pays a neat tribute to Mr. LONGFELLOW when he says that "his greatness has tended to the goodness and happiness of men in so potent and fine a degree that he has not only made the world wiser and pleasanter, but has not added a word's weight to the bitterness or evil of any soul in it."

Mr. MURDOCH, the celebrated elocutionist, who has been giving readings in New York, is said to be thinking of founding a school for actors. Mr. MURDOCH is an accomplished reader, and stands at the head of his profession, being the masculine, as FANNY KEMBLE is the feminine, reader par excellence.

Mr. J. ROSS BROWNE is quite likely to be Minister to China after all; for Mr. BURLINGAME is not only understood to have positively resigned, but is now on his way to this country, via San Francisco, accompanied by two Chinese officials and two interpreters, and after a short stay among us will visit the European treaty powers. Mr. BURLINGAME's thorough knowledge of Chinese matters has induced the oldest empire in the world to pay to the representative of the youngest nation the unprecedented compliment of selecting him as its ambassador.

Mr. EYTINGE, whose debut as a reader at Steinway Hall was so decided a success, is a brother of ROSE EYTINGE, the cleverest American actress now on the stage, and of SOL EYTINGE, one of the cleverest of our artists.

The Rev. Dr. BELLows describes the new Austrian Minister, VON BEUST, as an intelligent-looking man of fifty, with a very thoughtful, quiet air, a good German head, and bright hair and complexion. He shows no impatience or heat, and is clearly sobered by his situation. He is a Protestant and a North German, and as such in a strange and somewhat unnatural position. The Crown Prince of Saxony, who is a great friend of the Emperor, recommended him to the place he now holds. He is evidently doing his best to bring Austria up to the times, but he will have hard driving, and continual opposition from the hierarchy.

The young women of Paris are about to enjoy the privileges of the Sorbonne—a college for poor students founded in the twelfth century by ROBERT DE SORBONNE. Courses of instruction for women have been organized and are a great success. Nearly three hundred ladies attend the lectures, among whom are many members of high families, including two nieces of the Empress. The lectures at the Sorbonne are illustrated, when necessary, by physical apparatus of a costly nature and very magnificent description.

$250 per night, gold, is the sum divided between CHARLES DICKENS and WILKIE COLLINS by the performance of "No Thoroughfare" at the Adelphi Theatre, London. Mr. WEBSTER, the lessee, and Mr. FECHTER, the actor, share between them about as much more.

MARK TWAIN, the "drollist," as ARTEMUS WARD called him, has been placing himself right on the record so far as the fashions of Washington are concerned. The general style of apparel displayed by the "American fair" at a recent reception at General GRANT'S, is thus described: "The most fashionably dressed lady was Mrs. —."

She wore a pink satin dress, plain in front, but with a good deal of rake to it—to the train, I mean; it was said to be two or three yards long. One could see it creeping along the floor some little time after the woman was gone. Mrs. — wore also a white bodice, cut bias, with Pompadour sleeves, flounced with ruches;

low neck, with the inside handkerchief not visible. She had on a pearl necklace, which glistened lonely, high up in the midst of that barren waste of neck and shoulders. Her hair was frizzled into a tangled chapparral forward of her ears; aft it was drawn together and compactly bound and plaited into a stump like a pony's tail, and, furthermore, canted upward at a sharp angle, and ingeniously supported by a red velvet crupper, whose forward extremity was made fast with a half hitch around a hair-pin on her poop deck, which means, of course, the top of her head, if you do not understand fashion technicalities. Her whole top-hammer was neat and becoming. She had a beautiful complexion when she first came, but it faded out by degrees in the most unaccountable way. However, it was not lost for good. I found the most of it on my shoulder afterward. (I had been standing by the door when she had been squeezing in and out with the throng.)

It is stated as a simple matter of statistics that Mr. SYLVANUS COBB has written over fifty miles of stories for the New York Ledger.

TENNYSON is to have $10,000 for twelve poems in Good Words, which is $833 33 per poem. Such figures ought to bring good words, though we believe Mr. BRYANT was paid a higher rate by Mr. BONNER for one poem.

DUMAS is writing a novel called "Abraham Lincoln;" and a young woman, Miss VINNIE REAM, is at work on a statue of ditto (i. e., A. L.) in a basement room of the Capitol, which the Congressional saints have had fitted up for her studio.

Mr. AUGUSTUS DICKENS, who is said to have been the favorite brother of CHARLES DICKENS, died two or three years ago in Chicago. He was for some years a clerk in the office of the Illinois Central Railroad Company. Mrs. DICKENS, his widow, is keeping a boarding-house on North Clark Street, and by this means is barely able to support herself and children.

On the last representation of Traviata in Paris, PATTI wore, in the third act, a gala dress of white tulle bespangled with gold. In her ears she wore the diamonds given her by the Sultan; above her left temple the diamond and sapphire butterfly presented to her on New Year's Day; around her throat a necklace of gems; and on her finger a ring given as a souvenir from the Empress.

Mr. JOHN STUART MILL, the eminent political economist and member of Parliament, looks so slight and frail, his voice is so feeble, and requires so much attention, and his manner is so nervously rapid, that one feels at first alarmed lest he should suddenly break down. The impression is heightened by an odd habit of completely stopping at intervals of a moment or two, and putting his hands before his face to collect his thoughts. After listening for a time to the completely finished and connected sentences which come in a steady stream from his lips between these interruptions, we gradually recover confidence, but it is an exhibition never quite comfortable nor satisfactory.

The high church dignitaries of England are following the example of the late Chancellor, GLADSTONE, and are rushing into print. The Lord Bishop of Rochester has been extracting the moral of the funeral of ISAAC for the benefit of the People's Magazine; and the Dean of Canterbury, after discussing the character of TITUS, correcting the English version of the Second Epistle to Timothy, and publishing his New Year's sermon in the Sunday Magazine, has also written a charade for the Argosy.

PAULINE LUCCA, who shares with PATTI the first honors of the opera, is twenty-seven. She is the daughter of poor but respectable people; was a great pet with the musicians of Vienna, who devised the means for her musical education. She is spunky, too; for, when playing at Olmütz, she was insulted by a female artist in the theatre, upon which she informed the manager that unless she received an ample apology nothing should induce her to appear again at Olmütz. That gentleman having threatened her with imprisonment upon the terms of his contract if she persisted in her resolution, she deliberately walked to the citadel, gave herself up, and remained in durance for four-and-twenty hours. The commotion this conduct occasioned induced the manager to use his influence with the offending lady to submit to Mlle. LUCCA's demand. On leaving her prison she at once terminated her engagement at Olmütz, and proceeded to Prague, where, in March, 1860, she appeared as Valentine in the "Huguenots," and in "Norma," and at once secured the patronage of the Princess Colloredo, sister of the Governor, the Count Clam-Gallas, etc. Shortly before her appearance at Prague, MEYERBEER, who, as the Director of the Berlin Hof-opera Theatre, was at that time seeking for a prima donna competent to fill the part of the heroine in his last work, "L'Africaine," had his attention directed to this rising star. The youth and genius of the young artist, being just what MEYERBEER had long looked for in vain, induced him to secure her services for three years at Berlin, where he gave her the advantage of his advice and tuition. In November, 1865, she became the wife of Baron Von Rohden, but still continues to divide her time between the opera-houses at Berlin and London.

Those American young ladies who may be going to Paris this year should be posted about the young DUKE OF HAMILTON, who is looking about for a wife. Somebody who has been taking stock of him thinks, as we Yankees say, that he would boil down and "sugar off" at about five millions. His palace, about ten miles from Glasgow, is built of stone, is about 270 feet in length, and resembles in its general form one of the ancient temples of Jupiter in Rome. The interior is very magnificently furnished and decorated. One room contains 2000 paintings, many of them by celebrated artists. The principal staircase, leading up from the main entrance, is one of the finest in Europe, and its cost was $200,000. The grounds are extensive, and very beautifully laid out. In the midst of them is the family mausoleum, a magnificent palace tomb, and one of the most stately sepulchral monuments in the world. Its cost was half a million of dollars. The great bronze door leading into it is covered with striking symbolical representations in bas-relief, and was procured at an expense of $10,000. The Duke spends most of his time in London and on the Continent, especially in Paris, and some one of our belles may therefore be able to do the young man a kindness by going to church with him and saying something out of the Marriage Service.

Simulated Braided Trimming for Dresses, etc.

This trimming can be made either of ribbon or of bias folds of silk or satin. The original is of bias folds of green satin two and a half inches wide, the edges of which are laid over each other, as seen in the illustration. These folds are then laid in pleats, in the manner shown in the engraving, the black dotted line denoting the outer fold, and the white dotted line the inner fold. Lastly, the pleats are fastened from X to X and from O to O.

Cravat End with Rosette, in Worked Guipure.

A brown silk ribbon of two inches or more in width is ornamented at both ends with brown twisted silk, in worked guipure, and then finished by a fringe two inches wide, of the same silk. The accompanying illustration represents one end of the cravat, of the full size. The rosette is worked on a foundation of cardboard. Take for the middle bars four threads; that is, two bars of two threads each, crossing in the middle, and form a little wheel of plain stitches in the centre. These cross-bars are then worked in point de reprise. Make, then, without working, two diagonal bars, composed each of two threads crossing the central wheel. Now draw the thread twice around through the eight bars already formed, in order to form the middle circle of the rosette; work these in point de reprise, and finish this circle with scallops, as shown in the figure. After this, work the larger outside row, which borders the terminations of the central bars, and to which the last row of scallops is worked. In executing this the threads of the bars must of course be worked in in their proper places. The rosette can be completed without further description by reference to the pattern. Next carefully cut away the cardboard from the under side without cutting through the thread, and fasten the rosette from the wrong side to the stuff, which must be cut away as closely as possible. Lastly, tie in the fringe, as in the design. Each bunch of this consists of six threads, each four inches long, which are laid together at half their length.

Crochet Work-Basket.

MATERIALS: gray crochet cotton, floss silk, heavy silk cord, purple silk, and narrow silk cord of the same color.

This work-basket is crocheted in such a manner as to represent straw braiding. A bag of purple silk is fastened to the upper edge. Begin to work from the middle of the bottom. Make a chain of three stitches and form them into a round with one slip stitch.

CROCHET WORK-BASKET.

CRAVAT END WITH ROSETTE, IN WORKED GUIPURE.

Around this work ten rows in slip stitch, widening from time to time, so that the sixth row shall contain 24 stitches, and the 10th 48. The next row, in which the pattern begins, is worked without widening. Crochet one slip stitch in one stitch of the last row, and one single crochet stitch in one stitch of the 6th row; miss the next stitch of the next row; repeat. These long stitches have the appearance of a clasp over the four rows, and are known as a pattern row. After two rows of solid work this pattern row is always to be repeated. The long stitches of these rows must always come between two of the preceding row. Then come two rows of slip stitch, and each row must be increased 10 stitches, so that in the next pattern row between two long stitches two slip stitches may be worked. Then, again, six rows without widening. One row of solid work or slip stitches finishes the bottom of the basket. In working these solid rows, or slip stitch, the needle must be placed above the thread, inserted in the work, and pulled through both loops at once.

For the border of the basket continue working in the last row of the bottom. 1st row of the border—all slip stitch, take up the back part of the stitch of the preceding row. 2d row—all slip stitch. 3d row—pattern row, in which the long stitches must always clasp over all the rows of the border, and be attached to the stitch in the last row of the bottom. Now work 39 rows, every third one of which is to be a pattern row.

That the border may become a little fuller at the upper part, in the 15th and 33d of these 39 rows (and consequently in the 6th and 12th pattern rows of the border) it must be widened four times at regular intervals by crocheting in the marked places of the pattern row without missing the 1st stitch in the slip stitch that separates the long stitches in the preceding row.

In the 6th pattern row this widening is done every 5th stitch; in the 12th pattern row, after every 6th long stitch.

For the upper border work 1 row in double crochet in every stitch of the preceding row, 2 rows in slip stitch, 2 rows in single crochet, 2 rows slip stitch, 1 row of picots or little loops. For a picot make 3 chain, then 1 slip stitch in the 1st of the chain, then miss 1 of the former row.

For the handle of the basket make a chain of 90 stitches, and work on both sides 2 rows of single crochet, then 2 rows of slip stitch, and 1 row of picot like that of the border of the basket. For trimming the basket as well as the handle the heavy purple silk cord is used, which is bound to the basket by fine chain stitches of gray silk. The upper edge of the basket and the handle are also ornamented by point russe stitches of double purple floss silk. The design represents a part of the handle of full size. When the handle is attached to the basket, it must be covered where it is sewed on by a small rosette of purple silk, in the centre of which is another little rosette made of slip stitch and picot; the latter ornament has in the middle some loops of floss silk. Finally, sew on the upper edge of the basket a little bag of purple silk. The silk must be about four inches wide, and nine or ten inches long. Sew the ends together. Make a narrow hem on one side, and a wide one on the other; then make a shirr, and in it insert the cord or ribbon for drawing it up.

Writing Desk.

See illustration, page 292.

This is a novel style of writing desk. The under part is a flat box, opening like a drawer, and intended to contain writing materials. It is trimmed all round with a border in bead work, and on the top with brown leather. A piece of thin wood, lined and framed with leather, contains sheets of white paper, which can be drawn out from the top when written or drawn upon. On one side there is a small case for a pencil. This slab is raised by a wooden support, as reading desks generally are. The pattern is six inches long, and four and a half inches wide. An elastic band at the top of the stand serves to keep down the slab when not in use.

Jewelry Box.

See illustration, page 292.

MATERIALS: 2 glass plates, about 6 inches long and 4½ inches wide; 2 other plates, 6 inches long and 2 inches wide; 2 more plates, 4½ inches long and 2 inches wide; 4 yards of rose-colored ribbon, 2 inches wide; 2 yards of rose-colored ribbon, ½ inch wide; 1 oz. crystal bugles, ⅔ of an inch long; 5 bunches crystal beads; 2½ dozen cut crystal nail heads; rose-colored silk braid; 4 wooden button moulds, each 1½ inches in diameter; a piece of rose-colored silk, 9½ inches long and 6½ inches wide.

This little jewelry box is made of glass plates or panes, bordered with rose-colored silk, which serves to fasten them together. The trimming of the box consists of large and small crystal beads, ribbon rosettes, beads, bugle fringe, etc. The bottom of the box covers a cushion of rose-colored silk, which is filled with perfumed wadding.

In making this box the six plates of glass mentioned in the materials must be procured—get good, clear window glass. The panes intended for the bottom and cover are bound all around. Those intended for the sides of the box are bound only on the long sides. First cut the ribbon according to the required length and width of the sides, allowing for the fullness at the corners. The ribbon must be doubled in the middle over the glass. On one side sew the crystal beads, putting on two beads at every stitch. The ribbons intended for the bottom are not sewed with beads. The plates are all to be bound with this ribbon, which, as before remarked, must be of equal width on both sides; join it at the ends by sewing overhand; draw the ribbon very tight, so that the plates can not slip. The plate intended for the cover is covered with a network of crystal beads and pendants. To make this net commence on one of the long sides of the cover.

* put 10 crystal beads, 1 nail head, and 11 beads on the needle; then fasten the thread about an inch from the starting-point, carry the needle back through the last bead, and repeat from * to the end. Fasten the thread. The next row begins on the short side of the cover, an inch from the first loop: take up 10 beads, * put the thread through the nail head, 10 beads, repeat from *. All the other rows are made like this last one, so that the flat nail heads form regular shaped diamonds on the cover. In making the last row, which must correspond to the first, the bead must be attached to the ribbon of the long side. Now join the plates of glass together by sewing the ribbon of all the short sides overhand. The bottom must also be sewed at the corners, the cover only on the two corners of one long side; the seams are covered with a row of beads. The bugle fringe must now be made. For this purpose fasten the thread to the ribbon; take 6 beads, * 1 bugle, 5 beads, put the thread back through the bugle and through the last of the 6 stringed beads; take again 5 beads on the thread, and fasten it at a distance of a full inch to the ribbon; put the thread back through the last bead, take 5 beads on the thread, and repeat from * to the end.

The rosettes on the cover are each about 2 inches in diameter. Take a piece of narrow ribbon, 18 inches long; this is ornamented on one side with 5 crystal beads, made into little loops, that is, each loop consists of 5 beads; the other edge of the ribbon is pleated on a card foundation, sewed around until there are 4 rows on the card; each rosette is finished in the middle with a nail head, surrounded by crystal beads.

The wooden button moulds, which serve as feet, are covered with cotton cloth. Each of these is divided into 10 equal divisions by the braid which is wound around them; they are then covered between the braids with as many beads as necessary. In doing this always put the needle under the braid, then either sew the feet to the bottom or paste them on with gum arabic. Fix on the cover a head loop for opening the box. Finish by making the little cushion of rose-colored silk and wadding; quilt in diamonds, and at every stitch place a bead. The outer border is surrounded with rows of beads.

Knitted Garter.

See illustration, page 292.

This garter is very flexible. It is knitted across, backward and forward, in white knitting yarn. Cast 25 stitches on a knitting needle not too fine, and knit 23 stitches plain. In the sixth round knit the first 3 stitches; then slip the next 5, allowing the thread to lie behind the stitches. Next follow 7 stitches knitted, 5 slipped, 3 knitted. In this manner knit 9 rows, taking care that the threads of the slipped stitches shall remain on the same side, and that the 7 stitches between the slipped stitches, and also the 3 stitches, at the beginning and end, appear entirely plain on one side, and entirely purled on the other. After these 10 rounds follow 5 plain rounds, etc. The knitting is by this means laid in regular waves. Cast off when the length has reached 19 waves. Finish on one side by a double linen end with button-hole, and on the other by a linen band, which is drawn through the button-hole.

Gentlemen's Knitted Jacket.

See illustration, page 292.

MATERIALS: 10½ oz. brown knitting wool; black woolen braid, half an inch wide.

This jacket is knitted of brown wool—the fronts crosswise, in a pattern figure, and the back lengthwise, in ordinary patent. The jacket is twenty-two inches long in front from the neck to the lower border, and seven inches wide from the arm-hole to the middle of the front. The back is 24 inches in length and 15 in breadth. Begin on the front border of the front, and cast on 188 stitches, knitting first 3 rounds in ordinary patent as follows: 1st round—Slip 1 stitch; * cast the thread around; slip 1 as if intending to purl; knit 1. Repeat from *. 2d and 3d rounds like the first, only knitting the stitch with the thread thrown over before it, and slipping the next stitch after having cast the thread around. With the 4th round begins the design, which is also knitted in patent, as follows: Slip the 1st stitch (3 stitches are required to form a rib—2 knitted stitches of the last round, and between these a stitch and the thread which was cast over in the last round). The 1st and 3d stitches are crossed behind the 2d stitch and the thread, in doing which the 3d stitch is first slipped; then the 2d stitch and thread knitted together; and last the 1st stitch slipped. Proceed as in ordinary patent. Continue in this manner to the end of the round, and knit the next round as in ordinary patent. The side on which the stitches are crossed is the right side of the work; the wrong side presents the appearance of ordinary patent. Knit 12 rounds in this manner, then follows the 2d stripe. Knit 3 rounds in common patent, then in the 4th round as follows: Slip the 1st stitch; * cast the thread around, slip 1; then knit of the following 3 stitches the 1st and 3d (this must still be the stitch and former thread) together as one stitch. The stitch between the 2 knitted ones is now slipped, after having first cast over the thread; then take on the needle the loop of the last round which lies between the stitch last slipped and the next stitch, and knit this as a stitch. Repeat from *. These 4 rounds are to be repeated twice. In working it will be necessary to pay attention to the right and wrong side of the work. The pocket-slit begins with the 2d stripe from the front border, and ends at the beginning of the last stripe. These two mentioned stripes are repeated twice. From the beginning of the work forward widen by 2 stitches at the end of every 2d round, for the neck, to the end of the 3d stripe; and from the 4th stripe forward narrow in the same proportion by knitting, in order to form the shoulder, 2 stitches together at the beginning and end of each round. After the last round cast off. The other front is knitted in the same manner, but of course in reversed order. For the back, which is begun on the under border, cast on 134 stitches, and knit 400 rounds without widening or narrowing; and further 40 rounds, narrowing at the beginning and end of each round. There are in all 27 stitches taken off, and at regular distances. Then cast off. The back and front are sewed together on the shoulder and under the arm, leaving slit, 5 inches long, for the arm-hole. For the sleeve, begin at the upper border and cast on 100 stitches. Knit 248 rounds in patent; then join into a round and knit for the wrist, with finer needles, 62 rounds, alternately 1 stitch knitted and 1 purled. Sew the sleeve together and set into the arm-hole. Then take up, on finer needles, the edge stitches on the front and upper border of the jacket, and knit 16 rounds, which must appear plain on the right side. In this make the button-holes in the left front. Then line this stripe on the under side with some black material. Bind the jacket, excepting the under border of the back, with woolen braid. Work the button-holes after having cut them in the lining also. The pocket-slits are bound with braid, and pockets set under. Lastly, sew on the buttons.

Crochet Lamp-Mat.

See illustration, page 293.

MATERIALS: Green twisted wool; green floss silk; green oil-cloth; pasteboard.

This lamp-mat is worked entirely in single crochet, with green twisted wool and floss silk, over a 3-thread foundation of the same twisted wool. It has somewhat the appearance of damask, which is obtained by here and there leaving the foundation thread without being worked over, thus allowing it to show on the right side. The stitches which cover the foundation are all worked with silk, and embrace, besides the foundation, 2 stitches which come together from the 2 rounds; these long silk stitches form the design visible on the pattern. Begin the mat in the centre, with green silk, by a foundation of 3 chain stitches; join these into a ring by a slip stitch, and work then 2 stitches in each stitch, so that this row counts 6 stitches. 2d round—Join now the foundation threads, * and work with silk 1 stitch around the next stitch of the last round, in doing which include the foundation threads; this stitch is however finished with the twisted wool, which is here joined, and with which the next stitch is worked in the same stitch of the last round, but without embracing the foundation threads; this last stitch is finished with silk. From * repeat 5 times, so that this round counts 12 stitches. It must be observed here that the woolen stitch is always worked in the upper part of the stitch of the last round without including the foundation threads, which must remain on the right side. Also, in changing from silk to wool, or vice versa, the last loop of each stitch must always be formed by the thread which is required for the stitch following. 3d round—* 1 silk stitch around the next silk stitch of the round before the last (1st); 2 woolen stitches in the next woolen stitch of the last round. From * repeat 5 times. 4th round—1 silk stitch around the next silk stitch of the round before the last (2d); 3 woolen stitches in the next 2 woolen stitches of the last round. From * repeat 5 times. 5th round—1 silk stitch around the next silk stitch of the round before the last (3d); 4 woolen stitches in the next 3 woolen stitches of the last round. From * repeat 5 times. 6th round—* 1 silk stitch around the next silk stitch of the round before the last (4th); 5 woolen stitches in the next 4 woolen stitches of the last round. From * repeat 5 times. 7th round—* 1 silk stitch around the woolen stitch of the 5th and 6th rounds which lies immediately before the next silk stitch of the last round; 1 woolen stitch around the upper part of the silk stitch before mentioned; 1 silk stitch around the woolen stitch of the 5th and 6th rounds which lies immediately after the silk stitch of the last round; 5 woolen stitches in the next 3 woolen stitches. Repeat from *. 8th round—1 silk stitch around the woolen stitch of the 6th and 7th rounds which lies immediately before the next silk stitch; 1 woolen stitch in the upper part of the stitch before mentioned; 1 silk stitch around the next woolen stitch of the 6th and 7th rounds; 1 woolen stitch around the upper part of the next silk stitch of the last round; 1 silk stitch around the woolen stitch of the 6th and 7th rounds which follows immediately after the silk stitch; 5 woolen stitches in the 3 following stitches of the last round. Repeat from *. Finish according to pattern.

Widen in every round in the proportion given above, in order that the under part may not be stretched. When the mat has reached the requisite size—the pattern is about 7 inches in diameter, and line the back with oil-cloth; after which finish by a crochet border of the green twisted wool and floss silk. For this lay on a foundation chain corresponding to the circumference of the mat; join this by a slip stitch and work as follows: 1st round—with wool, 1 single crochet in every foundation stitch; in every 5th stitch 1 silk stitch in addition to the woolen one. This silk stitch must embrace the foundation thread. 2d round—5 single crochet of wool in the next 5 woolen stitches of the last round; then with silk, and over the foundation thread, 2 single crochet, separated by 1 chain stitch, in the foundation stitch in which the next silk of the last round is worked; 5 single crochet, with wool, in the next 5 woolen stitches of the last round; 1 single crochet, with silk, around the upper part of the next silk stitch of the last round. Repeat from *. The pattern shows how to finish the border. In order to form the scallops it will be necessary to widen, which must be done in the middle of the gore-like figures.

The last 2 rounds of the border should be worked with silk; the one next to the last in single crochet, as shown in the pattern. The last round is composed of little waves, alternately 5 chain stitches and 1 single crochet around every 3d stitch of the last round. The border is sewed around the mat. In order to make the scallops lie regularly fasten a fine green cord on the under side of them, and crochet over it in single crochet.

Two Crochet Rosettes.

See illustration, page 293.

FIRST ROSETTE.—The original is worked in corded crochet cotton, the centre piece being executed in lace stitch with finer thread. Begin the rosette with the central row, and work as follows: 1st round—* 2 ch. (chain stitches); 1 p. (picot) downward—this kind of p. is formed by making 4 ch., taking the needle out of the stitch, inserting it in the 1st of the 4 ch., again taking up the dropped stitch, and drawing a loop through both on the needle. Repeat 16 times from ; then 1 sc. (single crochet) in the 1st ch. of this round, by which it becomes joined in a ring. The picots must all be pointed inward. 2d round— 1 sc. in the next stitch; 2 sc. in the following stitch of the last round. From * repeat in the round so that this round counts 67 sc. 3d round—1 sc. in the 1st stitch of the last round; 4 ch., 1 sc. in the same stitch of the last round; * 3 sc. in the next 3 stitches; 4 ch., 1 sc. in the same stitch in which the last of the 3 sc. was worked; 2 sc. in the next 2 stitches; 4 ch., 1 sc. in the same stitch in which the last of the 2 sc. was worked. From * repeat in the round, working only 3 sc. between the 4 ch. picots 3 times in succession toward the end of the round. The round must count 27 sc. The outer picot scallops of the rosette are worked by means of the description of the 2 following rounds. The leaves and twigs are worked in singly afterward. 4th round—1 sc. in the next p. of the last round. * 8 times alternately 2 ch., 1 p. downward; then 7 ch. and again 8 times alternately 1 p. downward; 2 ch.; then 1 sc. in the 4th following p. of the last round; 4 times alternately 2 ch., 1 p. downward; after this 7 times 3 ch., 1 p. downward; 3 ch.; 4 times 1 p. downward; 2 ch.; 1 sc. in the 5th following p. of the last round. From * repeat twice. 5th round—7 sl. in the 1st 7 stitches of the last round; the remainder entirely in sc.; but at the point of each scallop work 3 sc. in the middle stitch, and pass over the 7 stitches before and after the sc. of the last round. 6th round—pass over the 1st sc. of the last round; * 3 sc. in the next 3 stitches; 4 ch., 1 sc. in the same stitch in which the last of the 3 sc. was worked. From * repeat in the round, but pass over the first and last sc. of each scallop. Fasten the thread at the end of the round. Tie by means of an sc. to the middle p. of the 3 of the 3d round that were passed over by a scallop, and crochet 7 ch.; fasten this to the 3d downward p. on the right side of the scallop (take the needle out of the stitch and insert it in the p., then draw the stitch through this); then, returning on the 7 ch., 1 sc. (short double crochet); 5 dc. (double crochet); 1 sc., by which one leaf is formed; 1 sc. in the same p. of the 3d round in which the sl. was worked; 1 leaf like the former fastened to the corresponding p. on the left side of the scallop. The leaves can be finished by reference to the pattern; they are worked in every 2d scallop. In each of the untitled scallops work a twig in backward and forward rows of ch., sc., and dc.

SECOND ROSETTE.—This rosette is to be commenced in the centre. Make a foundation of 12 ch., join by a sl. On the ring thus formed crochet, as the 1st round, 24 sc. 2d round—* 3 sc. around the next 3 stitches (catching both the upper edges of the stitches), 24 ch., 1 tc. (treble crochet) in the 12th stitch from the beginning; 2 ch.; 1 tc. in the 3d following ch., 2 ch., 1 dc., 1 sc., always in the 3d following chain, and separated by 2 ch.; 2 ch.; 1 sc. in the same stitch in which the last sc. before the 24 ch. was worked. From * repeat 7 times, by which the 8 scallops are formed. 3d round—2 sc., around the 1st 2 sc. of the last round *; then 3 sc. around the next 2 ch.; 3 sc. on the chain stitches between each dc.; 24 sc. around the 12 ch. of a scallop; again 3 sc. around the ch. between each dc., and 3 sc. around the last 2 ch. of the scallop. From * repeat in the round and fasten the thread. 4th round—1 sc. in the 9th stitch of a scallop *; 14 times alternating 1 p. (picot, that is 5 ch., 1 sl. in the 1st ch.), 1 sc. in the 2d following stitch, passing over 1 stitch; then 2 ch., 1 sl. in the 9th stitch of the next scallop. From * repeat in the round, but join the 1st 2 picots of every scallop to the last 2 of the last scallop. Lastly crochet on the stitches of the 1st round a round composed of alternately 1 sl., 3 ch., in these passing over 1 stitch. In working the sl. insert the needle in the perpendicular row of stitches.

SOCIAL REFORM IN FRANCE.

FATHER HYACINTHE, of sensational sermon fame, has, after a long silence, again lifted up his clear, ringing voice in Notre Dame, and this time has not only startled Paris but very much shocked the Church. He has been preaching on "The Family," and his aim has been to awaken parents to a sense of their holy and inviolable obligations in the education of their families. This course of sermons seems to have been inspired by the educational reform now going on in France, by which the education of the females of the family is taken away from the nuns and other agents of the Church and committed, in part, to professors of the University. The support given by Father Hyacinthe to this scheme, which the Bishop of Orleans has violently denounced, has aroused the anger of the Church. Not content with doing this, Father Hyacinthe has also aroused the jealousy of the Church by praise of the Protestants, and particularly by contrasting French with foreign homes, much to the disadvantage of the former. He soars very high above the spirit that can see no good but in its own communion, and delights to recognize goodness wherever it is to be found, and hold it up to the admiration and the invitation of all. The example of England, Prussia, Norway, and other Protestant countries, he holds up to the admiration of his countrymen, as presenting a far better habit of family training than France, and manifesting its results in a purer sentiment, both religious and patriotic.

MOTHER ANITA.

NO long-robed abbess, moving with stately step among her nuns and novices—only the daughter of a poor Cape Cod fisherman was this "Mother Anita," whose little story I am going to tell you, translating it from the rough phrase of the rude but kindly people among whom I spent my last summer's vacation, into a few simple words of my own. I do not think that you will call it a sad story; it was not such to me, although I traced it backward from its closing chapter written on marble in the little graveyard:

MOTHER ANITA.

Ac. 20.

Not sad, since death, coming however early, can not mar the proportions of a beautiful life. The power of the iconoclast stops with outward form—the fair ideal remains for evermore a part of the world's incorruptible treasure.

Anita's sweet, foreign name suited her well. Perhaps its choice had been guided by some subtle mother instinct, springing, arbutus-like, out of the rough soil and amidst the stern snows of circumstance.

Her features were a rare study, combining the beauty and nameless grace for which we do not often look among those whose very life seems a continual war with hostile elements. But Nature, in touching the face of her child to a marvelous perfection, had acted in tender obedience to the great law of compensation traceable through all the works and ways of God—for Anita was hopelessly hunchbacked. Her deformity was the key to all her life. Doomed to a certain solitude and isolation from the work and play of her sturdy brothers and sisters, debarred from active participation in so many of their interests, the child was thoughtful and sensitive far beyond her years.

Some natures thus shut in by bodily infirmity have contracted upon themselves, like the old torture-chamber of the Inquisition. I shudder even now to recollect how once upon a solitary journey, as our stage-coach drove up to the lonely inn which marked a little country station, I saw, standing in the road-side with averted face, a small figure no taller than an ordinary child of five or six years old, but strangely broad-shouldered, I thought, for one so young; and as I still looked curiously it turned about with slow, defiant movement, and a woman's face gazed up at me, dark, bitter, despairing—the black eyes, under their heavy brows, full of the fierce fire which marked the gradual starvation of a soul!

Anita's face expressed a far different history. The sorrowful mystery of her lot sometimes weighed very heavily upon her, but could not shake her simple trust that God who made her remembered and loved her still. The rough fishermen, who often looked after her with tender whispers as she passed, felt perhaps that her brow grew saintly under its crown of suffering, although they would hardly have put the vague fancy in words.

The long, low reach of sandy coast, extending for many miles along the Cape, is always peculiarly dangerous for vessels disabled by a north-west gale; but the oldest sailors could remember no more fatal season than the fall and winter when Anita was eight years old. As many as twenty sail were known to go to pieces in a single dreadful day upon the bar outside the harbor of the little fishing village. There was no lack of brave hearts and willing hands to give aid, when aid was possible; but too often human strength and sympathy stood powerless on the shore and saw the pitiless surges engulf their victims, leaving no trace behind.

Sometimes an incoming wave, like some huge feline creature, would toss its helpless prey, in cruel sport, far up the sandy beach, and so it happened that one night a spar, with the form of a woman lashed upon it, was dropped at the very feet of Anita's father, sturdy John Grey. When the piece of sailcloth fastened about her was unwound, a child was found tightly clasped in the arms of the poor dead mother—a little boy perhaps of a year old. John Grey, feeling hastily for the little heart, thought he discerned some lingering thrill of life, and set off for his cottage at a swinging run, leaving his companions to follow more slowly with their sadder and heavier burden.

Anita, who had been standing at the window, straining her eyes into the darkness, and listening in awe-struck silence to the boom of the breakers and the rush and roar of the storm outside, met him at the door with outstretched arms, and a look which seemed to comprehend the situation in a moment. Scarce knowing why he did so, the fisherman laid the child in her arms. A wonderful light broke over her eager face.

"Oh, mother! mother! You can save him!" she cried.

The fisherman's wife, as was needful, was well versed in all the lore of restoratives, and before two hours had passed the poor little waif thus snatched out of the teeth of the sea slept peacefully in Anita's arms. A royal child he was, strong-limbed and beautiful, the blue net-work of veins showing with startling distinctness through the white, transparent skin of his temples. His little garments testified to the proud and tender care which had been taken of him; but nothing found upon him or his poor mother gave any clue to their identity. The sea kept its secret well, for no other token of the hapless wreck ever came to land.

"Well, mother," said John Grey's gruff but not unkindly voice, one day, "the little un must go to the Asylum, I s'pose?"

"I don't know," was his wife's hesitant answer, the universal mother tenderness looking through her eyes; "maybe we could keep it ourselves, John?"

"No!" was the decided reply. "No! the child'll be well took care of there, and you've got no extra pair o' hands for baby-tendin', let alone its bein' hard enough sometimes to put bread into the mouths of our own."

Anita rose up from her low seat by the fire, with the baby gathered close to her throbbing heart, and stood before her father. Some great change had come over her; for one brief moment the soul within seemed to wrest from an untoward fate the boon of erect grace for the childish, misshapen form. Two sparks like fire glowed in her eyes, and her lips were pressed tightly together.

"Anity! Bless me! what ails the child?"

"Father!" she said, pointing over her shoulder; "Father, I am not like other children. I never can do what they do, or have what they have. Sometimes I've thought I wasn't of any use. Give me the baby!"

The fisherman tried to draw her down upon his knee. There was a world of unspoken tenderness in the rough caress.

"Child," he said, "what could you do with it—a little thing like you?"

"Oh! I could take care of him—I know—I know I could!" she answered, her voice falling into a low recitative, the undertone of resistless emotion. "No one need mind him but me, and I would never, never be tired! Oh, father! father! God gave him to me out of the roaring seas—to me, father! You won't take him away?"

He drew his coarse sleeve across his eyes.

"What do you say, mother?"

His wife was weeping.

"Anity's a handy little thing, and powerful womanly for her age. I guess we might let her try, father."

The unnatural glow faded from the child's face, the little strained figure relaxed, and she sank down in her place, sobbing hysterically. As her tears fell on its forehead the babe turned uneasily; but at its first low moan Anita was quiet in an instant. A marvelous expression of age and self-reliance came into her face. She held the child closer, and commenced a low, crooning lullaby.

The fisherman rose and went out, beckoning to his wife.

"Mother," he said, "I've a notion it's God's work for the child—leastways, I can't gainsay her!"

Months were counted into years, and there was none to interfere with Anita's strange adoption. The boy—"Rescued" was the odd, old-fashioned name she gave him—developed into wonderful beauty. Anita seemed to have no life but in him; at home and among the neighbors she came to be known only as "Mother Anita," or "The Little Mother." So proud of him she was! From the first she seemed to have accepted it as a quiet certainty that he was fashioned of a finer material, and for a higher sort of life, than she had known. She was never quite content without him at her side. How much she suffered as he grew old enough to be taken sometimes with her father and brothers in the boat, was hinted by the red glow in her cheeks, and the restlessness of every look and motion, till she had him safely back again.

City people, who began to find the little village pleasant for a summer's fishing and bathing, were quick to make friends with the deformed girl whose spiritual face, radiant with love for her beautiful young charge, attracted them like some rare picture. Many offered her gifts of money, which she declined with gentle gratitude, asking for books instead—always adding, apologetically, "to teach him, you know." So it happened that a various library accumulated by degrees in her little chamber. As she read and studied glimpses of a new world opened before her, but as the little that she learned only hinted at what she could never know the sad conviction forced itself upon her that she could, after all, never be her boy's teacher.

The great wrench of her life came when Rescued was twelve years old. Judge Thorne, with his wife and little daughter, came down to the sea-shore, their hearts sore for the recent loss of their only son. The strong resemblance of Rescued to her dead child quite overcame Mrs. Thorne, as she chanced to see him for the first time playing on the beach; and when his strange history was told her she begged her husband to take him for their own.

When Judge Thorne preferred his request to old John Grey he shook his head.

"Not but 'twould be the makin' of the boy, Judge Thorne, but you see my darter—why! the little mother'd grieve to death if Rescued should be took away!"

But as the Judge still urged, he said at last, "There's no use talkin'; but if you'd like to hear what she'd say herself, I'll call her in, for there she comes!"

Anita came in, and Judge Thorne stood half abashed before the quiet dignity which comforted so ill with the small, deformed figure. Having once heard Anita speak, one must respect too much to pity her. Unconsciously he dropped the manner with which he had spoken to her father, and in a few broken, heart-felt sentences, plead his doubtful cause.

Anita grew deadly pale, and her finger-tips, resting on a table beside her, were white with pressure, but otherwise she seemed calm and quiet, never once taking her eyes from Judge Thorne's face, reading him through and through.

"I will answer you to-morrow," she said, when he had done; then she turned away and went up to her own room. What fierce conflict she waged there with her own heart we can never know, but her unselfish love conquered at last.

With the autumn the little Rescued went to his new home.

"You shall come to us often, Anita," Mrs. Thorne had said, but the quiet answer was, "No, Mrs. Thorne, it is not best—it would be all the harder to leave him again, and my place is here."

The little mother's face grew somewhat paler and thinner; but there was no other outward change, except that the wealth of care and tenderness which she had lavished for years upon the one beloved object was distributed now to bless and cheer the many.

It was she who gathered the little children of the village together into a school, which she taught not so much from text-books as from shells and stones and flowers, planting in their young hearts that seed of love for God and all that He has made, which would spring up by-and-by in a plentiful harvest of faith and right living. It was she who read the Bible to the old; who smoothed the pillow of the sick; who wept with the widow and the orphan; whose sweet voice put in words the last prayer of the dying.

She herself sickened at last, wasting slowly but surely.

"I don't think we'd ever rightly known how much she suffered all her life," old John Grey said to me as we sat together in the church door one Sabbath afternoon after service, looking toward the grave-yard, whose simple stones were shining in the prophetic glory of sunset. "She was so cheery and patient-like, never talkin' of herself. It was so to the last. There was only one thing she longed for after she felt she couldn't live, and that was to see the boy again. She hadn't seen him for six years, for the Thornes had been in England for that long. As she got weaker she mourned the more. 'Oh! I want to be willin',' she used to say; 'but if it could be God's will to let me see him once more!'"

"There was a heavy storm the night she died. The wind howled around the old house, and we could scarce hear one another speak for the noise of the sea. I never can forget how she looked as she lay there a-listenin', with her white face and her eyes so big and bright. All to once she spoke: 'It's eighteen years ago to-night,' says she, 'in just such a storm as this, that God sent my boy,' and while the words was in her mouth I heard a noise of wheels outdoors, and a stamping on the steps, and the kitchen-door opened, and he come in—man-grown and tall and stout—a likelier lookin' lad I never laid my eyes on, but the same Rescued after all!"

"How is she?" he whispered; "we landed last week, and it's only yesterday I heard through Jacob Thompson that she was sick."

"I held up my finger for him to speak lower, but it was no use—she'd heard him, and she started up in bed, with her lips apart and her eyes on the door. I beckoned to him then, and he come in. 'Oh little mother!' he just sobbed, and she put her two arms around his neck without a word, and he laid her down gently. Oh, Sir, you never saw such a face! You know how the Good Book says they saw Stephen's—well, hers was like that."

"Somehow words didn't mean much then, and we all kept still. He sat by her and held her hand till near midnight; then a change came over her. Her eyes had an odd look, and we could see she wasn't with us any more. All at once she raised up. 'He's wakin' up,' she said, 'the precious lamb!' and then she begun to sway herself back and forth, and to sing the little song she used to rock him to sleep with:

"Sleep, little one, like a lamb in the fold,
Shut from the tempest, safe from the cold—
Sleep, little one, like a star in the sky, Wrapped in a cloud while the storm-wind sweeps by!"

"Her voice grew fainter and fainter, and sweeter and sweeter, and so she died."

THE PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

LAST week was a lively one at Paris. The severe cold that we had experienced for three weeks frightened our fashionable ladies; with the thaw their gayety revives. We have had a ball at the Tuileries, a ball at the Hôtel de Ville, and half a score of other official assemblies, without counting the first representation at the Théâtre Français of "Paul Forestier," a play in verse by Emile Augier—a literary solemnity impatiently expected for more than a month past, and for which all the seats were taken a fortnight before the performance. Its success has been prodigious and well-deserved, despite a somewhat delicate subject, and the faults in the fourth act, which is inferior to the first three. The company at the French Theatre contributed greatly to the poet's triumph, especially Mademoiselle Favart, who was so brilliant that none can longer dispute with her the rank of the first star on the first French stage.

The audience was not less interesting than the stage, the elite that it is agreed to style all Paris being there in full force. The Emperor, owing to a slight indisposition, was not present. The Empress also was detained by the bedside of Princess Bacchiocchi, who has broken her thigh, and whose condition inspires some anxiety. The Princess is at Rennes, and is unable at present to be removed to Paris. With the exception of these two great personages the whole court was present.

Princess Mathilde was in the Imperial box with Princess Murat, opposite Prince Napoleon and Princess Clotilde, the latter in a charming toilette of white faille, trimmed with bias folds of cherry satin. She wore a Greek coiffure of cherry velvet, and very long diamond pendants in her ears. Princess Mathilde wore a pearl-gray dress and a Marie Antoinette mantelet à volant, of the same material, with long ends falling behind. Her white bonnet, with broad lace bars, was trimmed with a wreath of eglantine.

The following details respecting the ball at the Tuileries may be interesting as a specimen of what is worn this winter in the fashionable world.

The Empress's toilette was yellow and white. The under-skirt was of yellow tulle bouillonnée, and was trimmed with a branch of galega (a sort of acacia), which formed a curve in front. The tunic of white tulle was caught up at the sides by rows of agrafes of precious stones, emeralds, rubies, and amethysts, encircled with diamonds, alternating with each other and growing larger toward the bottom, with a spray of acacia depending from each. The ends of the broad sash of yellow satin fell very low behind on the tunic. The bouillonnée corsage was ornamented on the front and the shoulders with brilliants, which also thickly studded a long black ribbon worn around the throat. Her coiffure consisted of sprays of galega, mingled with the long curls of the chignon, and a half wreath of diamond leaves in front.

Princess Mathilde was also in yellow, but of quite a different fashion. She wore a gold-colored satin dress, with a tunic of point d'Angleterre, very long behind and short in front, and caught up at the side with wide black velvet ribbon, confined at the top by a bouquet of violet dahlias. She wore a large coronet of diamonds on a Greek coiffure.

The Princess Murat appeared in mauve satin over a puffed skirt of white tulle. The puffs were separated by slender rouleaux of mauve satin. The dress itself was bordered with seven of these little rouleaux, and was caught up on one side only with a diamond agrafe. Diamond bandeaux in the hair.

Princess Metternich was in white tulle, thickly studded with bouquets of violets. Sash of lilac satin. Lilac Louis XV. coiffure, very voluminous, with a profusion of curls behind, and one long ringlet brought forward, with a spray of lilac attached to the end.

Princess Poniatowski wore a dress of white tulle, striped horizontally with white satin ribbons, and trimmed round the bottom with a wide flounce, surmounted by a bias fold of blue satin; with a large veil of white tulle falling over the whole. Her style of coiffure was most original; the hair turned back in front à la Marie Stuart, and rolled under at the back in the Middle Age style, with a single diamond flower at the side.

Marshal Canrobert's wife was remarkable for her blue dress, almost the only one at the ball, for blue is not in favor this year. The dress, nevertheless, was charming, owing to the daisies embroidered by hand with which it was thickly studded. Her hair seemed powdered with diamonds, through the numbers of diamond-headed pins that were scattered like stars among her crisped hair.

Two beautiful American ladies, the Misses Beckwith, wore empire dresses with tunics of white satin, looped with bunches of flame-colored grasses. The Countess de Lima was in white tulle with a corsage of pink faille, low and square, and of a wholly new shape, that is, laid in fan-shaped pleats in the front and back, à coquille.

Several very original toilettes were seen at the ball given by the German Association in behalf of its charitable fund; among others, that of Princess Metternich, who was the President of the Committee of Lady Patronesses, and who wore a dress of yellow tulle bouillonnée, with a black corsage embroidered with gold, a tunic in the form of a court mantle, looped behind with broad, black ribbons, and over all this a green satin sash. It needed the perfect ease and graceful manners of the Princess to carry off this fantastic costume. It is said that she was somewhat discomfited for a moment on finding herself opposite a well-known young boot-maker in the dance, but that she did not therefore dance with the less spirit.

Madame Erlanger, née Slidell, likewise one of the lady patronesses, was lovely in a toilette of tulle bouillonnée, over which was thrown a veil of pink tulle, without a single jewel, but only a rose on one side of the low corsage, and another in the midst of the crisped puffs of her hair. The divine Patti, whose marriage with the Marquis de Caux has been three times positively announced, and a fourth time solemnly contradicted, and who, instead of becoming a Marchioness, is content to remain a star, appeared in a cloud of white tulle, sprinkled with diamonds, as befitted a youthful divinity. Madame Worth, the wife of the celebrated man-dressmaker, was remarked for the immense size of her paniers, which called to mind those of Queen Marie Antoinette. Whether this is a presage of the fall of crinoline, none can say positively, for the use of paniers has not yet been adopted outside of women of the greatest elegance. The skirt of Madame Worth was looped behind by a long spray of smilax, which extended from the front like a chain.

Balls are not the only place where Parisian elegance can be seen. It appears elsewhere in many other forms which need to be understood, for it is the first condition with a woman of fashion always to have dresses suited to whatever occasion may arise. Last Thursday the assembling of the Corps Legislatif presented a fine opportunity for the display of walking dresses. The announcement of a speech by M. Thiers always attracts a crowd, and on this day the interest was heightened by the expectation of the debut of M. Pinard, the new Minister of the Interior. M. Thiers, as usual, held the audience enchained by his words, and for three hours and a half made them forget his seventy-four years, as he seemed to forget them himself, scarcely stopping during all this time to take a draught of water, or to use his nankeen-bordered handkerchief. M. Pinard followed; but the measured, precise, and magisterial words of the new Minister left the Chamber cold and the audience indifferent.

As to the dresses Madame Sheider, the wife of the President of the Chamber, wore a dress of black and white pèkiné satin, with a polonaise of the same; a young lady, accompanying her, had a dress of gazelle satin, a velvet paletot of the same shade, with passementerie trimming to match, and a mantilla-bonnet of black lace, trimmed with a cluster of small gazelle velvet dahlias. The wife of Marshal Canrobert was in plain mauve satin, gored, with high corsage, and white blonde bonnet, trimmed with a wreath of mauve velvet primroses.

ELIANE DE MARSY.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

AMONG the curious and convenient novelties of the Paris Exposition was a "Norwegian Kitchen," constructed on non-conducting principles. It is merely a small box, so arranged as to keep all the heat in it. It requires little care; boiling water put into it will retain its temperature for many hours, and meats and vegetables immersed in the water will be cooked in due time without any special supervision. Now, of course, such a kitchen as this would be a wonderful saving of expense; and really some one interested in the promotion of American economy, and the general comfort of American housekeepers, should introduce this contrivance. In the first place, an astonishing reduction of coal bills would immediately ensue—for the breakfast fire would cook the dinner—and how genial that reduction would make paterfamilias feel! In the second place, no array of kitchen servants would be needful; one would be enough to attend to the cooking and every thing else, since this new-fashioned cooking kitchen takes care of itself. And what a relief would this prove to those distressed ladies whose lives are vexed from day to day with friction of every kind among their household corps! "Ah! this grievous trouble of managing servants!" sighs many a fretted lady, who helplessly wishes she could get along with a single maid, and absolutely envies the light-heartedness of young Mrs. A., who keeps house, just across the street, in three or four cozy rooms, and is not bothered with any servant at all.

The origin of many domestic difficulties is want of due consideration for the feelings of servants. Yet, on the other hand, those seeking employment are often foolishly and provokingly exacting. The same spirit is frequently exhibited here as that shown by a cook in London, who not long ago, being out of a situation, asked a lady to assist her in procuring one. A place was soon found. "But pray, mum," inquires Mrs. Cook, before accepting, "does the family 'ave cresses?" "Water-cresses for breakfast? I'm sure I don't know," answered her patron; "but what can it signify?" "Excuse me, mum," interposed the applicant. "I mean cresses on their carriage, note-paper, liv'ry, and cetera—" "Oh! armorial bearings, you mean?" said the lady. "I really can't tell you." "Because 'm, I really couldn't undertake a situation where they wasn't a cress kept. You see, every genteel family 'as a cress; and—" "And you positively make that a condition?" asked the lady, quietly. "Sutt'nly, mum," says Mrs. Cook. "Footman kep; washing put out; bear, tea, and fam'ly cress." "Then, I really think," said the lady, "that you had better look out for yourself."

Speaking of these domestic trials, the following incident is appropos:

A Parisian lady, who fostered a large collection of gold-fish, recently took an Irish servant into her household, and intrusted her with the charge of them. Perhaps the lady relied too much upon her imperfect English, for the new attendant seemed to gain but one idea, namely, that the fishes themselves were to be kept scrupulously clean. Biddy rose early, the mistress slept late. In a day or two the fishes seemed to be in trouble. Some died, and others were swimming languidly, with their golden scales singularly broken and discolored. Happening to rise rather earlier than usual, on the third day, the mistress found Biddy at her morning occupation. The thirty or forty gold-fish lay panting and floundering upon the table, and the industrious servant was vigorously taking up one after the other and rubbing them with a towel! She was "keeping them clean!"

A young lady in Detroit, evidently ambitious of fame, has performed the feat of skating for thirty consecutive hours without sleep, and only thirty minutes' rest during the time. She is seventeen years of age, and of Bohemian parentage. Between twelve and fifteen hundred spectators witnessed the conclusion of the performance. This special exhibition of strength and endurance chanced to come to a safe termination; but how easily might it have been otherwise! Such extraordinary exertions are always unsafe, and, as there is no useful end to be gained, seem foolish. Not long ago two young women waltzed themselves to death on a wager of a gold ring, in the city of Vienna. They danced until they fell exhausted to the floor, and soon after died from disease of the heart.

During the session of Congress—the gay and fashionable season at Washington—the various Receptions given by prominent individuals form a leading feature in social life. Those open to the public are largely attended by citizens as well as strangers; yet the prevailing refinement of American society is indicated by the universally well-bred and agreeable company who gather in them. This is peculiarly true of some of these receptions; not merely of the private ones but of those which are free to all, where, with the absence of undue formality, there is the presence of thorough refinement and cheerful sociability. These receptions are often described in a general way—"largely attended," "brilliant throng," "elegant toilettes;" and even with more detailed delineations of the Hon. Mrs. A—, who wore a rich dress of pink moire antique with point lace collar and pearl ornaments; Mrs. Senator B—, in black velvet dress, cut low in the neck, with jet ornaments; the fascinating Mrs. C—, superbly attired in a black and white brocade silk; and the beautiful Miss D—, charming in blue silk dress, Pompadour waist, and lace spencer.

But these details, entertaining though they may be to some, are not what the great throng of strangers, living in various sections of the country from Maine to California, who go to Washington for a day, a week, or a month, desire most to know. They may be wholly unacquainted with Washington etiquette, but wish to see something of social life, as exhibited in receptions. For the benefit of such, even at the risk of repeating what is very familiar to many, we will say that the local newspapers announce the receptions which are public. Those given at the White House are universally so, as also, during this winter, those given by General Grant, Speaker Colfax, and others. If, for example, you desire to attend a reception given by the President, or by the ladies of the Executive Mansion, tasteful evening dress is desirable. Indeed, it is regarded as rather a breach of etiquette to go otherwise arrayed—although on a recent occasion we saw a few ladies in dress hats and velvet cloaks, or shawls, and walking dresses; while there were even some scattering spectators in ordinary traveling garb. Ladies should have their hair (or the hair, as the case may be) prettily arranged—that being nowadays of paramount importance. On reaching the Presidential Mansion you can go to the dressing-room; but there is no necessity of doing so if you plan otherwise; and as it has been currently reported that many valuable wraps have been stolen from dressing-rooms on similar occasions, it will be entirely suitable for the gentleman with you to throw your opera cloak or shawl over his arm before entering the Blue Room. The gentleman should mention the name of the lady he escorts, with his own, to the official near the threshold, by whom both are presented to the President; and then again to the one whose duty it is to present visitors to the ladies—Mrs. Patterson and Mrs. Stover. Then passing into the large East Room the way is open to join the throng of promenaders, where there is ample opportunity to examine elegant toilettes and bright faces, to listen to gay conversation, and take note of the general aspect of affairs. No form is needful in leaving.

We have recently seen it stated that General Grant's residence is exceedingly well adapted to the holding of receptions. Undoubtedly this is in general true; but on the occasion of his last reception, we were unable to view it in that light, or indeed, scarcely in any other light! Perhaps it was the fact that it was to be his last reception for the present, and also the rumor that Dickens might be one of the guests, which made the crowd so much greater than usual. But certain it was that we were a full half hour going from the carriage to the parlor-door—and a very short distance it was. The constantly arriving guests took their places in regular order, and patiently, and almost imperceptibly, made their way toward the entrance. A genuinely good-natured crowd it was, too; jokes were passed, and many a merry laugh was heard, though bareheaded ladies might have longed for warmer wrappings, and silently bewailed their elegant dresses, hopelessly rumpled and crushed by the press. A line of people leaving the house seriously interfered with those entering, or vice versa. And when at length the hall was reached a surging mass, striving to pass in every direction, made the scene one of extraordinary confusion. "Would we go to the dressing-room?" By no means; not while we heard ladies, absolutely locked in the crowd, lamenting that their wrappings were far away, and declaring they had a mind to go home without them. The parlor-door once gained we were duly presented to General and Mrs. Grant, both of whom stood under the assault of this army of friends with steadfast bravery. The parlors were crowded like the hall; trains must have been at a discount; certainly none were to be seen; only a dense mass of heads; and if, perchance, the style in which any lady's dress was trimmed, or the ornaments she wore were revealed to the public eye, she might well congratulate herself on having had more than the general allotment of space.

A very strange but authentic story is related in one of the Kansas newspapers. Quite recently a lady while dressing her infant discovered the head of a large darning needle protruding from the child's breast. In an instant she drew it forth, and found it to be one of the very largest of darning needles! The child had been very restless for two or three days; and from various circumstances, which were recalled to mind, it was supposed that during the absence of the mother a boy, who is about four years of age, climbed to where the pin-cushion was hanging and took therefrom a needle, and ran it into the infant's breast. How much the child suffered can only be imagined, but it is now doing well.

Not long ago an invalid child at Savannah was locked into a bedroom by the person in charge of him while she went shopping. She thought him safe there; and to be sure he was safe on her return. But on the following day she discovered that the bed had been on fire in three places; and, on questioning the child, found that it had been playing with matches, had three times set the bed on fire, and as often extinguished the flames by patting them out, "because he didn't want to burn up Aunt's bed." Mothers and those in charge of young children can draw their own inferences from this incident.

A Cincinnati journal records a dreadful disaster which occurred at Trinity Church in that city. The waterfall of a lady, as she arose from prayer, suddenly exploded, scattering the contents far and wide! Nobody seriously injured.

In Tunis women are fattened before marriage. A girl, after she is betrothed, is cooped up in a small room; shackles of gold and silver are placed upon her ankles and wrists as a piece of dress.

The food used for this custom, worthy of the barbarians, is called drough, and is very nutritious. With this seed, and their natural dish cascacia, the bride is literally crammed, and many actually die under the spoon.

Hair Dressing.

THESE tasteful and becoming styles of arranging the hair are easily executed. Though they all require a considerable quantity of hair, any natural deficiency may readily be supplied by artistically-made braids, curls, and chignons, which form the most elegant of all head-dresses, and which can be easily made to look precisely like one's own hair.

MARIE ANTOINETTE COIFFURE.—In this, as in all the other styles which we give, a small braid is made of the back hair, which serves to fasten the chignon. Part the hair in a line from ear to ear; tie the back hair low in the neck; brush the front hair upward, and confine it by means of a hoop of shell, jet, or gold; then arrange it in a puff, passing the ends underneath the same. Knot the back hair low in the neck, then carry it loosely upward, and finish with a bow on the crown. Two long curls, falling behind, and short curls in the neck complete the coiffure.

JOSEPHINE COIFFURE.—For this, make of a strand of the back hair a braid on the crown from an inch and a half to two inches long. Then wind the back hair over a crêpe which covers the entire back of the head, in the manner shown in the illustration, taking care to hide the crêpe completely. The ends of the hair are concealed under the chignon. The chignon comb is fastened in the small braid which we have mentioned, and which serves to hold it more firmly. The front hair is waved, brushed upward, and arranged as shown in the illustration. A long curl, with short curls in the neck, finishes the coiffure.

AMBASSADRESS COIFFURE.—This coiffure consists of a chignon of heavy braids and twisted strands. The front hair is arranged in the manner shown in the illustration, with short curls, and a Josephine lock. A velvet bandeau with bow and ends is placed on the hair.

SÉVIGNÉ COIFFURE.—This coiffure is well suited to evening dress. The back hair falls in long curls from the crown low in the neck. If the hair is not long enough a chignon of curls can be used over another of braids or twists. The front hair is waved, and arranged as shown in the illustration. A coronet, formed of leaves, ribbons, and a bow, completes the coiffure.

Egyptian Necklace.

THIS pretty necklace is made of several strings of wax or crystal beads, falling low in the neck, as shown in the illustration. The original consists of fourteen strings of wax-beads, the shortest of which is fifteen inches long, and each succeeding one a third of an inch longer. These beads are fastened at the end to two loops of ribbon-wire, covered with silk, and finished with hooks and eyes. The accompanying illustration shows this fastening of the full size.

Lady's Knitted Overshoe.

MATERIALS for the pair: three ounces red 12-fold worsted wool, half an ounce gray double zephyr.

Such an overshoe as that designated by the illustration is intended for carriage wear, over thin evening slippers or gaiters. The model is knitted of red 12-fold zephyr, and is similar to a ribbed stocking. The top is of gray double zephyr. Begin by casting on 60 stitches; then knit 28 rounds patent. Next splice on the red wool, and knit 50 rounds ribbed two each way. The heel now begins. This is knit like the preceding, in a ribbed pattern, and is cast off like a stocking. Take up the side stitches of the heel, and knit 62 rounds further in ribs. Now begin the tapering off by narrowing on both sides (each side of the sole). This is done by knitting 2 stitches together on each side of every round so that the ribs come together like a wedge. When 14 stitches only remain between each point of narrowing, lay the upper and lower together, and knit every two opposite stitches like one stitch.

Square in Guipure Net.

See illustration, page 293.

THE design of this square is very beautiful. The flat embroidery of the central figure is especially pretty on the point de toile. Several such squares joined together form a pretty cover; singly, they may be used for covering toilette-cushions and the like. The entire foundation for a cover may also be netted at once, and the designs repeated as many times as may be required. The square counts 26 meshes in length and as many in breadth. Work the foundation with medium size linen thread over a netting mesh of half-inch circumference in backward and forward rounds, beginning at a corner with two stitches foundation, and adding a stitch at the end of every round till the number of stitches counts 27; work on that one round in the same number; then diminish each round by one stitch at the end till only two stitches remain. These last two stitches are tied together in a knot without forming a new stitch. In order to work the guipure, for which finer thread is used, the foundation must be stretched on a little frame. Next, fill this out with the exception of the spaces allotted to the central and four corner figures in the so-called point d'esprit, the working of which is shown in the accompanying illustrations, and form, as shown, the wheels, or webs, which make the centres of the figures above mentioned. Then stitch, collectively, the meshes intended for the close figures of the foundation in point de toile, and border them, as shown in the illustration, with point de reprise. The outer edge of the central wheel is worked in close scallops. Then embroider in flat stitch as shown in the pattern. The relief-like leaves and twigs, which are worked in the square in point de reprise, can be formed by reference to the accompanying illustrations.

Feather Flowers.

See illustration, page 293.

WE have already described in Harper's Bazar, No. 10, the manner of making feather flowers. The illustrations which we give herewith are of doves' feathers, and may be used for various ornamental purposes, such as bouquets for vases, etc.

LADY'S KNITTED OVERSHOE.

THE MASQUERADE PARTY.—[See Page 298.]

MY LAST MASQUERADE.

EVERY one is said to have his forte; and I have lately discovered that mine is masquerades. I have a liking for them. In the first place, a masque rather improves my personal appearance. I have a sublime consciousness that none can make me look worse, and a clear impression that some may make me look better.

In a former Number mention was made of a little masquerade which I attended, and an illustration was given. In the present Number you will find a sketch of the last one which I honored with my presence, executed by my facile pencil.

Not quite understanding all of the characters myself, it occurs to me that a slight explanation may be necessary. This I will now attempt for the benefit of the readers of the Bazar:

In the first place, it must be understood that the affair came off up town in one of the finest houses on Fifth Avenue. Modesty forbids me to mention the owner; but, lest an erroneous impression should go abroad, I will merely state that it was not mine. The piano was taken out of the parlor for the occasion, and a palm-tree planted in its place. You see it there in the background. It looks a little like a large feather-duster; but that is the fault of the engraver. I drew a very good tree; but in cutting it he attempted to outdo me, and has indeed succeeded in carrying away the palm—in removing all idea of it, in fact.

The most superficial observer can not fail to detect the Orientalism of the scene. Indeed nearly all who are seen are Orientals. There is the Chinese lady in the fore-ground, to whom you have before been introduced. Some objection was made to inviting her, on the ground that she did not belong to the established Church; but the giver of the entertainment quietly remarked, Shall we not take our Chinese in our inn? and put her down on the list. Besides, he urged, what should we do without our Tease?

To that thought, perhaps, I also was indebted for an invitation; it certainly would not do to slight a Bohemian.

It was well that they were not too particular about whom they asked, for at the last moment the party looked so small that it was suggested that the lame, the halt, and the blind should be called in.

Not having any cripples convenient I am going out to maim a few men on the avenue, after which the courtesies of the evening will be extended to them. That is I with a huge notched knife. It is easy enough to raise the blind, you see, at a moment's notice, by just stepping to the window.

The military-looking man, with a slouched hat and full beard, whom you see on the extreme left, is General Grant. He has little to do for the maintenance of the rôle but to stand still and say nothing. Unfortunately, he had his voice shot away in action.

In the two girls, one of whom bears a bouquet and her arm, which seems to be establishing a lean on her shoulder, you have specimens of the finest peasantry in the world. Their costumes show that they are not Irish.

The chap with checked garments, doubled up in a heap, is a merry Andrew—his last name is not Johnson, for he could scarcely be "merry" were he that "Andrew."

The little girl with a keg on is a vivandière. As it is expected that the party will continue after twelve she has made a wise provision in view of the excise law. Never could she have been one of the foolish virgins who started to have a time of it without filling their kegs. She is extending a cordial glass, or a glass of cordial, to the Chinese lady.

This is not holding the glass up to nature, but to ill-nature, apparently, for the daughter of Confucius seems about to strike her with a fan. Think of a fanning mill in a drawing-room, and between ladies, too! What chaffing there would be!

As before explained, that is I with the notched knife, attired as a guardian of the harem. It is considered a unique dress.

The lady on my left has just made a joke, and is inquiring, Did you see it?

I reply, Yes, I saw it, suiting the action to the word by experimenting on my engagement finger, as you will notice in the engraving, adding, I saw it but a moment, on finding that the thing really scratches.

The lady makes answer that I am always full of strange saws and modern insolences, and goes off wrapping a string of beads round her neck, as though she found me too cool.

The other lady, with helmet, epaulets, and a double row of buttons down the front, is a female warrior.

It might seem at first blush that the fellow bending his face near to hers was an explorer, and bent on discovering the mouth of the Amazon, but not so. That is Hamlet, and he is asking her whether she is a hail fellow well met, or a well fellow, helmet, in revenge for her having asked him a few minutes previously why his soliloquy was like an uncut quarter of pork, explaining that it was because it was Hamlet alone, bidding him, too, to go his ways, for she knew his trichane and his manners.

The couple immediately on my right are Turks. Those are turkey feathers in their caps. From one lady's wearing a sash round her waist it might be inferred that she has a secret pane somewhere, but there is no telling about women; you can't see through them, even when they seem lighted up with emotion. This lady is very pretty, but that is no good and sufficient reason why she should be dancing up and down on my toes, as you see she is doing in the picture.

It is all very well for persons to tread the light fantastic toe, but none of mine come under that category, and I am not fond of having them trod. In the back-ground, on the stairs, you see a tableau, representing the prison scene in Marie Antoinette. Ristori and her critic will be recognized as the central figures; the latter has just finished an ode to tired Nature's sweet Ristori, and is repeating it to the tired-looking jailer, who vainly waits for balmy sleep to come in. The figure leaning against the pillar is Grau, disguised as an Indian chief. He has been quite successful, and thinks there is a season for every thing—even Italian opera.

As for the other figures miscellaneous scattered around, I know little about them. Evidently none are lay figures, since all are standing up, and their silence indicates that they can by no possibility be figures of speech. If any readers of the Bazar want the credit of having been at my masquerade, they can buy a copy, seize upon any unoccupied, undescribed, and indescribable figure they please, and, like stern melancholy, mark him or her for their own. I promise never to let on about it.

But if any really wish to attend my masquerades and be furnished with first-class costumes and conundrums, they must apply either personally or by letter, giving references from their last party, and stating whether or not they have any objection to going a short distance into the country.

INGO.

WILD ROSES.

I WALKED in the joyous morning,
The morning of June and life,
Ere the birds had ceased to warble
Their sweetest of love and strife.

I walked alone in the morning,
And who so glad as I
When I saw the pale wild roses
Hang from the branch on high?

But the day was all before me,
The tumult of youth's delight—
Why bear a burden of roses
Before the calm of the night?

So I kissed the roses and lightly
I breathed of their breath divine.
It is time when I come back, I said,
To make the sweet roses mine.

I returned in the joyless evening;
I yearned with passion then,
For the pale and peerless roses
I never should see again.

For another had taken delight
In color and perfume rare,
And another hand had gathered
My roses beyond compare.

I may wander east, may wander west,
Wherever the sun doth shine;
I never shall find the wild roses,
The roses I thought were mine.

ST. CECILIA.

COLD—bitterly cold—the ground hard frozen, like a granite rock—the sharp wind piercing to your lungs like the sudden stab of a dagger—the air full of frigid, mocking brilliance, such as one might fancy glimmers through the jeweled ice-mountains of Arctic wildernesses! So faded away the orange splendors of the chill February sunset, and pale little Janet Colyer, watching its dying light from the school-room window, thought of the golden beds of daffodils she had played among as a child, and almost fancied, like Tennyson's love-lorn hero, that they had blossomed anew, in a sort of floral resurrection, on the far-off edges of Cloud-land.

Poor Janet! She had need of a glimpse of poetic imagery once in a while to cheer her prosaic life. What with decimal fractions, words of three syllables, concealed anarchy and flat rebellion within her limited kingdom, she had had a hard day's work, with the legacy of a severe headache at its end.

"That's right, nurse!" said Master Joseph Trevor, hammering noisily away at the disjointed limbs of a wooden toy by the red, shining grate, "take the children away. I and Miss Colyer are tired of their racket!"

"And ain't you comin' to your tea, Master Joe?" demanded the portly Irish woman.

"Me? No! What do you take me for?" disdainfully responded this representative of Young America. "I'm old enough to eat my dinner with the folks down stairs. Besides, Jack's coming to-night, and I want to hear all about Japan, where the natives walk about with plates turned upside down on their heads, and long braided pigtails—think of that, nurse! I ain't sure but I shall go as cabin-boy myself, next time the Icaria sails, if one's mother didn't make such a foolish fuss!"

"Nurse" retreated with her small convoy of children, holding up both hands, and sorely bewildered by the discrepancy that existed between Master Joseph's molasses taffy and wooden ropedancer, and his very mature and ambitious views on the subject of foreign travel and Japan!

"You see, Miss Colyer," went on Joe, patronizingly, "I'm getting sick of this multiplication-table business, and half a dollar a week isn't enough pocket money, so I guess I'll strike out in a new direction. Don't you wish you were a man, Miss Colyer?"

"Sometimes, Joe."

She was leaning her chin on her hand and looking musingly into the fire.

"I do," said Joe, desperately flinging the members of the wooden dancer upon the red-hot coals. "Well, Miss Colyer, here goes for the parlor!"

Janet stood by the fire, listening vaguely to the series of perilous leaps by which Master Joseph descended to the lower regions. Her head did ache very badly; it would have been an inconceivable luxury to lie down on the old crimson-covered lounge for a while, or to sit and doze in the easy-chair, with shut eyes and relaxed energies. But luxuries were not in Janet Colyer's line.

"If I am to be a governess all my days, I must try and improve myself," she thought, letting down the red moreen curtains, and lighting the gas. And she sat down to her crayon drawing with a little sigh of depressed resolution.

She was a slender, black-eyed little creature, with jetty, arched brows, and a tiny, mournful mouth—hollow-cheeked and grave—a girl whom you would have called "rather pretty," and nothing more.

Yet Janet Colyer had had a lover once, who had worshipped the very ground her small feet trod on!

A soft mist hung on her eyelashes, obscuring the serene face of her half-completed "St. Cecilia," as the merry echo of voices and laughter floated up from the rooms below. Not that there was any rank growth of jealousy in Janet's nature—not that she would have joined them if she could—but it was hard to be so entirely alone! And the indescribable chill of home-sickness crept over her heart as the fog creeps up on some lonely headland at night—the bitter, bitter home-sickness of one who has no home.

Crimson carpets, soft as the first velvet moss of the spring forests; ceilings tinted with creamy gold paneled in gray; curtains that swept in waves of deep red color to the floor—this room was not much like Lieutenant Audley's narrow cabin on the stanch old Icaria. Nor was there aught suggestive of the bitter winter blasts in the basket of waxen japonicas, and crimson roses, and scented geranium leaves that exhaled spicy currents of perfume from the gilded table under the chandelier.

Antonia Trevor sat at the piano, softly striking melodious octaves and stormy chords of chromatic sweetness, with one hand, while she talked to her cousin. A tall, fair-haired beauty, with a skin like alabaster, large, china-blue eyes, and red, dewy lips; she knew just how to make the most of her natural advantages, and looked exceedingly lovely in her light-blue silk dress, with English violets drooping amidst the yellow meshes of her beautiful, abundant hair.

Lieutenant Audley looked at her, as he walked slowly up and down the long room, as one might contemplate some beautiful, soulless picture.

Nature had not made Antonia a good talker; but she tried her best, now, to amuse and entertain the cousin whose convalescence from a wearisome illness kept him from outside diversions, and threw him, as it were, into her power.

"It seems so strange, Jack," she said, with a little melodious laugh—a laugh she "did" very well, and prided herself upon.

"What seems strange?" he asked, brusquely.

"That you, reared in luxury and accustomed to every refinement, should so decidedly prefer the hardships of naval life, and the outlandish ways of foreign countries!"

John Audley stopped, facing his pretty cousin, and leaning against the marble mantle where an alabaster Psyche bent over him with tender outstretched arms.

"I would rather be on the salt-water, even were it as a common sailor, than to live the most luxurious life as a landsman," he said, deliberately.

"Then society has no charms for you?"

"Society—a mere name for the hollowness of forms—a whitened sepulchre—a galvanized skeleton, dressed up to counterfeit vitality!"

"Dear me, Jack, how horrible! But your home and your friends—"

"They contrive to exist exceedingly well without me," he answered, a little bitterly. "What ties have I, like the rest of my kind? What should keep me at home?"

The china-blue eyes drooped beneath their long golden lashes—the softest rose-tint crept up into Miss Trevor's cheek.

"N—thing, of course," she said, plaintively, "unless our wishes—my wishes—have some weight with you!"

Lieutenant Audley bit his lip; had he been alone he would have broken into a whistle. There were other dangers than those of the deep sea, Malay pirates, and typhoid fevers. Miss Antonia Trevor was laying formal siege to the snug little property that Jack, honest-hearted sailor that he was, contemplated with so little self-gratulation. He looked Antonia full in the face with a curious smile. She colored in spite of herself, and tapped her foot on the floor with ill-suppressed vexation that she should have shown her cards so very plainly.

"You are tired, Jack? I keep selfishly forgetting how weak you must be."

"Not tired, thanks—only ennuyée. I'll run up stairs and see the little folks a few minutes before dinner, Antonia."

And there was an end of the tête-à-tête that Antonia Trevor had planned so skillfully. Ennuyée and in her presence! Who but a stupid sailor would have confessed to such a feeling! Antonia could have cried from anger and mortification.

Janet Colyer started from her drawing as the door swung open, and Lieutenant Audley walked, unannounced, into the solitary precincts of the school-room. And, perhaps, all things considered, the sailor was quite as much surprised as she.

He turned red and white—paused an instant, and then advanced.

"Jenny! Jenny Colyer!"

Poor Janet! She rose up, and sat down again, trembling like a forlorn little autumn leaf, as John Audley's warm, strong hand closed so firmly over her cold palm.

"You won't speak to me, Jenny? I know we parted coldly; it was a ridiculous quarrel, and I was wrong all the way through. But you'll forgive me, Jenny? You'll not bear malice now?" She tried vainly to draw away her hand.

"I—I don't think you understand, John. You are Mrs. Trevor's guest, I suppose—and—I am only the nursery governess."

"Pshaw!" he exclaimed, impetuously. "I don't care if you are the scullion, Janet! Tell me that I am forgiven!"

Ah, poor St. Cecilia! she received very little more attention that evening. So absorbed in reminiscences of olden time were the naval officer and the nursery governess that even the ominous sparkle of Mrs. Trevor's steel-gray eyes, as she swept past the partially open door, half pausing as she did so, failed to attract their notice.

At length the silver tinkle of the state dinner-bell summoned Lieutenant Audley to the formal party below. He rose.

"And you, Janet?"

"Oh, I dined long ago, with the children and the nurse. I am only governess, you know; and I never go into the rooms down stairs."

When he was gone, and Janet was all alone, she leaned her head against the top of the great easy-chair, so happy, so ineffably peaceful; and her hollow cheeks glowed with a delicate, peachy pink as she repeated softly to herself,

"I think—I am almost sure—he loves me yet!"

Alas! all our blissful dreams come to an end sooner or later, and Janet Colyer's brief glimpse of Elysium was no exception to the general rule.

She always came down to her little school-room early, but on the morning that succeeded her short-lived happiness there was an occupant even more punctual than herself—Mrs. Trevor, in rustling robes of heavy black silk, and eyes as hard as balls of glistening steel.

"Good-morning, Miss Colyer," she said, in measured accents. "You will find on that table four dollars and seventy-five cents—the amount now due you, I believe?"

Janet took up the money with trembling fingers. What new avalanche of evil was impending?

"Is it correct, Miss Colyer?" grimly questioned the elder lady.

"Quite so, Madam."

"Then have the goodness to pack up your things and leave the house immediately."

"Mrs. Trevor!"

Janet caught at the table for support; the room seemed to swim round her.

"I believe I render myself intelligible, Miss Colyer. And, although I do not feel myself under any obligations to state the cause of your dismissal, I have no objection to tell you that I can not harbor under my roof any person who conducts herself toward an engaged gentleman as you did toward my cousin, Lieutenant Audley, last evening, I—ahem—I really shudder to think of my children being exposed to such very questionable influences!"

"Mrs. Trevor," said poor Janet, desperately, "will you state my offenses a little more clearly? I am unaware of having in any way deserved this unkind, unwomanly language. Nor did I for an instant imagine that Lieutenant Audley—"

"There is an—understanding between him and his cousin Antonia," said Mrs. Trevor, tapping her fingers uneasily against the window-seat. "Further than this I really must be excused from any argument or conversation with you. Be pleased to hasten your preparations."

Janet looked confusedly at Mrs. Trevor.

"Madam, I am homeless, almost penniless. You can see the falling snow—you hear the wind. Give me until to-morrow morning at this time."

"Not one hour," sternly returned the matron.

"I have told you what to expect. I wish to see my orders carried out immediately."

There was no further remonstrance on Janet's lip. Silently she made up her little packet of worldly goods—ah! how slender and small it was!—silently she crept down the softly-carpeted stairs, and went out into the blinding whirls of snow with a fever of resentful anguish at her heart that made her happily unconscious of the howling blast and eddying drifts of snow.

"The most unaccountable thing in the world, my dear John," said Mrs. Trevor, turning the solid silver faucet of her gorgeous coffee-urn. "Gone away before any of the family were up, leaving no clew or message as to her whereabouts. I really fear there must be something wrong with her brain. An old acquaintance of yours, you say? Dear me—how romantic!"

Lieutenant Audley did not reply; but his frank ear somehow detected the hollow ring in his cousin's soft voice.

"There has been underhand dealing here," he thought to himself, indignant, he scarce knew why. "Poor Janet—poor little suffering, solitary Jenny! I will find her, or—"

What the alternative was he never destined to know.

Did John Audley imagine for an instant what a hopeless affair it was to search for a little nursery governess through the brick-and-mortar wildernesses of New York? Not he! Years ago, when the little Icaria lay under the murderous fire of Fort Fisher, he had looked calmly at the seemingly impregnable fortifications with the quiet resolve to conquer or die. Nor was his resolution a whit less firm now.

He had a motive at last, and he pined no more for foam-crested billow or salt sea-breeze.

But the slow days came and went—the gradually lengthening days of February—and his eager, feverish search was all in vain.

John Audley was growing thin and pale. Not but that his convalescence progressed as favorably as he had any right to expect, but his mind was racked with incessant surmises, agonized doubts lest Janet had in reality fled from him, instead of being, as he had at first conjectured, expelled from the house by his manœuvring relatives.

"I loved her. She might have known it. And she might also have known that I would not persecute her with selfish importunities if she chose to refuse me. Oh, Janet! my little lost Janet! if I had but the slightest clew to this strange enigma!"

The gray dusk was gathering in the narrow street, whither the restless impulse of motion had unconsciously guided John Audley's unquiet footsteps, when suddenly a brace of brilliant gas-lights flashed into the dark dinginess of a "second-hand" store window, where violins and smoothing-irons, carpets, crockery, and accordions seemed to elbow one another in the general confusion. And, in the midst of the mêlée, coarsely framed in tawdry gilt, smiled down the heavenly face of the crayon "St. Cecilia" that Janet Colyer had been working at that evening.

"Did you wish to buy it, Sir?" demanded a sharp-faced female, in a dirty worsted shawl, who was mending lace behind the counter. "It's some Catholic saint or other; it was drawn by my up-stairs lodger, a Miss Colyer—a nice little creature, Sir, but very poor, and one nat'rally gets uneasy when the rent ain't paid reg'lar like."

John Audley hesitated a moment—but he conquered the first eager impulse. He purchased the sweet-eyed "St. Cecilia" and left the little second-hand store, glad to escape from its close and stifling atmosphere.

"No," he thought, "I will not venture to force myself upon her until I can be sure that my presence will not be unwelcome. And how to ascertain? Oh, true-love's kindly saint, never mortal needed thy benison more than I!"

Clear and cold the next day dawned; but Janet Colyer had no money to spend in coals, and consequently her little room was very, very chilly, as she moved quietly about, with the cruel sunshine playing on her jet-black hair and a faded shawl wrapped round her slender shoulders.

"Miss Colyer!"

She had not heard the tap, and started as the sharp-faced woman who "tended shop" below stairs entered boldly into the room and sat, panting, down on the side of the bed. The color mounted into Janet's cheek.

"I—I am very sorry about the rent, Mrs. Carson: indeed it shall be paid, as soon as—"

"Oh, 'twan't the rent," said the woman, with a chuckle; "I've paid myself. Your picture of the woman a-playin' on the harp was sold last night, and the price jest covered the back rent. Ten dollars, with the price of the frame took out. Tain't that as I've come about—it's a note."

And from her greasy apron-pocket she produced a little white missive, which she laid on the table, and departed as abruptly as she had made her appearance.

Janet took up the note and broke the seal, with a half-defined apprehension of some new evil close at hand. It was very brief.

"Janet," it said, "do you remember the days of our boy and girl love? By the memory of those long-past hours, I beseech you to look favorably on my petition. Janet, if you love me still—if you think you can learn to love me—give me but one glance of your eyes, one flutter of your hand, to tell me that I may have you for my life-long treasure. Janet, I am awaiting your answer."

That was all. Yet it came like a new pulse of life to tired, weary Janet. He was not engaged to blue-eyed Antonia Trevor—he loved her, and her alone—he had been faithful to her through time and separation! She tied on her little black silk bonnet, with the one battered rose in its trimming; she adjusted the faded shawl, trying the while to still the beating of her happy, tumultuous heart, and came down the narrow wooden stairs light as a bird, yet almost fearing to wake and find it all a sweet dream.

But it was no baseless delusion of a disordered brain. Lieutenant Audley was there, awaiting her—pacing up and down the street, with eyes whose eager wistfulness unconsciously betrayed the fevered anxiety that was burning within him.

"Janet?" he said, inquiringly, as he took her hand.

"Yes."

"My Janet—my little, dark-eyed jewel!" he murmured, drawing her arm close within his.

You never would have taken them for a pair of lovers, so quiet and commonplace was their appearance as they walked through the streets; and so they went, composedly, to a little church whose gray gables nestled in a neighboring street, like some ghostly relic of the past, and were married, in the shifting, frosty brightness of the winter morning.

"For I can't afford to run the risk of any more misunderstandings and separations," said Lieutenant Audley, resolutely.

"I declare, it's too bad, Jack," said Miss Antonia Trevor, affectedly tossing back her flossy, golden ringlets. "I haven't had a single birthday present all day—and I'm nineteen. You know, our birthdays are the same, with ten years interval of age—and I've a great mind not to give you the slippers I have been embroidering."

"Ah, I do seem to remember," said Lieutenant Audley, who had just entered, apparently in something of a hurry. "No presents, eh? The guardian genius of birthdays has been more generous with me."

"Indeed!" said Antonia, coquettishly, "and what has he sent you?"

"A wife!"

"A wife!" echoed Miss Antonia, incredulously.

"Yes; I was married this morning to Janet Colyer."

And he walked quietly up stairs to take possession of his dressing-boxes, trunks, and meerschauums, before taking his final congé.

While Janet, sitting at the hotel-window all alone, with the St. Cecilia smiling on her from the wall, watched the daffodil glow of sunset and thought of that other sunset, oh, so long ago! and yet the almanac said it was scarcely a month!

And the tears that fell were sweeter and more blissful than any smiles.

DOWN AMONG THE FAIRIES.

ONCE there was a little girl, long ago in the dark ages, whose name was Effie. She was very good-tempered, and as affectionate a little thing when you merely wanted to play as any one could desire; but when you didn't want to play she was the very iddest little monkey in the world. There never was any body before Effie's time so hopelessly idle as she was. By the time she was eight years old she didn't know four letters in the whole alphabet; and as for using her needle, she could hardly have done so much as a bit of plain hemming to save her life. Her mother had had ten governesses for her in succession, but it was all no use; there was nothing in the world that Effie would learn.

So, at last, when her eighth birthday came, and there was not the slightest sign of improvement in her, her father and mother saw quite clearly that the only thing that could be done with her was to give her over to the fairies; and, accordingly, they dismissed her last governess, and with a heavy heart the poor mother one afternoon set off in a coach and six and drove to the gate of fairy-land.

She knocked at the door, and almost instantly three staid and dignified fairies came out to speak to her, and to them the mother told all her trouble; and as soon as she had told it the three fairies all began to grin and chuckle in the most surprising way.

"Ah, you'll never make any thing of her—that's as clear as daylight!" said the first fairy, nodding her head.

"Oh no, quite useless to think of you making any thing of her," cried the second fairy, as if the very idea was quite laughable. "Fairy-land is the place for her."

"Yes, yes, send her to us. We'll make her learn, I'll warrant you!" cried the third fairy.

So, finding them all so charmingly of one mind, the poor mother could only sigh and answer meekly that she had no doubt she had better take their advice. "Though it will be a terrible pain for me to part with her," she said, "and if it wasn't for her good—"

"But it is for her good!" chimed all the three fairies together. And the mother answered, sadly, "Well, I suppose it is," and could hardly keep the tears out of her eyes.

"And the sooner she comes the better, my lady," said the first fairy.

But, after much urging, they agreed to let Effie remain at home until twelve o'clock of the following night.

"But mind, not a single hour longer than that," said the eldest fairy, knitting her brows and looking very severe; and the lady said, meekly, that it shouldn't be even a moment longer. "And, I suppose," she continued, "a year would be about long enough for her to stay with you?" And she gave a look into their faces that might have melted any body's heart.

"A year! We never receive any one for a shorter period than seven years," said the third fairy, severely.

And then the poor mother gave a little scream. "And shall I never see her for seven long years?" she cried; "oh, my little Effie!" and the tears ran down her cheeks.

But the fairies said No, most decidedly she could not see her for seven years. If she wanted her back at the end of that time she could come and take her, but as for their receiving her for any shorter period it was a thing that was never done, and was against all the rules of fairy-land.

So the poor mother could only sigh again most deeply and heavily, and go her way. What better could she do?

It was a sorrowful day that followed. Effie, indeed, was happy enough, for she knew nothing of what was before her; but the poor father and mother were very sorrowful, and when they said good-night to her for the last time, their hearts ached as if they were going to break. But it was no use to think that they would make one final attempt more at home to cure Effie of her idle ways; what was done was beyond recall. So they kissed their little girl again and again, and then she went to bed; and the fairies came when she was fast asleep and carried her away to fairy-land.

When she awoke next morning you can fancy what a state of bewilderment she was in. She had gone to sleep comfortably tucked up in her cot, and when she awoke she was lying on a bank strewn over with rose-leaves (fairies, you know, use rose-leaves for blankets and sheets), and great trees over her head, with their leaves all of gold, and such sweet sounds of wonderful music floating around her as little Effie had certainly never heard before in all her life.

Of course she sat up, and rubbed her eyes, and began to stare with all her might; but the longer she stared the more amazed she grew; and all at once a score or more of fairies upon horseback came into view. The wonderful little creatures coming toward her were fairies, Effie knew well enough, but how could she tell merely by the look of them whether they were good fairies or bad?

They saw her in an instant; they jumped down from their horses, and they skipped about upon the grass, and they leaped and danced round Effie until she was dreadfully bewildered. But they were evidently a most merry little crew; and Effie loved merriment. It was quite clear, too, that they meant to be friendly with her.

"Ha, ha! so you've come to live in fairy-land!" they chirped. "I hope you like it, my dear! We're practicing our steps, you see. Come and play with us! Come and play with us! Come and play with us!" the whole bevy of them began to squeak at last, leaping and holding out their hands to Effie.

So Effie skipped forward and began to dance too as merrily as the rest. On a sudden a little sound caught the fairies' ears, and in an instant, before Effie could conceive what had come over them, the whole troop scampered from the place, leaving poor little Effie stopped suddenly in the middle of her wild dance, standing all alone, bewildered and dazed.

She was not, however, left alone very long. Three more fairies came bustling forward, quite of another sort from those wild monkeys who had just departed.

They looked grim, and even sour, as they stepped up in a business-like way, with all their six eyes fixed on Effie's face.

"Good-morning to you! Humph! You've been dancing!" said the first fairy, curtly.

"Dancing isn't allowed at this hour of the day. You'll have to learn that, my young lady," said the second fairy, sharply.

"And a good many other things, too; a good many other things, too," said the third fairy.

The little girl looked into the three fairies' faces, and shivered.

"I want to go home!" she called out suddenly.

"I don't know how I came here. Oh, let me go home!"

"Don't you trouble yourself about getting home, my dear," said the eldest fairy. "Your mother has sent you here, and you are going to live with us in fairy-land, and a very nice place you'll find it."

"But I can't live here; I want to go home; I want my mother!" cried poor little Effie, passionately.

"We'll all be mothers to you, my dear. Will that satisfy you?" asked the third fairy. But for poor Effie's answer there came only a great sob and a flood of bitter tears.

However, there was real business to be done. Effie had come to fairy-land on purpose to be cured of her idleness, and the three fairies intended it to be no fault of theirs if she wasn't cured in a pretty short space of time, for the setting of tasks was a sort of work that these fairies found perfectly delightful.

They wouldn't give her what was the least difficult at first, they said, sweetly; she should have something to-day that was quite easy and pleasant. So the eldest of the fairies took her where a beautiful shrub was growing, all covered over with crimson flowers. Here she stood still, and looking at Effie quite pleasantly—

"All you will have to do this morning, my dear," she said, "will be to count the leaves upon this pretty tree. It's a piece of work scarcely worth mentioning—such a mere trifle, and may be completed in a couple of hours at farthest. Take the utmost care not to break off any of the leaves or blossoms, and don't come nearer the plant than is absolutely necessary. But above all, see that you count correctly. Now begin, and lose no time."

And with that the fairy nodded and smiled good-humoredly, and in another moment she was gone, and Effie was left alone.

It was a strange thing to give her to do, the child thought to herself, a sort of thing that was as much play as work, it seemed to her. However, as it was so like playing, she had no particular objection to count them, and began with a pretty good grace.

But, alas for poor little Effie's hopes of a quickly-done and easy task! For the first minute or two it had all been easy enough. She began at the top of the bush, and got hold of a nice leafy branch, and counted away, "one, two, three," quite glibly and at her ease. But by the time she had told off about fifty leaves it suddenly struck her that she had passed over a certain little spray. Had she passed it over or not? She paused to consider, and while she considered, she first forgot the number she had reached to, and then she forgot the place on the branch where she had stopped. "Oh, how stupid of me!" she cried, vexed and disappointed. "Now I must begin over again." And with a sigh she recommenced her work.

But again, and again, and again the same thing happened. She forgot what she had counted and what she hadn't, and got confused, and lost her place, and had to begin afresh.

At last, bursting into tears, she threw herself down on the grass at the foot of the tree, and declared that she neither could nor would go on counting any more. So she sat on the grass sobbing, and thinking of her mother and the pleasant days at home, till the fairy returned.

"Hey-day! what's the matter here?" she exclaimed, sharply.

And then poor little Effie got up sadly, and told her that for the life of her she couldn't count the leaves.

"Not count the leaves, you little goose!" cried the fairy. "What in the world is the good of you if you can't even so much as count leaves? Look at me!" And stepping to the bush, the fairy leaped up among the branches, and certainly began to count the leaves at a most amazing rate. Whether she really counted them all or not it was indeed impossible for Effie to say, but she ran up the hundreds so fast that even to listen to her was a thing to take away your breath, and at the end of ten minutes down she jumped lightly again upon the ground, and triumphantly declared that on the tree, from top to bottom, there were exactly six thousand and forty-nine leaves—neither more nor less.

"And this is what you have the face to tell me you have found it impossible to do in the course of two whole hours!" said the fairy, indignantly.

"I am sure I did try to do it. I am very sorry I was so stupid," she said, sadly. "I hope I shall do the next thing you set me better."

"I'm sure I hope so too," answered the fairy, dryly. "But come—it's no use crying about it. As this is your first day I'll pass the matter over. It will be my sister's turn, however, to set you your task to-morrow, and I warrant you you'll find her a stiffer kind of customer to deal with. Now, then, if you like, you may go and play; but mind you keep out of mischief," said the fairy, sternly.

And away she went, and left Effie to amuse and console herself as she best could.

For a little while Effie was sad enough; but after a little while, as she went wandering on in the glowing, golden light, with every thing about her looking so strange, and beautiful, and new, she presently began to take heart again, and to think that perhaps, after all, it wouldn't be so very hard to live for a time in fairy-land. "Oh, if there were only some other children here, how nice it would be!" she exclaimed to herself, when what should she see, not fifty yards away from her—a real living human child, sitting and sewing by the river's edge.

"Oh!" cried Effie, at this unlooked-for sight, and sprang forward with such eagerness that in half a dozen seconds she was at the little girl's side. "Oh, I am so glad! Where have you come from? How long have you been here? Who are you?" cried Effie, throwing her arms about her, and quite breathless with delight.

But the child shrank back a little, and lifted up her eyes with a strange, unsurprised look.

"I've been here a long time—I don't know how long," she said, slowly. "Oh yes; a long, long time!" she said, and turned again to her work, and quietly went on sewing.

She was making wonderful little fairy garments out of a piece of silver gossamer—making them so daintily and so wonderfully quickly.

Effie stood looking at her in a kind of frightened amazement. Was she a human child or not? she thought.

"I have four-and-twenty more of them to make," the child said, just in the same slow, tired way, when Effie had stood silently staring at her for a minute or more; "and it will be hard work to get them done. They must all be finished, you know, for the dance to-night."

"But how can you make four-and-twenty dresses before night?" cried Effie, quite aghast.

"Oh, I have often as much as that to do," said the child, quietly. "I made forty dresses the other day. One gets used to doing things very quickly here. But don't talk to me, please," she said, all in the same weary, sorrowful way.

For a long, long time they sat quiet together, till at length the child laid down the last of the long line of dresses, and gave a little sigh.

"They're all ready now, unless there should be any thing to alter in them. Sometimes they don't fit, you know, and then that gives me a great deal of trouble," she said, in her sad, patient voice.

"I wish you would tell me who you are, and why you are made to do these things?" said Effie.

"The fairies make me do them," the child replied. "They taught me years and years ago."

"How can that be when you are only a child the same as me?" cried Effie, staring at her with great eyes.

"Those who live here stay children forever," she answered, sadly. "I have been like this for years and years. Nothing ever changes or grows old in fairy-land. I have been here so long that nobody will ever come to claim me."

Effie sat and watched her with pity and pain. She wondered what she could do to cheer her and make her brighter up a little; and then at last she came to her, and softly stole an arm about her neck.

"I want to love you. Do let me love you. I should so like to do it; and I am so very, very sorry for you," she said. And Effie kissed and petted her until the strange child cried, and then smiled. Afterward they had a long talk.

At length the child began to collect the little frocks together into a basket, and said she must go.

"But you haven't told me your name?" cried Effie. "My name is Effie. What is yours?"

"I haven't had a name for so many years," the child said, plaintively. "I was called Bertha once, long ago."

"Then I'll call you Bertha now," said Effie. "And I wish you could stay. I shall be so dull without you."

But Bertha took up her basket on her arm, and, nodding at Effie with a little smile, went away.

Poor little Effie, lonely and sad, threw herself down with her face upon the grass, sobbing and crying, till at last she was so exhausted that her eyes began to close quite unconsciously; and presently she fell fast asleep.

Effie was aroused the next morning by a most curious little tapping going on all round her head, which, when she looked up, startled and confused, she found to proceed from the second of the three fairies, who was stooping down over her, boxing her ears with all her might.

"Oh, so you're going to awake at last!" said the fairy. "It's amazing how you mortals sleep! But come—don't sit there staring at me. Stand up and get your wits about you. I have something for you to do immediately."

And with that the fairy led the way, and Effie followed her, till they came where a most prodigious number of little shoes were lying, all in a great mass together—shoes of every color and every shade of color—more shoes, it seemed to Effie, than could possibly be needed to supply the whole of fairy-land.

"These have just come home from the shoe-maker. You will go over them, and put them together in pairs," the fairy said. "It will be a very nice little amusement for you, and the easiest thing to do in all the world. Only mind you look sharp, and don't put odd shoes together. Look!—this is the way to begin." And, with the speed of lightning, the fairy picked two little pale-blue shoes out of the great heap and set them side by side upon the grass. "Now, set to work, and don't waste time," she said. "I shall be back to see that you have finished in a couple of hours."

And then she went off, and left Effie before the heap of shoes that was so big that it was really like a little hill.

There were thousands and thousands of shoes,

"MANY AN HOUR DID SHE SPEND IN WATCHING THE FAIRIES AS THEY DANCED ON THE GREEN."

"I wonder how I am ever to match them all!" Effie thought, and took up one at random, and began to look about for its fellow. But it was very nearly as bad as looking for a needle in a bundle of hay! The shoes were so various, and the number of them was so great, that the more she looked at them the more she wondered how she or any body else was ever to get them all arranged into pairs. A dozen different shoes did she take up, one after another, and not the fellow could she find to a single one of them. Again and again she would think for a moment that she had matched a shoe; she would search about with a green one in her hand perhaps, and presently would hit upon another green one that seemed to be the very image of it; but no sooner would she have picked it out from among the rest than some minute shade of difference would show itself—either there would be the least possible variation in the color, or the one little shoe would have a button in front of it and the other a tassel, or the one would be stitched with green and the other with red, or the one would have a high heel and the other a low heel, or in one of half a dozen other ways it would appear on examination that the two shoes didn't belong to each other, and Effie could do nothing but renew her search again and again and again till she was quite dispirited and weary.

After a time, just as she had done yesterday, she fell to crying for very vexation; and when a whole hour had passed, she had only out of the whole number matched two solitary pairs of shoes. She sat down upon the grass in despair, and spent the second hour in crying and thinking how miserable she was.

Of course when the fairy came back, she was in a pretty passion. She looked at the shoes, and then she looked at Effie, and then she declared that she had never been so much shocked or astonished in all her life.

"I've matched these two pairs, and I'm sure I tried for an hour with all my might, and I couldn't match another one of them," said Effie, half frightened, but quite as sulky as she was afraid.

"You tried for an hour, and only succeeded in matching two pairs of shoes!" cried the fairy. "It's impossible! it's incredible! Look at me, you wicked child!" And with that the fairy began to pick up shoes here and there and in every direction from the mass, as fast as her fingers could move.

She was certainly worth looking at! Quickly as the first fairy had counted the leaves yesterday, that was really nothing compared with the quickness with which this second fairy matched her shoes. Effie's very eyes got dazzled as she looked at her. She skipped about the mass, hither and thither, up and down, and with every skip she made she got together not only one but half a dozen pairs of shoes. Line after line of them she spread out upon the grass, long straight lines of bright-colored little slippers, all in twos and twos, till at the end of a quarter of an hour she had got every shoe paired, though she was certainly rather out of breath when her work was completed.

As soon as she could speak again she turned to Effie, and began to scold her with all her might; and then she clapped her hands, and half a dozen fairies as quick as thought came running forward, all armed with little birch brooms, and they instantly seized on Effie, and tore her frock off her shoulders, and began to belabor her poor little back with all their might and main.

And then, when the whipping was over, the fairy said that of course it was absurd to think that she was to spend the rest of this day in amusing herself, and accordingly, whipping a little chain out of her pocket, she quickly whisked one end of it round Effie's waist, and then throwing the other round the branch of a tree, she fastened both securely with a pair of neat little padlocks, and left Effie to her meditations.

There was nothing for it, of course, but to sit still all day; and very sadly Effie sat, and a very doleful day she had of it. She saw nothing of Bertha, nor of any body else, and long before night came she was glad to curl herself up on the grass and cry herself to sleep. But, when she had once gone to sleep, she slept so comfortably and soundly that she never awoke again till the third fairy came next morning to rouse her.

The sight of her, however, made her open her eyes pretty quickly.

"Humph! you've had a fine idle time of it," said the fairy, looking at her ill-temperedly.

"You've been fast asleep all night, I've no doubt?"

"I hadn't any thing else to do, I'm sure," said Effie, rather humbly. On which the fairy took her up sharp enough.

"Oh, you had nothing else to do, had you?" she said. "We'll mend that, my dear. Nothing to do! upon my word!" And she unlocked the chain with a snap, and clapped it in her pocket. "Now, come with me; I have something for you to do," she said, sharply; and so Effie and she walked off together, till, after a few minutes, they met a little elf who was coming toward them laden with two great bags. These the fairy took, and turned out the contents of one of them on the grass; and very pretty contents they were: hundreds and hundreds of little skeins of silk of every hue—quite miniature fairy skeins, that were the prettiest little things, Effie thought, that she had ever seen.

As soon as they were all spread out the fairy opened the other bag, and tossed forth a prodigious number of little reels.

"Now, set to work and wind these silks," she said, "and see that you do it neatly and quickly. It's the very easiest work in all the world. Set to work now and don't waste time. As there are a good many skeins I will allow you four hours for winding them."

And then the fairy went off and left Effie to herself.

Well, Effie had often wound skeins of silk before now; it was a kind of thing, indeed, that she quite liked to do; so, feeling a good deal comforted that her task for to-day was nothing worse than this, she took up a beautiful little rose-colored skein, and began carefully to unfasten the knot in which it was tied, and to open it out, and then, selecting one of the little reels, she prepared to wind away. But alas for Effie's hopes of winding the fairy silk! At every touch she gave the thread it broke in two; handle it as cautiously as she might it snapped in her fingers a dozen times in a minute. She tried, and tried, but she could no more wind it than she could have wound spiders' webs.

What in the world was Effie to do? By the end of a quarter of an hour she had given up trying, and was sitting on the grass with her hands folded on her knees, too miserable and frightened almost to cry. When what should she see all at once but Bertha running toward her!

"Oh, Bertha!" she cried out joyfully at this sight, and sprang up and would have thrown her arms about her neck; but Bertha was evidently in a desperate hurry, and had no time for any little ceremonies of this kind.

"I've come to show you how to wind these silks," she cried, all breathless. "No, no; don't kiss me, please. Sit down here and look at what I do, for I've hardly a minute to stay." And without waiting another moment she caught up one of the skeins, and opening it as quick as lightning, began to show Effie what to do.

All kinds of wonderful little tricks and dextrous contrivances she showed her by which, in spite of the fineness of the fairy silk, it was made possible for human fingers to wind it. They were not easy to learn, and Effie for a time thought that she should never make any thing of them at all; but the child, who was the most patient little teacher, made her try again and again, till at last she got the knack of them, and wound off a whole skein without breaking the thread once.

"Now you know all I can teach you, and I must not stay another moment," Bertha said then, and jumped up from the grass, where she had been sitting by Effie's side, and dropped a quick kiss upon her lips and ran away; and Effie, left alone once more, went on with her work so cheerily and briskly that at the end of the four hours, when the fairy came back, she had finished winding every skein that had been in the bag save three.

You should have seen the fairy's face when she caught sight of all the neatly-filled reels, and saw Effie sitting in the midst of them winding away and singing to herself. She was amazed and angry that she had no reason for scolding Effie. And in a very grumbling, ill-tempered way, she told the little girl that since she had really managed for once to get her task accomplished she might go and do what she pleased for the next hour or two, until she had time to set her some new task.

Well, it is quite impossible to tell all that Effie did on each separate day she lived in fairy-land. Day after day the three fairies set her some prodigious task to do, and day after day, with Bertha's help, Effie got through it somehow or other; till by degrees what had seemed so difficult at first became practicable, and sometimes almost easy. Effie, if she had staid at home, would never have learned one-tenth part of the wonderful things that she soon came to do quite dextrously among the fairies—dextrously, and even readily, for, to give them all the credit they deserved, the fairies did assuredly cure Effie of her idleness many a long day before her seven years with them were ended.

More and more industriously she went on week after week, and month after month, doing her daily tasks; and when work-time was over, many a wild game she used to have with the mad-cap elves; and in the evenings, and in the clear long summer nights, many an hour did she spend in watching the fairies as they danced upon the green, and held their gay midnight revels, and a most amazing amount of merriment and fun she heard and saw.

Many a long happy hour did Bertha and Effie spend together—whenever they could manage it doing their work side by side, passing every leisure moment that was possible with one another, walking about the beautiful fairy gardens, and playing in the golden sunshine, and talking-talking-talking forever of the dear old world that one of them thought she should never see again.

This was their one great sorrow—the thought that at the end of Effie's seven years Bertha must be left in fairy-land alone.

At length Effie's seven years expired—the very last day had come. Had the fairies forgotten it? Oh no!

"I believe this is the night your mother talked of coming for you," the first fairy said carelessly, yawning, and speaking as if she was altogether thinking of something else. "She isn't very likely to come, I fancy, but you may as well be ready for her in case she should."

"Oh dear no, she isn't the least likely to come," said the second fairy, as if it were quite absurd to think of such a thing. "You may get ready if you like, but I know it will surprise me vastly if we see any thing of her."

"And every body else too, I should think," said the third fairy, snappishly. And then the fairies went away.

Would her mother forget, thought Effie; and she counted the moments anxiously. At length there was a sound of carriage wheels, and Effie heard her mother's voice saying, "I want my child."

"Mother, mother!" cried Effie; and the old fairy who kept the gate, cross at being awakened from sleep, began sulkily to unfasten the bolts and bars.

"Effie, hold me fast!" whispered Bertha; for they had long before resolved that both should go from fairy-land, and the two children's hands were clasped fast together. There was something of a struggle, for the fairies had no wish to lose Bertha. But the gate swung open, and with a cry of joy they gave one great spring across the threshold, and Effie leaped into her mother's arms.

And Effie and Bertha lived together like sisters. They were so fond of each other that they could never bear to be separated; and they were as happy and industrious as any little girls ever need to be.

BABY NELL!

Nestling Nell! 'neath the down of the coverlet
Peeping, I catch the blue gleam of an eye;
Sentinel here let me stand, and, moreover, let
No one, unchallenged, pass noisily by;
May I not moralize here by your bassinet,
Give you, in fact, just a bit of my mind?
Flinging, with some of the fancies that pass in it,
Memories round it as lovingly twined?
Most can imagine, but who can tell
The life that's awaiting you, Baby Nell!

Pray, will you love from your heart, or capriciously
Try to be woman, or only a child?
Lily-like faces, which dimpled deliciously,
Sorrow can straighten when sorrow is wild.
Will you be praised for hair, teeth, eyes, or merriment?
Cast in a plain or elaborate mould?
How many hearts will you use for experiment?
Will you be married for love or for gold?
Fate is capricious, and stern as well;
How will she fashion you, Baby Nell?

Nestling Nell! let maidenhood dawn on you,
Then will come bachelors ready to wive;
Fifty-and-six will be happy to fawn on you,
Kisses come sweeter from twenty-and-five.
Say, will you sigh for a park or a hernery,
Sitting coquettishly braiding your hair?
Will you be happy with books and a fernery,
Cozy—with some one—on Madison Square?
Will you be tied to a well-born swell,
Or fight for a plebeian, Baby Nell?

Will you prefer poet Tupper to Tennyson,
Doat upon novels or teaching in schools?
Mild like to veal, or be wild like to venison,
Happy-go-lucky, or martyr to rules?
As to unhappiness, all I can say for it,
Grant that its finger mayn't darken your brow;
Then, if it pass you by—ah! how I pray for it!
Smile, little pet, as you're trying to now.
Life is a riddle, and who can tell
The fate of poor little Baby Nell?

BABY NELL—"LIFE IS A RIDDLE, AND WHO CAN TELL THE FATE OF POOR LITTLE BABY NELL?"

THE REFUSAL.

"REMEMBER as soon as you wake,
If the season you would not be scorning,
You must for your Valentine take
The first whom you see in the morning."

Amelia to Bella with mirth
Thus whispered, when bedward proceeding
(The tale of "The Fair Maid of Perth")
I think she had lately been reading).

Now Dawdle ('twas truly absurd)
Had to Bella been mighty attentive,
And when this low whisper he heard
He was seized with a fancy inventive.

His billiards that night he declined,
And his tumbler of brandy and soda
(His third glass at other times, mind,
He scarcely considered a coda).

He would not stop up for a weed
(Though Jack at such shirking grew surly);
He declared he was sorry indeed,
But "he had to be getting up early!"

Next morning our Dawdle arose
While the dawn was still glimmering dimly;
Slept shivering into his clothes,
And twirled his mustache very trimly,

To meet the dear girl he adored,
Stole down stairs, unfortunate spooner!
And found himself thoroughly floored,
For she'd risen an hour or two sooner.

She was out looking after the flow'rs,
The green-house with beauty adorning,
And said she'd been up for some hours
When he found her, and wished her "good-morning."

Quoth he, "Whom the first you behold
Is the Valentine fate would allot you—
That I am that man I make bold
To hope"—But she answered, "'Twas not you!"

"I peeped from my window at dawn,
Of the weather to be a beholder,
And saw Cousin Frank on the lawn
Going out, double-barrel on shoulder."

"Well, Frank's be that luck," answered he;
"I'd ask for a title that's dearer—
My wife, sweetest Bella, to be,
I pray you—I can not be clearer!"

"Too late, Mr. Dawdle! For here
Is Frank, too, the earlier comer—
Engaged—let me see—for a year,
We're going to be married in summer!"

CHAPTER XXXI.

PAOLO LANGHETTI.

MANY weeks passed on, and music still formed the chief occupation in life for Despard and Mrs. Thornton. His journey to Brandon village had been without result. He knew not what to do. The inquiries which he made every where turned out useless. Finally Thornton informed him that it was utterly hopeless, at a period so long after the event, to attempt to do any thing whatever. Enough had been done long ago. Now nothing more could possibly be effected.

Baffled, but not daunted, Despard fell back for the present from his purpose, yet still cherished it and wrote to different quarters for information. Meantime he had to return to his life at Holby, and Mrs. Thornton was still ready to assist him.

So the time went on, and the weeks passed, till one day in March Despard went up as usual.

On entering the parlor he heard voices, and saw a stranger. Mrs. Thornton greeted him as usual and sat down smiling. The stranger rose, and he and Despard looked at one another.

He was of medium size and slight in figure. His brow was very broad and high. His hair was black, and clustered in curls over his head. His eyes were large, and seemed to possess an unfathomable depth, which gave them a certain undefinable and mystic meaning—liquid eyes, yet lustrous, where all the soul seemed to live and show itself—benignant in their glance, yet lofty, like the eyes of a being from some superior sphere. His face was thin and shaven close, his lips also were thin, with a perpetual smile of marvelous sweetness and gentleness hovering about them. It was such a face as artists love to give to the Apostle John—the sublime, the divine, the loving, the inspired.

"You do not know him," said Mrs. Thornton. "It is Paolo!"

Despard at once advanced and greeted him with the warmest cordiality.

"I was only a little fellow when I saw you last, and you have changed somewhat since then," said Despard. "But when did you arrive? I knew that you were expected in England, but was not sure that you would come here."

"What! Teresuola mia," said Langhetti, with a fond smile at his sister. "Were you really not sure, sorellina, that I would come to see you first of all? Infidel!" and he shook his head at her, playfully.

A long conversation followed, chiefly about Langhetti's plans. He was going to engage a place in London for his opera, but wished first to secure a singer. Oh, if he only could find Bice—his Bice, the divinest voice that mortal ever heard.

Despard and Mrs. Thornton exchanged glances, and at last Despard told him that there was a person of the same name at Brandon Hall. She was living in a seclusion so strict that it seemed confinement, and there was a mystery about her situation which he had tried without success to fathom.

Langhetti listened with a painful surprise that seemed like positive anguish.

"Then I must go myself. Oh, my Bice—to what misery have you come— But do you say that you have been there?"

"Yes."

"Did you go to the Hall?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"Because I know the man to be a villain indescribable—"

Langhetti thought for a moment, and then said,

"True, he is all that, and perhaps more than you imagine."

"ONWARD SHE SPED, AND STILL ONWARD, THROUGH THE DENSE UNDERBRUSH."

"I have done the utmost that can be done!" said Despard.

"Perhaps so; still each one wishes to try for himself, and though I can scarce hope to be more successful than you, yet I must try, if only for my own peace of mind. Oh, Bice mia cara! to think of her sweet and gentle nature being subject to such torments as those ruffians can inflict!"

"You do not know how it is," said he at last, very solemnly; "but there are reasons of transcendent importance why Bice should be rescued. I can not tell them; but if I dared mention what I hope, if I only dared to speak my thoughts, you—you," he cried, with piercing emphasis, and in a tone that thrilled through Despard, to whom he spoke, "you would make it the aim of all your life to save her."

"I do not understand," said Despard, in astonishment.

"No, no," murmured Langhetti. "You do not; nor dare I explain what I mean. It has been in my thoughts for years. It was brought to my mind first in Hong Kong, when she was there. Only one person besides Potts can explain; only one."

"Who?" cried Despard, eagerly.

"A woman named Compton."

"Compton!"

"Yes. Perhaps she is dead. Alas, and alas, and alas, if she is! Yet could I but see that woman, I would tear the truth from her if I perished in the attempt!"

And Langhetti stretched out his long, slender hand, as though he were plucking out the very heart of some imaginary enemy.

"Think, Teresuola," said he, after a while, "if you were in captivity, what would become of my opera? Could I have the heart to think about operas, even if I believed that they contributed to the welfare of the world, if your welfare was at stake. Now you know that next to you stands Bice. I must try and save her—I must give up all. My opera must stand aside till it be God's will that I give it forth. No, the one object of my life now must be to find Bice, to see her or to see Mrs. Compton, if she is alive."

"Is the secret of so much importance?" asked Despard.

Langhetti looked at him with mournful meaning.

"If you but suspected it," said he, "your peace of mind would be lost. I will therefore on no account tell it."

Despard looked at him wonderingly. What could he mean? How could any one affect him! His peace of mind! That had been lost long ago. And if this secret was so terrible it would distract his mind from its grief, its care, and its longing. Peace would be restored rather than destroyed.

"I must find her. I must find her," said Langhetti, speaking half to himself. "I am weak; but much can be done by a resolute will."

"Perhaps Mr. Thornton can assist you," said Despard.

Langhetti shook his head.

"No; he is a man of law, and does not understand the man who acts from feeling. I can be as logical as he, but I obey impulses which are unintelligible to him. He would simply advise me to give up the matter, adding, perhaps, that I would do myself no good. Whereas he can not understand that it makes no difference to me whether I do myself good or not; and again, that the highest good that I can do myself is to seek after her."

Mrs. Thornton looked at Despard, but he avoided her glance.

"No," said Langhetti, "I will ask assistance from another—from you, Despard. You are one who acts as I act. Come with me."

"When?"

"To-morrow morning."

"I will."

"Of course you will. You would not be a Despard if you did not. You would not be the son of your father—your father!" he repeated, in thrilling tones, as his eyes flashed with enthusiasm. "Despard!" he cried, after a pause, "your father was a man whom you might pray to now. I saw him once. Shall I ever forget the day when he calmly went to lay down his life for my father? Despard, I worship your father's memory. Come with me. Let us emulate those two noble men who once before rescued a captive. We can not risk our lives as they did. Let us at least do what we can."

"I will do exactly what you say. You can think and I will act."

"No, you must think too. Neither of us belong to the class of practical men whom the world now delights to honor; but no practical man would go on our errand. No practical man would have rescued my father. Generous and lofty acts must always be done by those who are not practical men."

"But I must go out. I must think," he continued. "I will go and walk about the grounds."

Saying this he left the room.

"Where is Edith Brandon?" asked Despard, after he had gone.

"She is here," said Mrs. Thornton.

"Have you seen her?"

"Yes."

"Is she what you anticipated?"

"More. She is indescribable. She is almost unearthly. I feel awe of her, but not fear. She is too sweet to inspire fear."

CHAPTER XXXII.

FLIGHT.

THE last entry in Beatrice's journal was made by her in the hope that it might be the last.

In her life at Brandon Hall her soul had grown stronger and more resolute. Besides, it had now come to this, that henceforth she must either stay and accept the punishment which they might contrive or fly instantly.

For she had dared them to their faces; she had told them of their crimes; she had threatened punishment. She had said that she was the avenger of Despard. If she had desired instant death she could have said no more than that. Would they pass it by? She knew their secret—the secret of secrets; she had proclaimed it to their faces. She had called Potts a Thug and disowned him as her father; what now remained?

But one thing—flight. And this she was fully resolved to try. She prepared nothing. To gain the outside world was all she wished. The need of money was not thought of; nor if it had been would it have made any difference. She could not have obtained it.

The one idea in her mind was therefore flight. She had concealed her journal under a loose piece of the flooring in one of the closets of her room, being unwilling to encumber herself with it, and dreading the result of a search in case she was captured.

She made no other preparations whatever. A light hat and a thin jacket were all that she took to resist the chill air of March. There was a fever in her veins which was heightened by excitement and suspense.

Mrs. Compton was in her room during the evening. Beatrice said but little. Mrs. Compton talked cheerfully about the few topics on which she generally spoke. She never dared talk about the affairs of the house.

Beatrice was not impatient, for she had no idea of trying to escape before midnight. She sat silently while Mrs. Compton talked or prosed, absorbed in her own thoughts and plans. The hours seemed to her interminable. Slowly and heavily they dragged on. Beatrice's suspense and excitement grew stronger every moment, yet by a violent effort she preserved so perfect an outward calm that a closer observer than Mrs. Compton would have failed to detect any emotion.

At last, about ten o'clock, Mrs. Compton retired, with many kind wishes to Beatrice, and many anxious counsels as to her health. Beatrice listened patiently, and made some general remarks, after which Mrs. Compton withdrew.

She was now left to herself, and two hours still remained before she could dare to venture. She paced the room fretfully and anxiously, wondering why it was that the time seemed so long, and looking from time to time at her watch in the hope of finding that half an hour had passed, but seeing to her disappointment that only two or three minutes had gone.

At last eleven o'clock came. She stole out quietly into the hall and went to the top of the grand stairway. There she stood and listened.

The sound of voices came up from the dining-room, which was near the hall-door. She knew to whom those voices belonged. Evidently it was not yet the time for her venture.

She went back, controlling her excitement as best she might. At last, after a long, long suspense, midnight sounded.

Again she went to the head of the stairway. The voices were still heard. They kept late hours down there. Could she try now, while they were still up? Not yet.

Not yet. The suspense became agonizing. How could she wait? But she went back again to her room, and smothered her feelings until one o'clock came.

Again she went to the head of the stairway. She heard nothing. She could see a light streaming from the door of the dining-hall below. Lights, also, were burning in the hall itself; but she heard no voices.

Softly and quietly she went down stairs. The lights flashed out through the door of the dining-room into the hall; and as she arrived at the foot of the stairs she heard subdued voices in conversation. Her heart beat faster. They were all there! What if they now discovered her! What mercy would they show her, even if they were capable of mercy?

Fear lent wings to her feet. She was almost afraid to breathe for fear that they might hear her. She stole on quietly and noiselessly up the passage that led to the north end, and at last reached it.

All was dark there. At this end there was a door. On each side was a kind of recess formed by the pillars of the doorway. The door was generally used by the servants, and also by the inmates of the house for convenience.

The key was in it. There was no light in the immediate vicinity. Around it all was gloom. Near by was a stairway, which led to the servants' hall.

She took the key in her hands, which trembled violently with excitement, and turned it in the lock.

Scarcely had she done so when she heard footsteps and voices behind her. She looked hastily back, and, to her horror, saw two servants approaching with a lamp. It was impossible for her now to open the door and go out. Concealment was her only plan.

But how? There was no time for hesitation. Without stopping to think she slipped into one of the niches formed by the projecting pillars, and gathered her skirts close about her so as to be as little conspicuous as possible. There she stood awaiting the result. She half wished that she had turned back. For if she were now discovered in evident concealment what excuse could she give? She could not hope to bribe them, for she had no money. And, what was worst, these servants were the two who had been the most insolent to her from the first.

She could do nothing, therefore, but wait. They came nearer, and at last reached the door. "Hallo!" said one, as he turned the key.

"It's been unlocked!"

"It hasn't been locked yet," said the other.

"Yes, it has. I locked it myself, an hour ago. Who could have been here?"

"Any one," said the other, quietly. "Our blessed young master has, no doubt, been out this way."

"No, he hasn't. He hasn't stirred from his whisky since eight o'clock."

"Nonsense! You're making a fuss about nothing. Lock the door and come along."

"Any how, I'm responsible, and I'll get a precious overhauling if this thing goes on. I'll take the key with me this time."

And saying this, the man locked the door and took out the key. Both of them then descended to the servants' hall.

The noise of that key as it grated in the lock sent a thrill through the heart of the trembling listener. It seemed to take all hope from her. The servants departed. She had not been discovered. But what was to be done? She had not been prepared for this.

She stood for some time in despair. She thought of other ways of escape. There was the hall-door, which she did not dare to try, for she would have to pass directly in front of the dining-room. Then there was the south door at the other end of the building, which was seldom used. She knew of no others. She determined to try the south door.

Quietly and swiftly she stole away, and glided, like a ghost, along the entire length of the building. It was quite dark at the south end, as it had been at the north. She reached the door without accident.

There was no key in it. It was locked. Escape by that way was impossible.

She stood despairing. Only one way was now left, and that lay through the hall-door itself.

Suddenly, as she stood there, she heard footsteps. A figure came down the long hall straight toward her. There was not the slightest chance of concealment here. There were no pillars behind which she might crouch. She must stand, then, and take the consequences. Or, rather, would it not be better to walk forward and meet this new-comer? Yes; that would be best. She determined to do so.

So, with a quiet, slow step she walked back through the long corridor. About half-way she met the other. He stopped and started back.

"Miss Potts!" he exclaimed, in surprise.

It was the voice of Philips.

"Ah, Philips," said she, quietly, "I am walking about for exercise and amusement. I can not sleep. Don't be startled. It's only me."

Philips stood like one paralyzed.

"Don't be cast down," he said at last, in a trembling voice. "You have friends, powerful friends. They will save you."

"What do you mean?" asked Beatrice, in wonder.

"Never mind," said Philips, mysteriously. "It will be all right. I dare not tell. But cheer up."

"What do you mean by friends?"

"You have friends who are more powerful than your enemies, that's all," said Philips, hurriedly.

"Cheer up."

Beatrice wondered. A vague thought of Brandon came over her mind, but she dismissed it at once. Yet the thought gave her a delicious joy, and at once dispelled the extreme agitation which had thus far disturbed her. Could Philips be connected with him? Was he in reality considerate about her while shaping the course of his gloomy vengeance? These were the thoughts which flashed across her mind as she stood.

"I don't understand," said she, at last; "but I hope it may be as you say. God knows, I need friends!"

She walked away, and Philips also went onward. She walked slowly, until at last his steps died out in the distance. Then a door banged. Evidently she had nothing to fear from him. At last she reached the main-hall, and stopped for a moment. The lights from the dining-room were still flashing out through the door. The grand entrance lay before her. There was the door of the hall, the only way of escape that now remained. Dare she try it?

She deliberated long. Two alternatives lay before her—to go back to her own room, or to try to pass that door. To go back was as repulsive as death, in fact more so. If the choice had been placed full before her then, to die on the spot or to go back to her room, she would have deliberately chosen death. The thought of returning, therefore, was the last upon which she could dwell, and that of going forward was the only one left. To this she gave her attention.

At last she made up her mind, and advanced cautiously, close by the wall, toward the hall-door. After a time she reached the door of the dining-room. Could she venture to pass it, and how? She paused. She listened. There were low voices in the room. Then they were still awake, still able to detect her if she passed the door.

She looked all around. The hall was wide. On the opposite side the wall was but feebly lighted. The hall lights had been put out, and those which shone from the room extended forward but a short distance. It was just possible therefore to escape observation by crossing the doorway along the wall that was most distant from it.

Yet before she tried this she ventured to put forward her head so as to peep into the room. She stooped low and looked cautiously and slowly.

The three were there at the farthest end of the room. Bottles and glasses stood before them, and they were conversing in low tones. Those tones, however, were not so low but that they reached her ears. They were speaking about her.

"How could she have found it out?" said Clark.

"Mrs. Compton only knows one thing," said Potts, "and that is the secret about her. She knows nothing more. How could she?"

"Then how could that cursed girl have found out about the Thug business?" exclaimed John.

There was no reply.

"She's a deep one," said John, "d—d deep—deeper than I ever thought. I always said she was plucky—cursed plucky—but now I see she's deep too—and I begin to have my doubts about the way she ought to be took down."

"I never could make her out," said Potts.

"And now I don't even begin to understand how she could know that which only we have known. Do you think, Clark, that the devil could have told her of it?"

"Yes," said Clark. "Nobody but the devil could have told her that, and my belief is that she's the devil himself. She's the only person I ever felt afraid of. D—n it, I can't look her in the face."

Beatrice retreated and passed across to the opposite wall. She did not wish to see or hear more. She glided by. She was not noticed.

She heard John's voice—sharp and clear—

"We'll have to begin to-morrow and take her down—that's a fact." This was followed by silence.

Beatrice reached the door. She turned the knob. Oh, joy! it was not locked. It opened.

Noiselessly she passed through; noiselessly she shut it behind her. She was outside. She was free.

The moon shone brightly. It illumined the lawn in front and the tops of the clumps of trees whose dark foliage rose before her. She saw all this; yet, in her eagerness to escape, she saw nothing more, but sped away swiftly down the steps, across the lawn, and under the shade of the trees.

Which way should she go? There was the main avenue which led in a winding direction toward the gate and the porter's lodge. There was also another path which the servants generally took. This led to the gate also. Beatrice thought that by going down this path she might come near the gate and then turn off to the wall and try and climb over.

A few moments of thought were sufficient for her decision. She took the path and went hurriedly along, keeping on the side where the shadow was thickest.

She walked swiftly, until at length she came to a place where the path ended. It was close by the porter's lodge. Here she paused to consider.

Late as it was there were lights in the lodge and voices at the door. Some one was talking with the porter. Suddenly the voices ceased and a man came walking toward the place where she stood.

To dart into the thick trees where the shadow lay deepest was the work of a moment. She stood and watched. But the underbrush was dense, and the crackling which she made attracted the man's attention. He stopped for a moment, and then rushed straight toward the place where she was.

Beatrice gave herself up for lost. She rushed on wildly, not knowing where she went. Behind her was the sound of her pursuer. He followed resolutely and relentlessly. There was no refuge for her but continued flight.

Onward she sped, and still onward, through the dense underbrush, which at every step gave notice of the direction which she had taken. Perhaps if she had been wiser she would have plunged into some thick growth of trees into the midst of absolute darkness and there remained still. As it was she did not think of this. Escape was her only thought, and the only way to this seemed to be by flight.

So she fled; and after her came her remorseless, her un pitying pursuer. Fear lent wings to her feet. She fled on through the underbrush that crackled as she passed and gave notice of her track through the dark, dense groves; yet still amidst darkness and gloom her pursuer followed.

At last, through utter weakness and weariness, she sank down. Despair came over her. She could do no more.

The pursuer came up. So dense was the gloom in that thick grove that for some time he could not find her. Beatrice heard the crackling of the underbrush all around. He was searching for her.

She crouched down low and scarcely dared to breathe. She took refuge in the deep darkness, and determined to wait till her pursuer might give up his search. At last all was still.

Beatrice thought that he had gone. Yet in her fear she waited for what seemed to her an interminable period. At last she ventured to make a movement. Slowly and cautiously she rose to her feet and advanced. She did not know what direction to take; but she walked on, not caring where she went so long as she could escape pursuit.

Scarcely had she taken twenty steps when she heard a noise. Some one was moving. She stood still, breathless. Then she thought she had been mistaken. After waiting a long time she went on as before. She walked faster. The noise came again. It was close by. She stood still for many minutes.

Suddenly she bounded up, and ran as one runs for life. Her long rest had refreshed her. Despair gave her strength. But the pursuer was on her track. Swiftly, and still more swiftly, his footsteps came up behind her. He was gaining on her. Still she rushed on.

At last a strong hand seized her by the shoulder, and she sank down upon the moss that lay under the forest trees.

"Who are you?" cried a familiar voice.

"Vijal!" cried Beatrice.

The other let go his hold.

"Will you betray me?" cried Beatrice, in a mournful and despairing voice.

Vijal was silent.

"What do you want?" said he, at last. "Whatever you want to do I will help you. I will be your slave."

"I wish to escape."

"Come then—you shall escape," said Vijal.

Without uttering another word he walked on and Beatrice followed. Hope rose once more within her. Hope gave strength. Despair and its weakness had left her. After about half an hour's walk they reached the park wall.

"I thought it was a poacher," said Vijal, sadly; "yet I am glad it was you, for I can help you. I will help you over the wall."

He raised her up. She clambered to the top, where she rested for a moment.

"God bless you, Vijal, and good-by!" said she.

Vijal said nothing.

The next moment she was on the other side. The road lay there. It ran north away from the village. Along this road Beatrice walked swiftly.

COPYING WHEEL.

WE have completed our arrangements for the manufacture of the Dotter or Copying Wheel mentioned in a former Number, and shall be ready in a few days to fill orders for the same. This ingenious little instrument consists of a wheel of steel points, revolving on a pivot, and set in a rosewood handle, by means of which the patterns on the Supplement can be copied with the greatest facility. The Supplement is laid over stiff brown or white paper, placed on a soft pine board or several layers of paper, and the wheel is rolled over the pattern desired, thus puncturing the outline on the paper beneath. The Dotter can be had of news-dealers or agents generally, or will be sent by mail by HARPER & BROTHERS on the receipt of 25 cents—the retail price.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Uncolored Japan, 90c., $1, $1 10; best, $1 25 per lb.
Gunpowder, $1 25; best, $1 50 per lb.

Coffees roasted and ground daily.
Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.
Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.
Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lots at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.
Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

THE accompanying piquant illustration and poem picture the "Kettledrum," or afternoon tea-drinking, now so fashionable in English society, and which, though not yet fully Americanized, is destined to follow our morning receptions:

"It is so pleasant, this sort of thing,
Unsophisticated, you know, and nice."
Says the lady, "Will you kindly ring?"
And the tea comes up in a trice.

An excellent thing is your Kettledrum,
For the ladies like it. Don't you see,
There's nothing that sooner strikes men dumb
Than the feminine fancy for tea.

Tea, wherever tea can be drunk, they like,
Or pretend to like, though I guess Champagne
Would their foolish frolic fancies strike,
If they dared to speak them plain.

But they may drink tea, and they may not sip
Just when they please, the effervescing
Wine that was made for a lady's lip,
Deliciously caressing.

And they may—'tis a privilege immense—
Invite to their Kettledrums swell young fellows,
So charmingly devoid of sense
They'd not make Othello jealous.

Oh, I like to see them on their mettle,
These whiskered boys with the hairy chin,
Handing about the silver kettle—
Youngsters devoid of tin.

A useful useless life they lead,
And there's always an awkward point about them,
"But the Kettledrum," our daughters plead,
"Would be nothing at all without them."

Vol. I.—No. 20.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 14, 1868.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

Marie Antoinette Fichu.

This fichu is of figured white silk lace, trimmed round the neck with a narrow, and round the outer edge with a wide puffing of the same material, edged on each side with a narrow piping of pink satin. The neck is also edged with narrow, and the bottom with wide blonde. A pink ribbon is laid under the puffings, and a bow of the same is set over the crossing of the ends in the back.

White Alpaca Waist.

This waist is of white alpaca, closed in front with blue silk buttons. A bodice is simulated thereon with a trimming of blue silk, scalloped round the top, and chain stitched with white crochet silk. This bodice is sewed fast to the waist. The neck and sleeves are trimmed with blue silk to match the bodice. The belt is of blue silk, trimmed with two rows of chain stitching with white crochet silk.

head erect and ready to strike. A striped border surrounds the whole.

Each workman has upon the bench by his side a box full of bobbins of colored yarns, and his shears, and a block by which to measure the thickness. The yarns are chosen with great deliberation, the workman's eye turning from bobbin to painting and painting to bobbin to be sure of the precise shade. They are worked into their place, one strand of several threads at a time, and are turned over an iron rod, which is formed into a knife at one end and a hook at the other. When several inches of the rod have been covered the workman pulls it through and the knife edge cuts the loops. The threads are then well hammered down on the back with a heavy iron comb whose thick teeth slip between the threads of the warp, after which the surface is trimmed with shears to precisely the proper thickness. The workman, or the artist as he claims to be called, next spends a long time tickling the velvet surface with one point of his shears in order that every fibre may

THE GOBELINS.

PERHAPS the largest piece of embroidery now in course of production any where—at least on this planet—is a carpet nearly thirty feet broad, nearly half an inch thick, and how long it does not yet appear, which is being wrought by hand at the tapestry works of the French Government in Paris, and said to be intended for the palace at Fontainebleau. The warp of stout linen threads or cords hangs in an upright loom of great length, before which, on a long wooden bench, sit eight or ten workmen of an intelligent and rather genteel appearance. The visitor is admitted behind the bench, and may walk along inspecting the operations of each.

The pattern is richly painted in oil-colors in full size, and the long roll of canvas containing it hangs over the heads of the workmen, so that it is at about the same distance from their eyes as the work before them. The design presents scrolls of yellow, olive, and drab, with a variety of flowers, displayed on a ground of blue so dark as to be mistaken by a careless eye for black. Stretched at length among the bright flowers is a large snake, with stand in its proper relation with the fibres of the line of threads next below, which are of a different shade; and then, perhaps, it is time to stop for noon.

It requires years of this slow process to produce one such fabric. Hence we may conclude that patience in expecting a new carpet is sometimes very necessary even to an Imperial housekeeper, when refurnishing a palace.

Other rooms in the same manufactory are occupied in the production of tapestries for hanging the palace walls. The rooms so used are long narrow halls or corridors lighted by the upper panes of glass in a row of windows upon one side, and having the whole interior painted green to temper the light to the eyes of the workmen. Opposite to the windows, and with the face of the work toward the light, stands a long line of looms, which are just far enough out from the wall to allow the workmen to sit screened behind them, where, seen through the cords of the warp, they may be compared to the animals in a row of cages in a menagerie. The work is all done on the back side in order to fasten and conceal the ends, the workman emerging from time to time to inspect the face.

The models for these embroideries are exquisite oil-paintings of historical and allegorical subjects, in designs suitable for the great panels in which they are to be presented, and are copied from the works of the first French artists. Not a few of the visitors who come to see the factory would prefer, if they were given their choice, to carry away one of these paintings though executed merely for the temporary uses of a pattern than the completed tapestry which is nominally so much more valuable.

The subjects are in various styles; landscapes, fruit, and flowers, birds, animals, and figures, and even portraits are executed with the utmost delicacy and accuracy. The transparent tints of the grape and the sparkle of precious stones are imitated with wonderful fidelity. In the show-rooms are displayed a number of completed works, the most conspicuous of which are full-length portraits of the Emperor and Empress, in robes of state. The drapery, especially in the picture of the Empress, elicits constant exclamations of admiration from the visitors who pass through the rooms.

Several hundred years ago, when the working of tapestry was a leading accomplishment among the ladies of the courts of England and France, and the palaces and feudal halls were hung with the handiwork of princesses and maids of honor, a Frenchman, named Jean Gobel, founded dye-works on the ground now occupied by this manufactory, and the establishment became famous for its fine colors, which were attributed in part to the peculiar properties of a brook which ran through the grounds. In process of time the honors of the tapestry loom passed from the aristocratic hands of the ladies of the court to the plebeian hands of paid artisans; and Gobel's establishment became so successful in such work that it was purchased by the Government; and now that machine-made fabrics have so far superseded the hand-wrought for general use, the works are continued solely for the decoration of the French palaces and the production of Imperial gifts, and for instruction and training of artisans in weaving and dyeing.

The growth of Paris meanwhile has enveloped the establishment with a labyrinth of dirty streets, which have no sidewalks, and are filled by a swarming population whose chief industry is the gathering of rags, waste paper, and cinders in other quarters of the town. The squalid monotony of this region is once or twice a week relieved by the carriages of visitors who come to witness the processes of the factory.

COPYING WHEEL.—This Wheel, by means of which patterns can be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease, is now ready, and can be had of most of the News-dealers; or will be sent by mail, postage prepaid, on the receipt of 25 cents.

Single Subscribers to HARPER'S BAZAR will be supplied from Number One to the end of the year 1868, which will complete the first Volume, for the yearly price of Four Dollars.

NATURAL AND ARTIFICIAL.

NATURE has established certain processes of her own for sustaining the vitality of the body. For these no artificial contrivances, however they may simulate natural operations, can be safely substituted. Chemistry has penetrated with marvelous insight into the mysteries of life, and with its tests and measures has become as familiar with the composition of the body and its elements as with the various substances and their component parts it so readily manipulates in its own laboratory. This science can even do more. It can recompose what it has so elaborately analyzed and separated into its elementary constituents. The air we breathe, the food we eat, and the heat by which we are warmed, may, after having been decomposed, be chemically recombined. The products which result, however, will not sustain life. Man or any other animal would soon be stifled with the air, starved with the food, and chilled to death with the heat compounded by the most skillful chemist, though his unerring tests would fail to detect any difference in the quantity and quality of the constituents of his own compositions and those of nature.

Science teaches and experience confirms that art can not free us from our original bondage to nature. Yet in spite of this absolute law there is a constant effort on the part of man to resist its obligations. This resistance manifests itself daily in our artificial life, especially where the pleasure is immediate and the danger remote. No one has ventured, we believe, to substitute for his daily beef-steak the nitrogen, carbon, and other elements of which the chemists tell us it is composed. Art has not yet discovered any flavoring sauce to render so windy and unsubstantial diet as the gaseous elements of our daily food more palatable than the solid substances of beef and pudding. When, however, this discovery shall be made there will, no doubt, be many a housekeeper who will go for his daily marketing to the chemist's shop instead of the butcher's stall, and get his wind-bags filled for dinner. Though his health will suffer and his life be quickly brought to a close we do not suppose that the imminence of any such dangers will check the absorption of the future human gas consumer.

Similar substitutions of artificial for natural provisions are in daily use among us, and though their consequences are fatal to health and life, they are seldom checked but by the disease and death they inevitably provoked. Our everyday life is replete with such examples. Those who use artificial stimulants, of whatever kind, as substitutes for the natural ones of the nervous system, are seldom deterred from the habit by its obvious dangers.

The ordinary practice of trusting almost exclusively to artificial heat for the warmth of the body is another example of the disobedience of a natural law which is perseveringly practiced though it brings with it the usual penalty of ill health. People are apt to suppose that to secure the sensation of heat is all that is necessary, and accordingly resort, for the purpose, to the various contrivances of furnaces and stoves in hermetically closed houses and rooms and endless coverings of thick clothing. This, however, is a great error. We must make heat as well as feel it. The process of its manufacture within the body is essential to its vitality. The combination of the carbon of the food we eat with the oxygen of the air we breathe not only produces heat but is an operation upon which every function of the animal system is more or less dependent. Any artificial substitute must, therefore, be injurious, as it dispenses with a vital process which is essential to the health of the whole body.

People can find in the outer air, in muscular exercise, and in the substantial food for which these alone will give the necessary appetite, the only sources of that heat essential to health. In repose we have little else to do than to retain it. This is done by means of proper clothing and the artificial warmth of the indoor fire. These, however, if relied upon to produce as well as preserve the bodily heat are sure to be used in excess, and act not only in directly injuring our health but indisposing us to face the cold exterior air and exert the muscular effort required in the manufacture of that animal heat so essential to life.

FIRESIDE CULTURE.

CULTURE is a much broader word than education. Without giving it the compass of signification that Mr. Arnold gave it in his sharp attack on British Philistinism, we may claim that it differs in kind as well as in degree from the technical instruction and training which ordinarily constitute education. Culture looks not to a specific part of our nature, not to the functions of a faculty nor to the workings of an organ, but to our nature in its wholeness, and hence to all it should be and do as an instrument of thought, feeling, contemplation, and activity. It is both real and ideal in its spirit and endeavor. It is real, since it takes a downright hold upon the practical powers of our being, fitting us for better contact with the facts of daily life, and teaching us how to apply common-sense not only to homely matters but to those rarer experiences which it is every one's fortune to undergo. And it is ideal, because it regards our nature as higher than any earthly ends, as an end in itself, and yet as a means to something beyond and above itself.

Culture, therefore, presupposes education in whole or in part, and rises from it as a superstructure from a foundation. A certain degree at least of education must be possessed before one is prepared for the benefits of culture. If culture mainly develops us by means of association with persons of refinement, it is evident that we must have had that previous education from books and formal modes of knowledge which makes the sensibilities acutely impressible by the living men and women of society. We must have this subsoiling before we take the top-dressing, or the surface will be stimulated beyond healthy productiveness. But this fundamental work done, early education accomplished, we pass from this initial life into a realm where more room is found for personal impulse and self-moving energy. The mind then consults itself. And it ordinarily happens that under these circumstances the intellect is first conscious of its own distinctive gifts; the heart beats truthfully to itself instead of throbbing to a key-note set for it; and genius, freed from restraint, prophesies the orbit in which its splendors are to shine. A cloistered student may easily mistake himself. But when men act socially upon one another the true touchstone is applied, the hidden weakness stands confessed, the hidden strength stands disclosed; and we are forced to know ourselves because the divine conditions of self-knowledge are brought to act upon the core of consciousness.

Formal education having been finished, we know of nothing so desirable for young men and women as a warm atmosphere of culture at the home fireside. Just then and there education merges into culture, knowledge changes into character, tastes into life, acquisitions into genuine treasures. It is no hyperbole to say that a very large proportion of our educated mind is lost at this point of transition. Nor indeed is it strange when so few homes are homes for the intellect. Homes for the intellect they should be no less than homes for the affections, competent to afford nutriment in variety and completeness to mental appetites and so secure the largest possibility of growth. The domestic fireside, apart from its sweet and serene fellowships, its graceful interchange of affectionate civilities, and its holy guardianship over virtue and piety, has this other sacred office to fulfill in aiding the development of mind, in continuing the refining process of taste, in quickening talent and genius for its tasks. We all know that sensibility is a main constituent of the nobler mental gifts. We know, too, unawakened intellect often means nothing more than unaroused sensibility. Dr. Abercrombie was right when he said that defects of talent were frequently due to defects of feeling. If this is true, how can the fireside of home perform a wiser ministry, how better aid civilization, how better aid itself than by fitting itself for this beautiful office of inspiring intellect to seek and glorify its vocation?

Now, it strikes us, that our American Homes have in this particular a great work to accomplish. No people, taken as a whole, have such an attachment to home; none lay such an emphasis of generous pride and pleasure upon its advantages; and none indulge in such an outlay of thought and money to obtain the very maximum of its comforts and joys. This passion for home is the chief strength of our civilization. It is growing, too, with our material wealth, but not growing as wisely as it should; for we are neglecting that domestic provision for the nurture of intellect, which, next to good morals, is the surest sign of a substantial civilization. In this respect we have degenerated. Our fathers read more, thought more, talked more around the fireside than we do, and thereby contributed more to the real progress of the age than we can boast of doing. Recently, however, a signal change has been exhibited. The demand for home reading has increased, so that as respects the class of publications to meet this specific want, never did such an abundance exist. The culture of Home is evidently increasing, and as this culture takes deeper root and spreads more widely around, we may safely calculate that social fungi, native or exotic, will be starved out of our prolific soil.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Mrs. Knickerbocker.

DEAR MADAME,—Now that the newspapers, which M. Thiers in his late speech calls the books of every day, are beginning to talk seriously of the conspiracy against marriage, I begin to feel uncomfortable. I ask myself what you and my other good friends in the realm of matrimony—old settlers, if you will allow me the phrase—will begin to think of me. If young men are declining to marry, may it not be because of evil example, and who set so pernicious an anti-matrimonial example as old bachelors? Good Heavens, Madame! what if I should be thought a ringleader in this atrocious conspiracy? What if a committee of unmarried persons of your sex should wait upon me, and demand of me what I mean—in fact, ask my intentions? I beg you to fancy the situation in which I find myself, for as I write the words the appalling thought surprises me that this is leap-year!

If there be a conspiracy against marriage the remedy would seem to be in the hands of your sex. In this auspicious twelve-month they can at least ascertain the truth by open inquiry. But with you, from whom I am sure that I have not even a suspicion to fear, I may certainly reason tranquilly upon this subject. You, dear Madame, know that I am no conspirator, except for the overthrow of bad manners of every kind; and I can conceive of no manners so unspeakably bad as the thinking evil or speaking lightly of marriage. I know that I shall never marry; but I know also that I shall therefore never know the purest delight on earth. And indeed, as I remember to have said before, if we should explore the private history of most of the old bachelors whom we know, we should find that their solitary life is the long and un-wavering homage to an early affection. Do you remember that most delightful of old bachelors, Scott's Antiquary? When he showed Mr. Lovell into the guest-chamber in his quaint old mansion, he quoted to him, as he recalled the days departed, the lines of Wordsworth, then so fresh, and always so beautiful:

"My eyes are dim with childish tears,
My heart is idly stirred,
For the same sound is in my ears
That in those days I heard.
Thus fares it still in our decay,
And yet the wiser mind
Mourns less for what time takes away
Than what it leaves behind."

Come, Madame, you must not reproach me. You do not think Monkbarrow was sentimental, nor must you think that I am. But I am really interested, and even alarmed, by all the statements and statistics that I see in the newspapers and magazines about marriage and cognate subjects; and I have been thinking what you and a few of your friends can do in practical opposition to this tendency to avoid marriage. For we all know it to exist. You have sons and daughters, and you watch them in all their relations with the sons and daughters of other people. And I have eyes and ears, and a mind and memory, and as I move about in society I also hear, and see, and reflect.

Last week, for instance, I had the honor of seeing you at a distance at Mrs. Reservoir's. What a superb scene it was! It wanted only more space, a palace rather than an ordinary house, to be as magnificent as any royal fête. Of course, also, it was new; that we must allow. There were no ancestral names, nor jewels, nor halls. There were no traditions as a mellow back-ground to the picture, but certainly the colors were most glowing, and the whole effect was splendid. Indeed, in no part of the world that I have seen could there be collected so many truly beautiful women. They faded early, say the foreign critics. So dew-drops soon dry up and morning-glories close, but they are marvellous while they last. I am speaking of the spectacle, and nowhere could it be more striking in that chief element of personal beauty than it was at Mrs. Reservoir's. And what dresses the women wore! Heedless youth put their sinful feet through robes the cost of which would be a handsome income for a family. They tipped oyster-slop upon velvets and brocades that the Empress would gladly wear. They spilled exquisite wine upon laces which were mere fairy webs, and I hope they imparted to them the delicate stain of age. Madame, when my fortunate eyes first caught sight of you that evening, you were standing in front of a bank of flowers that I have not seen surpassed in the Chiswick exhibitions, and I agreed when my neighbor said, "Mrs. Knickerbocker completes it like a Victoria Regia."

What music there was, and what dancing! I could not be weary of listening and of looking. The passionate longing, the depthless sadness of much of the music to which those airy figures floated through that illuminated scene—why, Madame, it lingers with me yet and affects me inexpressibly. But what of your sons and daughters, the young Knickerbockers? Two of the youth told me the story which is getting to be the old story—"Do you think, Mr. Bachelor, I can be married to a woman who expects this kind of thing, who is bred to it, steeped in it, who breathes it by day and dreams of it in what little night it leaves her?" And the other said: "Mr. Bachelor, you smiled when I passed you as I was waltzing with sweet Kitty Clover. You think that I am a fortunate man because you suppose she smiles upon me. It is not me, dear Sir, it is only the figure that her excited imagination makes of me that she smiles upon. If she saw me away from all this glamour I should seem to her a very different person. And it is very fortunate, too. For although she might feel very sure that she did not deceive herself, and would be deeply insulted if you should suggest that she could not dispense with all this as easily as she thinks she could, she would find the same reaction in a quiet life that an actress feels when she leaves the stage in the height of her triumph."

So philosophized my young Knickerbockers. And now what do you think is your duty as their mother? What is, in one word, the obvious fault of our society, from whatever cause it may spring? It is its expense. Every body tries to surpass every body else in the magnificence of furniture, of plate, of silks and satins, and velvets and laces, of splendid profusion and mad extravagance. And there is but one way to stop the furious folly. It is for you, Mrs. Knickerbocker—for what you do scores enough will imitate to make the fashion—it is for you to resolve that your house shall be plainly furnished, that you and your family shall be plainly dressed, and that your parties shall be inexpensive. You can do it, but Mrs. Reservoir can not. You can have the pleasantest people of all kinds at your house in the pleasantest way. You can invite them from nine till twelve. You can make your daughters wear simple, and exquisite, and inexpensive dresses. You can have the dancing to three or four pieces of music; and your supper can be merely oysters and ice-cream. You can do this because you are enormously rich, because you are the very flower of fashion, and because every body wants to come to your house. And you have only to ask half a dozen of your friends to do the same thing; and then it will no longer be considered absolutely essential to give no party at all or one of the Reservoir school. Of course I do not deny the beauty and charm of such a scene; but unless something is done, such a ball as we went to at Mrs. Reservoir's becomes a tremendous blow in the conspiracy against marriage.

And what amazes me is, that you and others who are sensible and educated and thoughtful, who see the peril and the sorrow of all this, do not resist it. You all shrug your shoulders, and lift your hands and eyes, and deplore it—and do it. You allow Mrs. Tilbury, and Mrs. Reservoir, and Mrs. Pound, and Mrs. Hundred-weight to prescribe the rules which you obey. I have never been invited to those impressive and dreary ceremonies—the Pound dinners. As I wrote to Mrs. Grundy last week I have no particular respect for the Pound genealogy; the family has only a traditional odor of snuff in my nostrils. But I know how the Ounces and the Pennys and the rest burn with unextinguishable desire to be admitted to the Pound banquets, and I do not deny that it is considered a very fine thing to be one of the guests—although I have heard that—well! no matter!

if he did dine there it only shows that the Pounds can do exactly as they please. Therefore, if Mrs. Pound should give a perfectly plain dinner, cooked with the exquisite skill of Blot—that worthy disciple, I hope, of Ude—and not have forty courses—it would be a miracle, I know, but it would simplify dining.

Now this is a work which can be done only in this way: If our manners in this kind are ever to be reformed, my dear Mrs. Knickerbocker, must lead off. If you choose to go to Delmonico's to do it, instead of opening your own house—very well. Such a proceeding destroys all the charm of variety in society, if many imitate you; but still you can do the work there by a simple method. By Jove! Madame, if you will pardon the force of the expression, and attribute it to a sudden remembrance of you as you stood by the bank of flowers at Mrs. Reservoir's—if your precious spouse were in heaven, or rather, if he had never been on earth, and—forgive the audacious dream!—you had borne my name, and had been at this moment Mrs. Bachelor, I do believe that you and I together could have helped to show that there is something superior to money even in our gay society; and then—if you will again pardon the presumptuous fancy which nothing but our tried friendship excuses—then young Knickerbocker Bachelor would have known that sweet Kitty Clover would not have expected as a matter of course to rival, as his wife, the splendors of the Reservoirs.

Madame, from Juvenal down the satirists have lashed this social madness. But you can help cure it. Be conscious of your power, mother of the Knickerbockers, and use it for their happiness.

Your admiring friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

THE CHARITY BALL.

AMONG the most popular of the New York charitable institutions is the Nursery and Child's Hospital—a home where indigent mothers can leave their infants with the assurance that the babes will be cared for while they are earning their livelihood. A charity of this sort appeals to the strongest sympathies of women; and it is not strange, therefore, that the social queens of New York city should have selected it from among all others to be their pet institution. This they have done, and the list of managers numbers among its names the acknowledged leaders of New York society in wealth, beauty, and fashion. The ball given under such auspices to aid the funds of the institution naturally becomes the ball of the season, discussed long in advance, and talked of long after; some notice of it, therefore, can not fail to be interesting to the readers of Harper's Bazar.

The sum paid by the mothers of the infants received in the nursery is only a nominal one, and the institution is mainly dependent on the exertions of its patrons for support. A large proportion of the funds for this purpose is derived from the Charity Ball, which fact causes the managers to use their utmost efforts to make this ball a success; and if beauty, numbers, and brilliancy constitute success, the ball on the night of February 24 was successful in an eminent degree.

The Academy of Music was used for the purpose, the parquet having been floored over, on a level with the stage, to give space for promenading and dancing. The building was barren of decoration, it being the principle of the managers to expend no money uselessly; but this want was amply compensated by the brilliant assemblage that filled the walls. The Academy was thronged, from the parquet to the highest balcony, with the élite of New York society; and the eye was dazzled in every direction by a bewildering mass of bright-colored silks and satins, gossamer laces, and costly jewels.

One might have imagined himself in the court of Louis XVI., so closely do the present styles of dress resemble those of that magnificent period. Sweeping trains, with tunics and fichus à la Marie Antoinette, towering billows of hair thickly powdered with gold, silver, and diamond dust, and even patches on the face, seemed to copy the fashions of the close of the eighteenth century.

One thing, however, was lacking. The stiff and sombre evening costume of the gentlemen, with their black swallow-tail coats, black vests, and white cravats, so like a butler's, differed widely from the laced and jeweled silken attire of the men of that time, and we could not help longing for some of the embroidery and gold lace which in Ristori's faithful pictures of the gay court of France enlivened the scene and set off the lustre of the ladies' dresses. The epaulets of a few artillery officers here and there was a sensible relief from the monotony of the civilians' dress.

Every body was there, as a matter of course. Mesdames ASTOR, BELMONT, ASPINWALL, JAY, ROOSEVELT, and the rest of the elegant lady-managers, superbly attired, were prominent centres of attraction, while the assemblage numbered lions by the score. Among other celebrated personages, we noticed M. DU CHAILLU making his way among the crowd, and evidently quite as much at home in the mazes of fashion as among the tangled thickets of an African forest.

From the stage-balcony the finest view of the dancers was obtained. Down the long vista of the large hall the eye feasted on a fairy spectacle, a kaleidoscope of marvelous beauty, with ever "a change into something rich and strange." Jewels glittered like streams of living fire; fabrics of gorgeous colors and white, fleecy, cloud-like costumes moved to and fro in the bewildering mazes of the dance. The scene was varied enough to dazzle a looker on. To tell of all the dresses that attracted us would be to emulate the garrulity of Scheherazade herself. It would consume every hour of her thousand-and-one nights; and, above all, it would occupy more space than the chronicler ever dares monopolize in these overburdened columns. We venture only upon generalities, glittering generalities they are per force in speaking of such a scene, while we avoid those personalities that we always deprecate.

We saw at the first glance, and the evening confirmed the impression, that one hue more than all others was cast to the surface of this brilliant surging sea. Of all the colors of the rainbow none is so much enhanced in beauty by gas-light as green, and of all others green is this season the favorite for evening dresses. Here it was in every shade—mermaid and celadon, dark and sombre, a fitting background for the resplendent diamonds that gleamed upon it; Metternich and apple-greens—clear, lovely shades that mingle with white satin in a way that no other color will, and the delicate pistache tint on which point-lace rests as lovingly and appropriately as if here, of all others, was its chosen abiding-place.

Clad in these Undine colors a fairy creature, whose face was a poem, moved about with ineffable grace. Amidst the folds that bordered her rich dress were shells of pearly hue. Her tunic of point-lace was festooned with seaweeds; water-lilies covered with a mist of tulle were on her corsage and sash. Emeralds and pearls were entwined in her fair hair.

Close by an attractive party were enjoying the Lancers just beneath the balcony. Here was a stately dame in a Watteau costume, seeming like some French marchioness of the ancient régime who had wearied of the passive position in which she had been enshrined by Art, and had stepped forth from that old portrait to masquerade for one evening among the belles of another generation. Her powdered hair was a specimen of the choice antique. How it softened her complexion, and rendered most lovely the brilliant bloom of her cheek! It was brushed away from her low, broad forehead à la Pompadour, and arranged in puffs that sat close to her head, displaying instead of destroying its fine contour as puffs are wont to do. Her trained petticoat of white gros grain had a wide box-pleated flounce around it. The fourreau or overdress was of chené silk, small figures of gay chameleon hues on a white ground. The corsage was square in front, and the skirt, cut away in front, would have been quite long behind, but was looped up in large puffs in the Watteau fashion. The sleeves were puffed to the elbow, from whence fell a wide ruffle. A point-lace mantle tastefully worn, formed a graceful drape; and a black velvet band, fastened by a diamond brooch, made the fair throat look fairer still. White gloves with six studs reached almost to her elbow.

Her vis-à-vis in the dance, a brunette with clear olive skin, had her dark hair arranged in luxuriant beauty and sparkling with diamond powder. Her dress of amber satin was most appropriate. A deep flounce of point appliqué surrounded the skirt, which was very long and gored to fit closely over the hips. The low corsage disclosed most beautifully moulded shoulders; and a berth of lace draped the figure. Autumn leaves and gilt berries surrounded the puffed chignon. The necklace was of topaz pendants set in Etruscan gold.

The most elaborate toilette of the evening was of pure white. A rich Antwerp silk with an immense train was trimmed with bands of white satin studded on either side with Roman pearls. Above this was a tunic and flounce of point appliqué lace. The low corsage had sleeves and bretelles of the same beautiful lace. A diamond brooch of great size caught the bretelles on the breast. The hair was powdered and worn very high. A Spanish coiffure of point appliqué was fastened on the chignon by diamond ornaments, and fell over the shoulders of the fair wearer in a most graceful manner. Necklace and bracelets of diamonds.

An elegant costume was a corsage and open train of black velvet, displaying the front and sides of a petticoat of lavender silk. The train was opened in the back, cut in vandykes, and caught together with jet ornaments.

The trains were of immense length, and the few ladies who wore short dresses were envied by the many who did not. Pretty and graceful fourreaux of satin over short skirts of puffed tulle and tarlatan were very much admired. Puffs of rose-colored tarlatan under a tunic of white satin trimmed with heavy fringe, and a muslin robe edged with Valenciennes was a pretty transparent over blue satin.

Midnight was the zenith of the ball; about one o'clock the spectators began to disperse and leave room for the dancers, who lingered till far on toward daybreak. At 5 A.M. the last carriages drove off, and all that remained of the great Charity Ball of 1868 was a well-filled purse, contributed by the fashionable pleasure-lovers to the support of a noble institution.

PERSONAL.

OLIVE LOGAN, one of the cleverest and piquantest women in the country, has added to her rôles of authoress and actress that of lecturer, in which latter she debuted, a few evenings since, with decided success, at Dodworth Hall. Her audience was largely composed of writing, acting, painting, and other professional people, whom she kept in a state of high laughter and applause. She gave a neat little touch, in the pathetic, of a young débütante, a comical one of a stage-struck Fifth-Avenue, an Irish wardrobe woman, a manager, and scenes from "Macbeth" and "King John." She was elegantly enveloped in a rose-colored moiré antique, with long train, fur collar, heavy diamond cross, and large diamond ear-rings.

Senator MORGAN is said to be the giver of the best dinners this winter in Washington. Senator CONKLING keeps house and entertains nicely, as a well-educated gentleman should; but Governor MORGAN is so very pecuniary that the "What will it cost?" never seems to enter into any of his matters of hospitality.

We account it a good thing to have done what GEORGE W. CHIPMAN did the other day, when his daughter ANNIS was married to Mr. CHARLES C. BAILEY. The paternal CHIPMAN gave to ANNIS (the CHIP-ess) a deed of the Baptist church in Melrose, Massachusetts, a $1000 United States bond, a $100 greenback, and a case of jewelry, consisting of a pearl chariot drawn by two golden horses. The parties are to be congratulated—especially BAILEY.

The personal and political dander of Mrs. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE is said to have arisen lately in the town of Hartford, where her new book is going through the press. Samples of this book had been carried about to show to purchasers. Among the steel plates is one of Mr. FREDERICK DOUGLASS. A few days ago the agents began to come back with the report that the graven image of F. D. injured the sale of the volume. The publishers consulted Mrs. S., and requested that the offensive work of art be taken out, which she firmly refused. She put her little foot down on that proposition, and there it stays. That is the way the story comes to us, and we reckon it's true.

Opulent New Yorkers must not suppose that all the truly grand and stylish private parties exploited on this continent are given by themselves. Hardly. A few evenings since Mrs. FRANCIS SKINNER, of Boston, gave a magnificent entertainment on the coming of age of her son. A thousand people were invited. The entire building known as Horticultural Hall was engaged, and the several apartments therein were none too large for the purpose. The several officers' and committees' rooms were used for reception rooms, the lower hall for the supper room, and the upper hall for dancing. The company consisted of the élite of the city, and a scene of rarer magnificence at the height of the entertainment can scarcely be imagined. All the apartments, the stairways, etc., were profusely hung and embowered with the choicest shrubbery and flowers, while the passage-ways, the stairs, and the supper-room were fully carpeted, both the dancing-hall and supper-room forming the most exquisite boudoirs or fairy grottoes by their columns, arches, pendants, and other floral ornamentations. No such completeness and expensiveness of detail have ever been known in Boston. Some idea of the cost may be inferred when we say that at least $3000 were expended for flowers alone. The music and feast were on a scale of like munificence. The company began to assemble at nine o'clock, and the first streaks of the morning light still found some of the more enthusiastic dancers lingering at the scene of recherche festivity. The floral decorations were by DOOGUE; the music by the Germania Band, and the supper by WILKINS, of the Somerset Club rooms. Pretty good for the Puritans! It was O. W. H. we think who said, "when good Bostonians die they go to Paris!"

The notable personages of England appear to be rushing into print. The BISHOP of LONDON and Dean STANLEY will have articles in the March number of Good Words. Mr. GLADSTONE has been writing for the same periodical, and is announced for a volume on Greece and Phenicia. Lord WILLIAM LENOX has been lecturing in London in aid of the funds of the Victoria Hospital for sick children. His subject was "Locomotion, from the days of Charles II. to those of Victoria," and contained anecdotes of Stephenson, Brunel, Gurney, Locke, and other men of science. Lord HOBART has been writing letters in the London Times in favor of a prompt and liberal settlement of the Alabama matter. We suppose Doctor SHELTON MACKENZIE will be inclined to crucify us for repeating that hat story, which has got into print in style and manner following, to wit: The Doctor went with some fair ladies to the Navy-yard. The day was fine but gusty; he was eloquently describing on a ferry-boat the beauty of the surrounding scenery, when a puff of wind gently lifted his hat off his head, and carried it like a bird flapping its wings up the river. "Good Heavens!" cried the Doctor, "there's a poor fellow's hat in the air. Well, that's a joke I always laugh at!"

The roar of laughter which greeted him all round, and the direction all eyes took to his head, induced him to put his hand there. "By the powers," quoth he, "it's my hat!" But his native wit returning, he said, as he saw it plump itself into the waters of the East River: "That's true to nature; a beaver always takes to the water."

He is the owner of his own copyrights, and is said to get all his publishing done for a commission of fifteen per cent. He is now building a house on a property he has lately purchased in a secluded part of Hampshire, as a place of refuge when the tourist fever sets in, "with its usual severity," in the Isle of Wight.

General IGNATIEFF, the new Prime Minister of Russia, is only forty years of age, but has already made his mark. He it is who has carried the Czar's dominions several degrees southward in Asia, transferring a large portion of Northern China to Russia, and advancing the Russian outposts in the centre of the continent near enough to India to make a sensation at St. James. When the French and English entered Pekin with force of arms and pillaged the palace, they found IGNATIEFF already there, on such excellent terms with the Emperor of China that the plenipotentiaries of both countries solicited his aid in the negotiation of treaties. He is a man of rare sagacity and address, with an affability, ease, grace, and courteousness that wins universal admiration. He treats every one with the utmost respect; reads men on the instant; is bold, yet prudent. He belongs to young Russia, and has full faith in the destiny of the Empire just as most Americans have in the future of the United States. He has won the hand of a princess of high rank, well educated, speaking English fluently, and charming in person and manner; who while in Constantinople thought it not beneath her to be on intimate terms with some of the wives of the missionaries of the American Board.

The late COUNTESS OF HARRINGTON—once the celebrated actress Miss FOOTE—was an odd body. To the day of her death she kept her carriages and her liveries in very much the style which distinguished them when the late LORD HARRINGTON was a leader of the fashions. Every day about four o'clock might be seen in the neighborhood of Whitehall Gardens those large black horses with the square blinkers and brass-mounted harness, drawing the stately-looking carriage in which the Countess was seated. The servants invariably wore chocolate-colored coats, reaching to their heels. These coats were designed by Lord Harrington, who cut the original pattern for them himself. Like GEORGE IV., he was an amateur tailor of very considerable pretensions. In fact, he and that Royal personage, in the days of the Regency, were rivals in the high art of cutting and fitting. The Prince designed a Valencia waistcoat, very short, and with only four buttons, which created a wonderful impression among the noble swells the first day it was exhibited on the Royal breast. The next day Lord Harrington appeared in a still shorter Valencia, but with small buttons from top to bottom as numerous as it was possible to place them. This vest triumphed over the Prince's.

NEWMAN HALL told a friend in Baltimore that the form of his worship in London was Episcopal, though he had elders like the Presbyterians, and class-meetings like the Methodists.

Mr. EMERSON was in Stamford, Connecticut, a few evenings since, and delivered his lecture on "Manners in America." After the lecture the philosopher was taken to the house of one of the principal gentlemen of the place, where "things" were had. Mr. EMERSON's parlor manner is thus pleasantly and concisely stated by a person who assisted at the private entertainment: "He is calm, self-possessed, rather disposed to hear others than to heard himself. A stranger would be likely to take him for a rather timid and precise Congregational preacher. He talks well, though he does not speak blank verse in the bosom of the family. He has the air of a man whose mind has been made up for thirty years or more on most subjects about which people think. On the topics of the times he is entirely at home. Political affairs, as he remarked, it was not easy to keep aloof from. Every man is, or ought to be, concerned in the welfare of the vessel in which he has taken passage. He is familiar with current literature, knows the titles of all the new books and what they are worth. Concerning AGASSIZ's recent work, he feared that the descriptions would make every body anxious to go to Brazil. Of THOREAU he spoke in great praise, and was of opinion that the day would come when his remarkable works would be classic and by-words every where."

The bounteous repast seemed to be much enjoyed by the great thinker; but the intercourse of the social board does not disturb the even tenor of his way. He is evidently always himself, and never turns aside from the plain, simple, straightforward, unpretending habit which he approves, and which quite won the sincere regard of the fortunate few who concluded an evening with EMERSON.

Pen Wiper.

MATERIALS: Black and gray cloth; muslin; bran.

This pen wiper is in the form of a hedgehog. Cut, according to Fig. 23, two pieces of muslin; the one (upper) of the size of the pattern, the other (under) only to the smooth line. Back-stitch the two together, except a small opening, through which fill the body of the hedgehog with bran or sand. Then sew up the opening, and cover the under side with gray cloth. On the upper arrange strips of black cloth, three quarters of an inch wide, which are cut in very narrow slits on one side to the depth of about two-thirds of an inch. (See pattern.) Sew these strips on diagonally, beginning at the back, where the first strip must cover the edge of the gray cloth. Each following strip must lie over

Wood Box.

This useful article is made of a wooden box covered with light brown oil-cloth. The border which ornaments the wood box is of dark brown oil-cloth, with figures in appliqué of light brown oil-cloth. These figures imitate knotted boughs. The application figures are fastened to the foundation by an embroidery stitch in fine black silk. The fine strokes, imitating shadows, are made with pen and ink. The points on the edge of the ornamentation are of light brown oil-cloth. Fig. 21 gives the pattern of half of this border. This also serves as a direction for making the cover and handle. Any old wooden box may be covered in this manner, and thus be made both useful and ornamental.

CROCHET AND BRAID BORDER FOR CUSHIONS, ETC.

MATERIALS: White and green silk; white flannel; lining; canvas; fine silk cord to match the silk; narrow green silk braid; black, green, and white sewing silk; a few large and small bullet-shaped, and small flat steel buttons; black and crystal beads; bran.

This is a round pin-cushion with a needle-book in the form of a banner in the middle thereof; four little cone-shaped pockets surround the foot of the banner; these serve as receptacles for different articles, such as balls of yarn, thimbles, scissors, etc. Make first a round cushion, filled with bran or sand, four inches in diameter by one and a half inches in height. This cushion is covered with green silk on the under side, while the upper is composed of a cord texture worked on canvas. The outer edge is ornamented by a trimming of white and green silks. These are cut as shown in the pattern, trimmed with braid and embroidery, pleated, and sewed together. Cover the stitches made in sewing this trimming on the cushion by a black and white silk braid, and, in addition, three tassels on each white section of the silk; these three tassels are finished above by a small flat steel button. Now take a round wooden rod, nine inches in length, and wind it—except one and a half inches at one end—with filoselle silk; bring this end through the center of the cushion, so that it shall reach about a quarter of an inch beyond it, and finish with a round wooden button similar to those on wooden knitting-needles; on the upper end of the rod fasten a large bullet-shaped steel button. For each of the four cone-shaped pockets which surround the rod cut a three-cornered piece out of pasteboard, as also of white and green silk; on the white silk set the braid as shown in the illustration; then join the silk over the pasteboard, on the upper border by button-hole and on the others by overhand stitch; fasten the four sections together by a few stitches at the upper and lower corners, as shown in the illustration, and at the same time fasten them to the rod. Then wind the rod from this point to the top with a row of black and one of crystal beads. There remains now only the needle-book to make. For this prepare a white and green piece of silk as also one of white flannel, according to Fig. 22. These must double at the middle line. Then cut two pasteboard pieces, which must reach only to this middle line. Trim the white silk with braid and work on one of the halves a design after Fig. 22. The body of the beetle is worked in appliqué with brown silk, and that of the locust with green. The remaining portion of the design is worked in satin, half polka and point russe, of black, brown, green, and gray silks. Then join the white and green silk over the pasteboard, by edging with button-hole stitch in green silk; insert the flannel, which is worked in green silk in button-hole stitches taken at some distance apart. The finished book is fastened in the middle on a long, thin, round, wooden rod, two and a half inches long, with short stitches, putting a bead on every stitch on both sides. The ends of the rod are wound with green silk, and finished at each point by a steel bullet button. Lastly, ornament the needle-book by green silk tassels, and fasten it to the point of the upright rod by means of a white and black silk cord, which is finished with black and white silk tassels.

The illustration shows an embroidered design for the cover of a silk or woolen quilt, which is laid over on the right side at the width shown in the pattern, and fastened by means of buttons. The pattern quilt given is of red cashmere, quilted in squares, and the cover of fine linen. Before embroidering the latter it will be necessary to sew folds of the required depth in order to form the corners. The embroidery is worked according to the pattern in satin, half polka, button-hole, and eyelet stitch. It may also be done on cambric or muslin, instead of linen. Join, on the outer edge, the embroidered border with thin lining of the under side. Work button-holes in this border, and set pearl or porcelain buttons on the quilt by means of which it may be firmly fastened.

Cap with Pink Ribbon Trimming.

See illustration, page 309.

This cap is unique and tasteful, being formed of two scarf-like strips of Swiss muslin, fastened with ribbon on the top, and forming strings. Cut Fig. 18 of double stiff lace, bind it on the front edge with narrow pink ribbon, and sew on the back a ribbon an inch and a half wide, with the ends extending half a yard beyond either side of the cap. Trim the under part of the front with two rows of loops of narrow pink ribbon, and set on the frills of lace and rosettes as seen in the engraving. Then cut two strips of Swiss muslin, twenty-three inches long and five inches wide, pointed at one end and bias at the other, edge them with lace, and cover the foundation therewith in the manner shown in the illustration, finishing with needle-work application figures, bows, and loops.

Cap with Blue Velvet Trimming.

See illustration, page 309.

* This cap is made of Swiss muslin and lace insertion an inch wide. The trimming consists of narrow lace, a strip of blue velvet cut in points, and narrow blue velvet ribbon. Cut Fig. 19 of Swiss muslin, wire the front and back edges, and set under the front edge a strip of stiff muslin an inch in width. Trim the front with three rows of loops made of narrow velvet ribbon, surmounted by a frill of needle-work edging set on insertion. A barb made of lace insertion a yard and a half wide, with a strip of Swiss muslin an inch and a half wide, velvet points and narrow lace, on each side, passes over the top of the cap and serves as strings. The points are two inches wide and an inch and a quarter deep.

Holder for Clothes Brush.

See illustration, page 309.

MATERIALS: Gray and white ticking; red woolen binding, half an inch wide; red zephyr worsted; pasteboard.

This holder consists of three pockets, designed for holding brushes. It is made of gray and white ticking, bound with red worsted braid and trimmed with point russe embroidery in red worsted. The pattern is eleven inches in height by thirteen in width. Cut a piece of stuff twenty-five inches long by ten in width; lay this in three equal pleats, so that the length is reduced to thirteen inches. Each pleat forms a pocket, and is to be cut out at the top according to the pattern. Now prepare a piece of ticking thirteen inches long by eleven inches wide for the back, and sew on this a flap of ticking, which fastens down in points and is trimmed as shown in the illustration. Sew the pockets on the back of the stuff, and finish between the pleats with point russe embroidery in red worsted. Now bind the entire outer edge of the joined back and front pieces with red woolen braid. Make a loop on each point of the flap, and sew a corresponding button on each pocket. Fasten a metal ring on the upper edge, by which it can be hung up. Put a piece of pasteboard between the double materials of the back, arranging it so that it can be slipped out when the holder is washed.

See illustration, page 309.

This tatted insertion is bordered by two rows of crochet on the outside edges. Begin with what appears in the pattern as the middle stripe. Tie both threads together, and work over the thread which serves as foundation 8 ds. (double stitches), 1 p. (picot), 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds., 1 p., 8 ds.; then close the row by looping the working thread where the two threads were tied together. Turn the figure just finished downward, and work on this in conclusion 1 single stitch, 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds., 1 p., 1 purled stitch. Now turn the work again, so that the first figure shall lie right side up, and work on the row just finished a figure composed of, first, 8 ds.; then take up the last picot of the last figure; 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds.

Join this figure by taking up the picot before the purled stitch of the previously finished row. Repeat from * till the row has reached the required length of the insertion. The corner may be formed from the pattern. Then work on both long sides of this middle stripe the leaf-like tatted rings which are fastened to a picot of this stripe. For these small leaves only one thread is needed, and this is first fastened to the middle picot of the first figure of the stripe; * work a small leaf of 6 ds., 1 p.; alternate twice 2 ds., 1 p., 4 ds., 1 p., 2 ds.; join the thread to the same picot, and make a second leaf of 2 ds.; then, taking up the last picot of the former leaf, 4 ds., 1 p., alternate twice 2 ds., 1 p., then 6 ds. Having finished this second leaf, again fasten the thread to the picot, and work close to this a Josephine knot of 5 single stitches, and fasten to the picot which serves to bind two figures of the middle stripe; then 1 Josephine knot, and after this fasten to the middle picot of the following figure. Repeat from *, but instead of working the last picot of the 1st of the 2 leaves, fasten to the last p. of every 2d leaf. On the other long side of the middle stripe the fastening thread before and after each 2 leaflets must be fastened to the middle picot of the row which joins the figures of this stripe. The corner is again to be formed as shown in the pattern. The plain outside border rounds of the insertion are worked in 2 rounds of crochet as follows: 1st round—1 single crochet in the middle p. of the first leaf, 2 chain, 1 double; then take up together the last p. of the same leaf, and at the same time the first p. of the next leaf; 2 chain, 1 single crochet in the middle p. of the 2d leaf, 2 chain. Repeat from *. The corner is formed as shown in the illustration. 2d round—In each stitch of the last round a single crochet stitch. This finishes the insertion.

Crochet and Braid Border for Cushions.

See illustration, page 309.

This is an insertion of serpentine braid and crochet, and is very easily worked. The rosettes, which are shown of the full size in the illustration, are made singly. Take for each a piece of braid six points in length, and sew the edges together on the bias side with overcast stitches. Then bring the points close together on one side of the braid by drawing a thread through the edge of each point. This forms the center of a rosette. Wind the thread several times around the foundation thread which joins these points. (See pattern.) Around the outer edge crochet these rosettes as follows: In the deep cut between each two points a single crochet stitch; then on each point alternate six times 2 chain with 1 double crochet—the 2 middle double crochet stitches must meet at the point—2 chain. These rosettes may either be joined in the process of making this outer crochet edge, or they can be joined by a few stitches on the under side. The illustration shows where this connection takes place. The two stripes which include the rosettes are worked as follows: The braid for each stripe must be of the length desired for the insertion; in order to form the corners sew together 2 points of the braid on the side which shall be next to the rosettes; then crochet on each side of this braid as follows: * 1 single crochet in the first point, 2 chain, 1 downward picot—for this work 5 chain, draw the needle out of the loop, put it through the upper part of the first of the 5 chain, then take up again the loop which was dropped and draw it, with a single thread thrown around, through the 2d loop on the needle; this finishes the picot—2 chain. Repeat from * till the braid is worked the length of one side, but in forming the corner make only 1 chain before and after the picot. Lastly, crochet 1 round slip stitch in each of these rounds, in working which join the rosettes as shown in the pattern.

INIGO IN WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, February 20, 1868.

YOU will observe by the date of my letter that I am in Washington, which is the best reason I can offer for not being in New York.

I came on in the interest of the Bazar, to attend to the fashions, report the receptions, and ornament and elevate society generally. The report that the President summoned me to his side, to assist in reconstruction and popularize his measures, is altogether a mistake. As he remarked to me yesterday, few better than he appreciate my ability and know my virtues, but he does not wish to put them to the test.

In the further course of conversation he expressed a desire that I should take the reception business off his hands; he was tired of it, he said; standing up and shaking hands with so many persons the evening through was not so pleasant a performance as it perhaps seemed. It looked as though they came simply to pump him, to make a handle of him, and he did not like the idea. He thought that I would fill the position with grace; that when conversation flagged I could enliven it by the introduction of a few judicious conundrums, and besides I could get so much to write about—he could find nothing.

I suggested that he could right about face, and leave the White House, which would delight a great many people more than any message he could send or any thing else he could do, but he sadly replied that he was unfamiliar with such movements—that he knew nothing of tactics—nor even tact.

Last Monday evening I attended his reception. Let me explain that the White House receptions, and those of Speaker Colfax and General Grant, are general; those of the Secretaries, however—indeed all others that I now call to mind, are affairs of "cards." However, as is well known, there's nothing proud about me; and I go every where indiscriminately without expecting that people shall put themselves out by sending me invitations.

A great many uncomplimentary things have been said of me by my enemies; but I was never yet accused of standing too much upon ceremony or waiting an undue time to be asked to come in out of the cold.

At the President's I saw the President. He shook hands with me kindly and asked how I thought I found myself, to which I replied by a few original remarks about the weather, and wishing him many returns of the happy season, quoting with happy effect the well-known lines: When the spring time comes, gentle Andy.

There is nothing like politeness—suavity in a meadow, as the old saying has it, is as good as forty-two in reserve. We should even strike the guitar lightly—that is, politely!

Is it de rigueur to dress for the President's receptions? asked the lady whom it was my fortune to attend.

On general principles it seemed to me that it was—that it would be rather rigorous not to dress, and I so replied. The consequence was that we went en grande tenue—which is not a new way of spelling carriage. It is only the French for one's best clothes.

That's what is meant by "full dress" in Washington—putting on your best clothes. It doesn't much matter what they are—bombazine, benzine, or gregarine, so long as they're the best you've got it is all right, and you've shown your respect for the executive. Wearing gloves is simply a matter of taste—it is one kind of taste to go with them and another to go without, and persons can take their choice; under a democratic government nothing is compulsory but keeping up appearances and paying taxes. For instance, in attending receptions you can go on foot or in a carriage, just as you prefer. Some go in baggage-wagons, but this is not considered a good conveyance—the better the dray the better the deed. The best way of going any where, I find, is to take a carriage—no matter who's—and tell the coachman to drive you there.

On arriving at the White House the first thing you do is to get out of the carriage. Having gotten out and gotten out the ladies—it is taken for granted that they come gotten up—you mount guard over their trains to the door, where you are informed that you will find them in the Red Room. The great hall where you enter is fitted up with pigeon-holes like a post-office, and in one of them your coat, cocked hat, cane, umbrella, bootjack, and other outside garments are filed away as though they were letters or public documents. Proceeding to glove yourself you find that one of your lavender is gone—the left one, of course, which is not the right one, inasmuch as it is the left one which should be left, but reflecting that

'Tis better to have gloved and lost
Than never to have gloved at all, you make your way to the Red Room. Of course you find your ladies ready. Surrendering your arms to them—which may be called surrendering to seize her that which is yours—you enter the Blue Room, and are presented to the President. As a general thing it is not considered good taste to ask him conundrums, or to attempt a discussion of politics at this time. You may inquire after his health and his family's, and express a sincere hope that they may live long and prosper; but the better way of getting out of the scrape, perhaps, is to look as though you knew a great deal, and just shake hands and pass on as though you did not wish to commit yourself. Then the President will think that you own a saw-mill, or run a tavern, or keep grocery out West, and are a man of position and political influence, and there's no telling what office he may not nominate you to.

After standing in the Blue Room and feeling like a fool as long as convenient, you can go into the East Room, remarking to the first old lady you meet, in a jocular way, that you have just come out of an Easterly Blew. If she does not faint under the blow you can then ask her why an onion is like a piano, or what is the difference between an over-coat and a baby—either of which questions is warranted to drive any respectable lady, arrived at years of indiscretion, into a lunatic asylum.

The main band play in an adjoining apartment, and children play in all the rooms, tripping up gentlemen and tearing ladies' dresses. Children should be abolished, especially male children; and I am rather surprised that these latter are not toed or vetoed into their proper places.

Am I expected to tell what people wore? Well, as for myself, I wore—myself out before the evening was half over. The mental effort of keeping my hands out of my pockets, and my feet off ladies' dresses, and behaving with entire propriety for such an unprecedented length of time, quite unmanned me, and I wanted to go home. Other gentlemen wore black coats—of the claw-hammer cut, mainly—black pantaloons, black or white vests, black or white neck-ties, roll-over collars or stand-ups, boots or gaiters. Just as they pleased; some, acting on the old saying that safety lies in the middle, parted their hair accordingly, while others parted it on the side; members of diplomatic corps carried their hats under their arms, and could have carried their heads there had they chosen to; some wore whiskers and some wore mustaches, and some didn't wear any thing on their faces but a stupid expression. Wearing whiskers or not, let me remark, is another matter of taste. As a general thing, those who can't raise them don't wear them, and think them especially vulgar, and snobbish rather than nobbish. Mustaches, however, are open to serious objections; they tickle ladies' noses, which is naughty, for it is the gentleman who should be on his sneeze.

As for the ladies, they dress very much as they do in New York. I noticed some very pretty puffed sleeves and waists—and some very well puffed dresses in the next morning's papers.

Some ladies wore shot poplins; indeed, most of the dresses there, silk and all, looked as though they had been shot—shot to pieces—before the thing ended.

(By-the-way, when you see in the papers that "green reps" were noticed at the President's reception, you must not imagine that green Republicans are meant—the abbreviation is used in Congressional reports; but in this connection it means a dress cloth.)

I noticed several Nansooks, and one Nan forsook. The latter stood in a corner.

One very pretty lady wore a magnificent cape. It was er mine. I regretted that she was not.

There were many waists of felt cloth. All cloth is apt to approximate to this condition after a little wear, if the figure be a good one.

Butterfly-bows found much favor with the ladies. They don't last long, but they look pretty while they do.

As for the coiffures, these were so varied that I shall attempt no particular description. It is generally considered nowadays that the more a lady's hair is roughed up the better it is dressed. A very good effect could be attained, I should imagine, by allowing the baby to play with it nights, and not combing it for several mornings before going to a party. Indeed, I am of opinion that this practice is quite extensively followed, from the fact that during my stay in Washington I noticed that very many ladies came to breakfast and dinner with their bounnets on, when I knew to a moral certainty that they had neither been out nor intended going. If they were not getting their hair up, what did it mean?

I am exhausted, but I have not yet exhausted Washington; however I have the reader. So not adieu but au revoir. INIGO.

HARMONY OF COLORS.

HARMONY of contrast is one thing to be considered in a lady's dress, and an appropriate and beautiful pattern another. Without these no fashion can long become popular among a refined, intellectual, and discerning people. No matter what furor the new style may create upon its first advent, it will die out in its infancy and be cast aside as something too unbecoming to be worn by any lady who wishes to appear to good advantage.

Different opinions are entertained respecting the true nature of light and shade in the production of many textile fabrics for ladies' wear, in which three or more positive colors are intermixed; and among the leading primary colors which are the best to select from, by combining and blending them together, to cause the most desirable and pleasing effects.

To obtain a good effect, neither too gaudy nor too sombre, it is absolutely essential to know something about how they are to be produced, and the governing principle employed, before any one can justly claim to be an expert in such matters. This can only be accomplished by thoroughly understanding the manner in which tints are blended and the harmonious relations they bear to each other.

Experiment seems to have proved beyond all controversy that color is not an inherent property of matter, but produced by the action of matter on light. That fabrics as well as bodies owe their colors to this cause is clear, from the fact that whatever may be their color in ordinary daylight, they all, when seen by gas-light, exhibit the same shade, which is that of the light in which they are seen.

Take a light blue silk, for instance, and display it at night under a series of gas jets; the yellow from the light so completely absorbs the blue, or rather intermixes with it, that it presents the appearance of being a green silk, when, if a strong solar light were brought to bear upon it, the result would be as before stated.

There are seven homogeneous colors (leaving out white and black), of which red, yellow, and blue are the primary ones; then comes orange, green, indigo, and violet. All other colors, compounded of any two or more of these, are merely secondary. This should always be borne in mind in blending tints together.

From these seven homogeneous colors all our textile fabrics are woven. The manufacturer, by blending and combining two, three, or more of them together, finally succeeds in obtaining a beautiful and harmonious whole, exactly suited to the wants and tastes of his customer. To produce the necessary effects, much skill, patience, and experience on the part of the operator is required. To make the color and the fabric fashionable and find a ready market for it is the next thing to be done. If the manufacturer has the hardihood to undertake so difficult a task single-handed, he protects himself from rival manufacturers by affixing to the fabric his trademark, and seeks a patent for his new material and the peculiar design of the pattern, as well as for any new coloring matter he employs in the process of manufacturing. When he exhibits proof of the originality of his invention, the Patent Office at Washington at once grants him the necessary legal parchment desired. This document, for the period of seventeen years—the usual term—effectually gives him exclusive rights, and shuts out all competition in the manufacture of his particular fabric and unique pattern design.

He then gives it whatsoever name he thinks proper to adopt, by which it can become more generally known, such as the Gettysburg purple, Broadway green, or Ristori blue, for the purpose of introducing it to the notice of the trade and general public.

The manufacture of new colors and pattern designs for ladies' costumes, like those of new perfumes, occupy the attention of a large number of leading chemists and artists in Europe, where such things are made a specialty. Those among them who originated the "Bismarck brown," the "Solferino red," and the peculiar color known as "Magenta," succeeded in reaping a rich harvest for their trouble when their new tints became once thoroughly established among the elite of the fashionable world.

The variety of tints and shades of color, by judicious blending and effective combinations, can be carried out to an almost unlimited extent.

The following combination of a few leading colors, however, will serve in a measure to better illustrate the rule by which all can be governed in future, if they so choose, as to the true principle of creating light and shade, and of obtaining suitable tints to harmonize with each other.

Black, like the base of a structure, is the darkest color first to build upon; white, which stands at the top of the scale, the lightest color to lead to; therefore black and white, being the two most opposite and extreme colors, all light and shade must perforce be graduated between them, while every known tint which can possibly be made by the intermixture of any other color, must also come within these two extreme boundaries. Next come the three primaries—red, yellow, and blue—and all the tints which can be made out of them. For example: Red, orange-red and red-orange; orange, yellow-orange and orange-yellow; yellow, green-yellow and yellow-green; green, blue-green and green-blue; blue, purple-blue and blue-purple; purple, red-purple and purple-red, and then back again to red, the place of starting.

These are the harmonizing colors, from which all tints and shades, in the order they are arranged, are obtained. With the addition of light or dark shades (white or black tints) the predominating color required may be increased or neutralized according to fancy.

In most cases the broken and semi-neutral colors are productive of an excellent effect in dress. These may be enlivened by a little positive color, such as red, orange, or violet. The accessories should be quiet and unassuming. The contrasting color should always be chosen with the foregoing principles, and bear but a small proportion to the mass of principal color.

It is commonly understood that red contrasts well with green; blue with orange; lilac with green; brown with either blue, red, or green, the brighter the contrast the darker the brown should be; purple with yellow, and golden tints with deep purple. An impression prevails that if any two of these contrasting colors are united in one piece of goods; if, for instance, the warp is green and the woof red, that the finished piece will present a rich and harmonious contrast of colors.

If it is necessary that the colors of different articles of dress should contrast agreeably and harmonize with each other, it is equally important that the same harmony should be preserved in the colors employed on a single piece of silk or other fabric. In these and other textile fabrics we find too frequently that the fancy of the manufacturer has been the only rule for the arrangement of the colors, and the laws of harmony and contrast are therefore but too often set at defiance. French manufacturers pay greater attention to this subject than our own, and the good effects of this study are visible in the superior productions of the French looms.

Colored shawls, again, are instances in which a great variety of colors may be arranged with harmonious and rich effect; but to set these off to the greatest advantage they should be worn over plain colored dresses. The variety of colors in shawls is frequently so great, and they are so broken and intermixed, that at a small distance they cease to be distinct, and must be considered rather as hues than as colors. It is always a rule among artists who excel at figure-painting and the painting of drapery, that if one part of the dress is to be highly ornamented, or to consist of various colors, a portion should be plain, in order to give repose to the eye and afford a good blending of shade tints. For the same reason figured and striped dresses should be accompanied by plain colored shawls, jackets, or cloaks. It is no doubt to this principle of contrast without gaudiness that the popularity of black cloaks and their substitutes are to be attributed.

A few general observations connected with the subject of color as applied to dress occur to us. We shall mention the following:

Black and dark dresses have the effect of making the persons wearing them appear smaller than they really are. For this reason they are more suitable to stout persons. The same may be observed with respect to black shoes, which diminish the apparent size of the foot.

The contrary effect takes place with regard to white and light-colored dresses, which make people look larger than they really are. Very stout persons should, therefore, dress in black and dark colors. They have a constitutionally gloomy look, we admit; but for some reason, yet unexplained, the whole civilized world wherein Fashion holds her sway associates dark, sombre colors with dignity of deportment, a calm, placid mind, and highly intense respectability. Black is certainly the most approved color to be worn at funerals. Custom alone has made it so, under the popular delusion, no doubt, that every person who goes to a funeral and dresses in black for the occasion is supposed to be in mourning for a departed friend, when, in reality, they are carrying out the Biblical idea of doing penance in sackcloth and ashes. In many portions of civilized Europe pure white is the prevailing color at such sombre gatherings, while in China it is red and yellow, and in some other places blue becomes la mode.

Large patterns make the figure look shorter without diminishing its apparent size. The immense patterns which we occasionally see on promenade are really only fit for window and bed curtains, or at least for a lady of gigantic proportions who wears a hoop.

Longitudinal stripes in dress, if not too wide, are considered to add to the height of a figure. They may therefore be worn with good effect by persons of low stature. Horizontal stripes have a contrary effect, and are far from graceful.

The semi-neutral tints, now so much worn, are very becoming to most complexions. The flesh tints of the face during this fine bracing weather look brighter by the contrast. This is really the principal reason why most of our belles, when in full walking costume, with their dark Géroldsteins, Africaines, Matinées, and Sultans, and with the colors of other portions of their dress to properly match, appear so much handsomer on promenade in daytime than they do at the Opera on a gala night robed in their most brilliant and resplendent toilettes. The cause of this you may well ask. We will endeavor to explain.

The general effect produced by artificial light on the complexion and dress is to heighten the shade without imparting to it any rich coloring matter. When reflected from above it only increases the brilliancy of the eyes by the masses of shadow which it casts around them, but at the same time gives to many complexions a pale, sickly ash-color, and to the features a haggard, sunken expression, which is any thing but beautiful or becoming. Where the light is thrown from the sides of a salon, on a level with the head, the general effect is wonderfully improved, and is much better for the complexion and the toilette. The haggard, sunken expression imparted to the features from the reflection above is entirely removed by the introduction of strong side-lights and footlights. This effect warms the complexion by increasing the flesh-tints from ash-color to orange. Our operatic and theatrical artists, as a general thing, are made fully aware of these facts, and are governed entirely by them when they find it necessary to make up their costumes, or paint, powder, and line their faces to represent either youth, middle, or old age, in the many different eccentric characters they are so often called upon by the manager to assume.

First-class scenic artists and painters of transparencies have reduced the study of artificial light and its effect upon certain colors down to a positive science. The light diffused being yellow, this color on a lady's dress is rendered pale, and is frequently lost entirely. Primrose-colored gloves appear white by gas-light, orange and red become warmer by this light. Sky-blue acquires a green tint; indeed it can scarcely be distinguished from green; dark blue assumes a dark and heavy color; green nearly resembles blue; and purple becomes redder if it inclines to red, and darker if it inclines to blue. When, therefore, a dress is to be worn at night by artificial light the color should be selected with a view to the modifications it will receive from this light, or the effect intended will be completely destroyed.

PARIS, January 21, 1868.

TO-DAY is the anniversary of the execution of Louis XVI., and, according to custom, the day, together with the death of Marie Antoinette his queen, who was executed nine months afterward, is commemorated by masses said at the sarcophagus in the crypt of the Chapelle Expiatoire. This chapel is a low but extensive tomb-like structure which, with its little garden, occupies a block in a new and fine quarter of Paris. One of the first acts of Louis XVIII., on gaining possession of the crown, was to identify the spot where the remains of his brother and sister-in-law had been interred, and to erect this monument thereon. In the principal room, which is of cruciform shape, but to which a low dome gives a circular appearance, mass is said daily; but upon this anniversary the priests descend the dim sepulchral staircase and perform the rite before the empty tomb whence the remains have long since been removed to the Royal sepulchres in the suburban church of St. Denis. At the same time to-day, according to the custom of the present Emperor, mass was said in the private chapel of the Tuileries, the Emperor and his family being present.

However strange it may seem that a Napoleon should pay this peculiar mark of honor to the memory of a Bourbon, it is nevertheless natural; for he sits in the palace of the ill-fated monarch, he is surrounded by the same Paris, and from his windows he sees the Place de la Concorde, where, seventy-five years ago, the guillotine was set up to clear the way for a republic. There is more reason for sympathy than some Americans might at first suppose.

The desire to exhibit continually visible tokens in commemoration of the decease of others, and to be remembered in turn in the same way, seems to be a common trait of the French character. A noble marquis, some time since deceased, who made a will disinheriting all his legitimate heirs because they had incurred his displeasure, was embarrassed by the natural apprehension that his tomb would not be visited by mourners and hung with garlands as it might otherwise have been. He provided for this difficulty by bequeathing one quarter of his whole fortune to the town of his residence upon the conditions: first, that a kiosk should be erected in his garden to receive his mortal remains; and, second, that an annual sum, sufficient for a dowry, should be paid to that one of the young women, daughters of the day-laborers of the town, who should, in the judgment of the town-council, be the best behaved. Each year, in the month of May, a young woman so chosen should proceed, accompanied by the Council, and deposit her wreath upon his tomb, and receive in exchange her marriage-portion.

His memory surely will be cherished by young men as well as young women; but it is to be doubted whether his death will be regretted any the more.

Sad to say, however, the heirs, not sufficiently regarding the wholesome influence of such a gift in conducing to the good behavior of the young women in the village, entertain some hope of setting aside the bequest by litigation, which is now pending. If they should succeed it is to be feared that the garlands will go to the lawyers instead of to the tomb.

By French usage any city mansion less than a palace is a "Hotel." A lodging-house is a "hôtel meuble" (furnished). The residence of a foreign minister or a peer is called his hotel. The City Hall is the Hôtel de Ville, the Mint, the Stamp-office, and the general Post-office are respectively called the Hotel of Moneys, the Hotel of Stamps, and the Hotel of the Post.

The private hotels are generally built in the form of a hollow square. In the aristocratic quarter of St. Germain one walks along through narrow streets lined with high walls, often of very handsome design, but looking rather blind by reason of a deficiency of windows; and such as appear, moreover, are often obscured by rusty gratings of sashes too thick with dust to admit the light. A pair of great doors, richly carved in wood, open in a lofty archway in such a wall, admitting the visitor to a broad paved courtyard. Upon the lower story of the wings to the right and left are the stables and coach-houses. Upon the opposite side, and entirely concealed from the street, is the main part of the building. The lofty windows of its second story indicate the position of the great salons. The garden is in the rear; a charming retreat, often very extensive, containing groves of trees and extended grass-plats, as well as flower-beds and walks. This is the type of the genuine Paris "hôtel particulière." In much such a residence as this General Cavaignac lived at the time when he administered the government in 1848; and one of the finest of this class is now occupied by the Archbishop of Paris. The latter is distinguished from many other mansions in the same street by its freshly scraped front wall, and by the precautions taken to assure peaceful possession. A savage-looking row of iron spikes curving over the top of the wall, threaten to impale any force which should attempt to scale it, and sentinels with rifle and bayonet never cease to guard the gateway.

Ecclesiastics doubtless understand these things; but to the heretic it looks rather odd to see the shepherd thus protected from the flock.

Wandering the other day through a newly-opened Boulevard behind the gardens of the Luxembourg we came upon the well-known church of Val de Grâce. Though it is not very large, and its approaches are hidden in narrow streets, it is one of the most pretentious in style of all the Paris churches, and its dome is visible at a great distance. Its arched ceiling is elaborately carved in stone; and the interior of its elevated dome is lined with an immense fresco, looking up into which, as into the clouds, the spectator sees a French artist's idea of the last judgment. Its altar is surmounted by a royal canopy, supported by pillars in twisted form, cut from single blocks of dark marble.

This church was founded by Anne of Austria, the queen-consort of Louis XIII., as a gift to the convent within whose ancient precincts it stands, in fulfillment of her numerous vows to build them a chapel on the birth of an heir to the throne of France. This munificent token of royal devotion, which, two hundred years ago, was a most fashionable resort, is now half-vacant, cheerless, and as desolate as a ruin. By historical associations it attracts occasional visitors, who look at the initials of the queen worked in mosaic in the centre of the tessellated floor; go into the little chapel by the side of the altar, through the iron grating door of which the queen used to hear mass; look up to the little stone galleries in which the members of the court used to sit; and peep through the rubbish of a store-room into the confessional where the first mistress of Louis XIV. knelt to whisper her penitent avowals, when her royal master—the scape-grace to commemorate whose birth the church had been piously built—dismissed her to enter the convent.

A marble head of the queen has been removed from the wall of her chapel to enrich the galleries of the Louvre; but, as if to compensate for it, the visitor sees at the other end of the church, in the place where the organ-gallery should be, a large painting of Napoleon III. at the battle of Solferino; while the remains of the organ stand in one of the empty arches of the north aisle. The convent was long since utilized as a military hospital, and the church seems now to be little more than a chapel for the convalescents.

We heard voices singing; and our guide, who was a jolly-faced soldier-boy, led us at our request into the sacristy, an arched room with old oaken presses, crucifixes, and beaded staves, where eight or ten of the invalids were amusing themselves at the harmonium. Dressed alike, in long woolen wrappers and comfortable slippers, with white cotton caps jauntily put on, each in a different style, they formed a picturesque group. They apparently enjoyed having an audience, and sang us a number of pieces.

It reminded us of our own war-times. Yet the scene was, in some of its suggestions, sadder than those of home. These poor boys were not summoned to volunteer in the cause of liberty and nationality, but were conscripts in a time of peace, forbidden to marry, doomed to fight for they knew not what end; and, when incapacitated, to return, not as patriots to the tender welcome of a home, but to be nursed and fed by wholesale in the atmosphere of a military celibacy.

They made us feel that the pleasure of receiving a half-hour's visit from an American family was a genuine and peculiar pleasure. I shall never forget the expression which lighted up those pale and sad countenances as they all took off their cotton caps to bid us good-by, and their murmur of thanks as I wished them, in broken French, a great deal of good health.

GRATIAN.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

AT a recent ball given at the Hôtel de Ville, Paris, the apartments were decorated with seven thousand white and rose camellia trees. These trees were sent from the city gardens, where, in the camellia houses, which cover a superficies of 48,000 metres (a metre is a little more than thirty-nine English inches), there are now no less than 2,000,000 camellia plants. At a very brilliant entertainment lately given in Boston, on the occasion of a young millionaire coming of age, the floral decorations consisted in part of eight thousand camellias (blossoms, not plants, we suppose) and a rare display of other choice flowers. In the centre of the windows hung a globe bouquet, several feet in circumference, some of which contained no less than fifty camellias. The pillars, cornices, chandeliers, and balconies of the Horticultural Hall, where this entertainment was given, were adorned with a profusion of leaves and flowers; and the supper-tables were gay with pyramids of camellias, roses, pinks, and other favorite flowers, arranged in graceful and pleasing forms.

And concerning flowers, at this season when bouquets are expensive luxuries, it is worth while to know how to keep them fresh as long as possible. The Belgian florists are said to practice this plan with great success: Change the water every other day; cut off, with sharp scissors, a quarter of an inch of the stems, and put a pinch of salt and a grain of saltpetre into the water. If very much faded, the stems may be put into hot water for a minute or two, or into high wines, Eau de Cologne, or ammonia. A little nitrate of soda or of potash put into the water will preserve cut flowers a long time.

Leap-year? Of course it is Leap-year. Hasn't every young lady from Maine to California had the important fact reiterated constantly in her ears from the very first day of January, 1868, up to the present moment? All the old bachelors in the country consider it, perhaps, their last chance, and are eager to keep the fact before the ladies. Somewhere in Missouri the local editors of newspapers are engaged—occupied, we mean—in minutely invoicing all the "marriageable men" in the vicinity for the benefit of—not the ladies—but the "marriageable men!" A party of spirited girls away "down East," in order to show how the thing should be done, recently got up a Leap-year sleigh-ride. They invited their masculine companions, handed them into the sleigh, tucked them up warm in buffalo robes, and drove them swiftly and safely for a distance of eighteen miles, and regaled them with a luxurious dinner. Now this is all very well for once—very kind of the ladies—the poor creatures so seldom have a nice dinner, or a ride, or any other pleasure, it is so "expensive!" But really ladies should be careful and not raise expectations; of course, they can't afford to marry in these times; the gentlemen are not expected to bring any money with themselves—they say they have not any; and pray, how long would the lady's fortune last to supply pin-money to a husband whose tendencies to extravagance were strongly developed in the very preparations for marriage? In proof, we clip from an exchange a "Trousseau for a Bridegroom," assured that these estimates are made from the most "reliable sources." The articles and the figures are alike to be depended upon, and will convince young ladies that caution in Leap-year is needful, if they would not curtail their own pleasures, and wreck their own happiness for life.

A young man recently died of consumption in the State Prison at Charlestown, Mass. His story is a sad one. About six years ago he became attached to a young woman, and her friends opposing his suit he eloped with her. They were pursued and overtaken at a hotel, when they begged one final interview alone, and then, as he asserts, mutually agreed to commit suicide. At the last moment, however, her courage failed her, and she called upon him, as he says, to do the deed for her. He then cut her throat and his own. She died; he recovered, and was tried at Lenox and convicted of murder, but was saved from the gallows by a commutation of his sentence to imprisonment for life. After six years of prison-life he died, penitent for the crime he had committed.

Quite a different crime, or committed under a very different exciting cause, is now being investigated in Cleveland. A sister lies in prison on the charge of having poisoned her only brother, about a year ago, for the purpose of obtaining the amount of the insurance upon his life. As yet the evidence is only circumstantial. The wretched girl seems keenly alive to the disgrace of being imprisoned like a common felon.

An Indiana journal relates a most distressing occurrence which took place in Lafayette. A lady who had long been in the habit of reading by lamp or candle light, late at night, after she had retired, was discovered one morning, about three o'clock, to be in flames. The servant, who had been aroused by the fire and smoke, did what she could to quench the flames, and summoned help; but the unfortunate lady died in an hour. It is supposed that she had been reading as usual, and after laying aside her book had set the candle upon the floor, where its blaze was communicated to the clothing hanging over the side of the bed. This is a warning which those who are in the habit of reading in bed would do well to heed.

A new field is open to woman. An act has just been passed in the Kansas State Senate, allowing any qualified person, "without regard to sex or color," to practice law in all the courts. And in London the Court of Assistants of the Apothecaries' Company have decided that women should not be excluded from their examinations in arts; and it is probable that this important concession will be followed by admitting them unreservedly to the medical examinations. Dr. Buchanan, a member of the Court of Assistants, has been mainly influential in bringing about this decision.

According to report, or history, or mythology—it matters little which—a perpetual Leap-year exists in Ukraine, a province, which if our geography is not in fault, is, or was, somewhere in Russia. In that land, when a young woman falls in love with a man, she does not hesitate to go to his father's house, and reveal her passion in the most tender and pathetic manner, and to promise the most submissive obedience if he will accept her for a wife. Should the insensible swain pretend any excuse, she tells him that she is resolved not to quit the house till he gives his consent; and accordingly, taking up her lodging, remains there till he either consents to be wooed, or betakes himself to flight.

till it is an inch and a quarter wide at the top. Cover this with pleated lace to within five inches from the bottom, and fill up the remaining part with puffed lace, as shown in the illustration, then join it to the fichu, Fig. 17. Trim the bottom of the bertha and sash-ends with blonde two and a half inches wide, with a heading of the fringe already mentioned; this fringe also borders the whole bertha and sash. Finish with narrow blonde, and a second row of wide blonde, set in scallops on the ends of the sash with a blonde rosette at the top of each scallop.

Marie Antoinette Fichu.

THIS fichu is especially suited to mourning toilettes. It is made of black silk lace, insertion, and two widths of black satin ribbon. The fichu consists of a piece of black lace, three quarters of a yard square, bordered with black Marie Antoinette Bertha-Fichu.

On a foundation of white silk lace, which is arranged partly in pleats and partly in puffs, set a trimming of narrow and wide white blonde, and silk fringe three quarters of an inch wide. A foundation of stiff lace supports the whole. Cut therefrom Fig. 17 in one piece, and arrange the silk lace on it in puffs an inch and a half wide, leaving two inches around the edge of the bertha. Then cut for each sash-end a strip of stiff lace, a yard and an eighth long and a quarter of a yard wide, and slope it on one side lace insertion, an inch wide, through which is run a narrow black satin ribbon, and black lace two inches wide. This square is then doubled in a triangular shape, so that the lace on one corner just reaches the insertion of the other. The lace is pleated along the fold, leaving the front corners loose, and a bow of satin ribbon with long ends is set over the pleats in the middle of the back, with ribbon loops, an inch and a half apart, on each side. The lower one of these loops is an inch and a half long, and each of the others a quarter of an inch shorter. Lace sash-ends, trimmed to match the fichu, are set on in front.

GENTLEMEN'S FASHIONS.

Fig. 1.—WALKING DRESS. Brown paletot, showing the outline of the figure without being tight-fitting. Velvet collar to match. High roll, straight in front, and buttoned by means of an under-lapel. Skirt rather long and scant, with side-pocket, covered with broad lapel. Sleeve of average size, with cuff bound with broad galloon, with which the paletot is likewise bound. Scarf-cavat of black satin. Standing shirt collar. Fawn-colored gloves. Olive pantaloons, with broad stripes, intersected by narrow diagonal stripes. Hat with average brim.

Fig. 2.—WALKING DRESS. Black short coat, bound with broad galloon, and fastened with three buttons. Sleeve of average size, with gauntlet cuff, trimmed with galloon and buttons. Turn-down collar. Black cravat. Primrose gloves. Demi-tight gray pantaloons, with stripes of two shades. Hat with average brim turned up somewhat on the side.

Fig. 3.—Dark blue short coat, of the same shape as that in the last figure. Standing collar. Demi-tight pantaloons, of a light chestnut color, with a stripe at the side.

Fig. 4.—FANCY DRESS. Low black velvet cap, trimmed with a band of Astrakhan. Red-ington of royal blue cloth, with demi-high standing collar, bound with broad galloon to match; front straight, closed by four Brandenburgs, all of the same size. Waist adjusted, and somewhat long; skirt long, reaching the knee, rather full at the sides, and trimmed in the front corners with a small ornament resembling those of the Brandenburgs. Sleeve of average size, open at the bottom nearly to the elbow, and trimmed with galloon and six buttons. Black cravat. Standing collar. Straw-colored gloves. Demi-tight pantaloons of Havana cloth, with a stripe of darker color at the sides.

Fig. 5.—WALKING DRESS. Sack over-coat of olive-gray cloth, with velvet collar to match. Collar rolling low, with button-hole on the revers. Side-pockets, with square lapels. Average-sized sleeve, trimmed with a broad cuff, which, together with the coat, is bound with galloon to match. Blue cravat. Standing collar. Light drab gloves. Bluish-gray pantaloons, with narrow, vertical stripes.

HANNIBAL.

"FOR pity's sake don't let us have another of those tiresome love-stories!" exclaimed my niece.

I had seated myself at my desk to write the prosiest of business letters when this interruption took place.

"Love's a humbug, and I'm tired of it," continued Annie.

"That's because you know nothing about it," said Maggie, who is engaged.

"Don't I, indeed?" was the answer. "It isn't your fault, or Tom's, if I don't. I shall be glad when you two are fairly married and out of love."

"Well," said Maggie, "you'll be in love some time, that's one comfort."

"I! Love!" said Annie.

"Few—none find what they love, or could have loved: But accident, blind contact, and the strong Necessity of loving, have removed Antipathies."

The necessity don't exist in my case. I can amuse myself. So write us a nice story, without any love in it; do!"

"Child, child!" said I, "you speak lightly because you feel lightly. God is love. There is no perfect life without love. How, then, can I body forth in words my ideal of human action and passion, and leave out the strongest of all passions?"

It was throwing my pearls away.

"Strongest of pastimes, you mean," she said. "Write my life, or your own. We've neither of us ever been in love; but I'm sure we are as interesting as we could be if we spent our time talking nonsense, or looking it, which is worse. Come, Maggie, it's bedtime."

When they were gone I finished my letter, and having sealed and stamped it, I proceeded to evolve the materials for my next story, which must not be a love-story.

But the more I thought, the more the story wouldn't come. Annie's suggestion occurred to me. My own life, or hers. My own life? No. Another might have written it, and after the most careful search have found no trace of what we mean when we say love in it. But I knew better—I only. Looking out of the window across the pond, I could see the moonlight making grim shadows in the grave-yard upon the hill, and bringing out one stone in strong relief; an old stone, weather-worn and moss-grown, with weeds high around it. There is no one left to take them away, and I let them grow. I have no right there even now, although the earth that once seemed so fair to me has long ago mingled with its mother-earth, and the spirit, wherever it is, thinks as little of the passion that has thrown its shade over every thought and deed of my life as in the days that are gone.

Annie's life! Why the child has not had any life worth speaking of yet. She has never had the slightest approach to an adventure; not so much as a railroad accident, or a narrow escape from pickpockets to tell about. I think the most exciting incident in her life was a ride she took last summer on my horse Hannibal. I bought Hannibal at a great bargain just before going into the country in the spring, hoping to fatten him and myself by rest and country fare, and coming back to the city with him in the fall to "witch the world with noble horsemanship." Man proposes, etc. Now, I am not naturally fond of horses; I have never had much to do with them, and perhaps I am not as skillful in their management as I could wish; but I determined to undertake the whole care of this one from the very beginning. So, sending my baggage on before with Annie, I directed the man who had charge of the horse to bring him to the dépôt in time for the freight train. He arrived punctually at the moment the cars left, and immediately went away again, leaving me standing like a statue of perplexity, holding the horse and wondering what to do with him during the three long hours that must elapse before the next train started. To add to my trouble, Hannibal himself seemed unaccountably restless, going round and round me as I stood holding him, and turning as he turned. Presently a man passed.

"Sir, is there a stable near here?" I shouted.

"Dunno," was the answer.

"What'll you take to hold my horse?"

"How long?"

"Two or three hours."

"Won't take nothin'. Tie him up somewhere;" and the man departed in a spasm of the universal hurry characteristic of railroad and ferry passengers. But his suggestion did not seem to me a bad one; and I looked around for a post. The dépôt itself was a new one, and not much more than half finished; and at this time of day there was little going on there. There was one post which seemed to be just the thing. It was rather near the track; but if I heard the cars coming I could easily take him away in time. So, tying him there, I bought a Harper's Monthly, and proceeded to make myself as comfortable as possible under the circumstances. Presently some one touched me on the shoulder. "That horse yours, Sir? He's perilous near the track." Sure enough, he was "perilous near," and a train coming at full speed. One step too far, and my equestrian hopes would lie crushed to the earth. But the question was, how to get him away. He was evidently not used to the cars, and his manner of testifying his surprise at their appearance did not encourage me to approach within reach of his iron shoes. I looked at the little valleys already made by his formidable feet, and meditated for the space of a second. I thought of the officer who, being rallied upon his pale face as he went into battle, replied, "Yes, Sir, I am afraid, and if you were half as much so, you would run away;" and, boldly rushing where duty and honor called me, I untied the halter, and tried to lead the horse away; but the obstinate animal, not having my powers of reasoning with his fears, would not stir a step. I pulled and tugged, and the train came thundering on. Should I stay, and perhaps be dragged upon the track by the frantic brute, just in time for my name to appear in the morning papers in a little anecdote headed "Killed;" or should I seek an inglorious safety in flight? At that moment the man who had before spoken to me came up, snatched the halter from my hand, and, in some utterly incomprehensible and mysterious way, persuaded the horse to seek safer quarters. "Guess you ain't much used to hosses, be you?" said he, as I turned to express my gratitude.

But I will not go on with the mortifying details of that day. It is enough to say that, in company with my dreadful charge, I arrived safely at B—, in due season, utterly exhausted in mind and body.

There I hoped all my sorrows were at an end. I think Hannibal must have been almost as tired as I was, for we passed that night in peace. Fearing that overwork would retard the improvement which was to take place in him during the summer, I allowed him to remain quietly in the stable all the next day; and as he behaved, on the whole, very much like other horses, I retired the second night in a serene state of mind, planning a short and safe trial of his ambulatory powers in the morning. A little after midnight I awoke with a strange feeling of dread, a presentiment of coming evil so strong upon me that I could not go to sleep again immediately. Presently I heard sounds outside, of a peculiar nature; and going to the window I saw my tormentor and another horse enjoying a moonlight promenade among the vegetables. Somehow or other they had got loose; and the stable-door having been left open on account of the extreme heat, they came out for a little fresh air. I summoned my host, Brown, and together we succeeded in reducing our rebellious vassals to submission, and committed them to their prison once more. Brown laughed; he is a cheerful man; but I looked ruefully at the cabbages upon which my horse had rolled, the strawberry-bed where they seemed to have been having a wrestling match, the young corn among which their careless steps had wandered, and thought of Mrs. Brown's dismay in the morning. Full of sad thoughts and vague doubts concerning the intrinsic value of horse-flesh, I went back to my room; but the goddess Sleep, after having been so rudely banished, would not return. I presented such a wobegone appearance at the breakfast-table that Annie professed the greatest solicitude, and begged me to care for my precious health by driving out somewhere; she would go along for company, she added. As this was precisely my own plan, I prepared to go. That is, I tried to. I knew tolerably well where the different parts of the harness ought to go, but the difficulty was to get them there. Hannibal objected to the bit; and kept his mouth resolutely shut, in spite of my utmost efforts to force it open. Every man about the place was away in the long meadow, nearly a mile off, and there were no near neighbors. At last I spied Lettice Brown through the stable-door, and, conquering the foolish pride which had kept me at work so long rather than give up what I had undertaken, I asked her advice and assistance, which she gave so readily that Annie and I were soon riding along at the dangerous rate of four miles an hour. It was a pleasant day, the horse behaved well, and we had plenty of time to spare, so we took a long ride; and at length, after I had performed the difficult feat of turning around, with great dexterity, we drove home, tired but happy.

Before going to bed that night I suggested to Brown that perhaps it would be as well to lock the stable-door. He assured me that it was entirely unnecessary; the horses needed air; they could not have been half tied the night before; and ended by saying that he would himself see that they were properly secured before he went to bed—a promise which he may have kept, but I am afraid he didn't.

For being tired by my unaccustomed exercise and the loss of sleep the night before I retired early, and slept for about three hours, when a flash of lightning, accompanied by a loud peal of thunder, awoke me. Of course my first thoughts were of my horse, and half-awake I went to the window and looked out. There was little to be seen, but I thought something was moving in the direction of the stable; I fancied I heard the sound of hoofs. Slipping on the smallest possible amount of clothing, I went quietly down the stairs and out to the barn. Sure enough my horse was gone! A flash of lightning showed me the whole garden and adjacent meadow, but no horse in either, while, after the thunder died away, I could hear something that sounded like the gallop of a horse far down the road. The chances of my catching him alone, on foot, in a thunder-storm in the middle of the night, were not strong; and after saying a word or two, which I blush to recall, I went back to bed and to sleep, trusting to finding Hannibal in the morning, something in the way I had seen lost cows discovered standing before the door at breakfast-time.

I seemed to have scarcely fallen into a doze when some one knocked at my door with the welcome intelligence that "There's a horse in the canal, and Jake Smith says it's your'n." A sudden feeling, half of hope, half dread, made me pause before asking "Is he dead?"

"Sakes alive, no!" was the answer, "but he soon will be if you don't hurry. He can't get out." So I hurried; and after no small amount of work and worry we succeeded in rescuing the noble creature, amidst the cheers of a small mob from the neighboring village.

After this episode there was a short cessation from active hostilities. Hannibal needed rest, and he had it. I needed rest, too, but I did not always have it. One night somebody took it into his head to ride at full gallop past our house just as I was going to sleep. Of course I thought it was Hannibal, and went out to the stable, where I found him peacefully sleeping; another time an old cow got into the garden and produced a like effect upon me, with the same result. But if my horse only improved in health and beauty I could bear it all.

One day Annie came to me, and began to talk in such a very affectionate and complimentary manner that my patience gave out. "What do you want?" said I, gruffly. "Stop all this palavering, or I'll say no, without hearing." She laughed; my ill-temper never troubles her much.

"You'll say yes, when you do hear it, no matter what you say before. I want to ride Hannibal."

She was a good rider; so there was nothing very startling in the idea. But to ride Hannibal! "I'm afraid you can't manage him," said I; "he's so spirited!"

"Oh, I'll go in the daytime," she said. "You know he keeps all his spirits for the evening."

Of course Annie had her way; and that afternoon she started off with a party of young friends. While they were waiting for her Brown stood looking with a critic's eye at the horses, until Hannibal was brought out, when he turned his attention to him.

"Looks kind o' thin," was his comment.

"Good Heavens!" I exclaimed, "what can be the reason?"

"I'm afraid he's been broken of his rest too much, lately," said Annie.

Here Fred Mortimer, who was one of the party, rode nearer as I was about to help Annie mount.

"That horse don't look very gentle," said he.

"He hasn't any bad tricks, I hope?"

"I hope not," said I, meekly. "I haven't had him long, and no one has ridden him yet."

"I don't like his looks," said Fred. "Annie, you'd better change with me. My horse is as gentle as a lamb."

Annie did not look favorably upon the idea of riding a lamb; but I encouraged Fred, and he proceeded to change the saddles and put her upon his horse without paying the slightest attention to her objections. Annie was a good deal provoked; for Fred was an old playmate, and had once been a devoted admirer of hers. It was mortifying to be put down so coolly by him. So as soon as she was in the saddle she rode forward to the front of the little cavalcade, leaving Fred to fall back into his old place in the rear, with a very pretty young lady from the city, who was, Brown informed me confidentially, "his gal."

But Hannibal was like Lord Byron, who woke one morning and found himself famous. He had scarcely entered the village when he was surrounded by an admiring crowd of boys and men. "Hullo! that's the hoss what got in the canal! Give him three cheers for gittin' out agin'!" And they gave the cheers with such energy that Hannibal fairly stood still to listen; then showed his disapproval by throwing up his heels, as if trying to shake the dust from off his feet; and getting the bit between his teeth, he started off at the top of his speed, going past the other riders, and far down the road, like a flash. Past all the other riders but Annie, I mean. The lamb-like animal which she rode, hearing Hannibal behind him, resolved not to be passed; and Annie, who had not yet recovered her temper, instead of checking him at once, urged him on. They were both soon out of sight; and although we rode miles in every direction, we heard nothing of them until the next morning. Then Fred made his appearance, mounted upon his own horse; and although he rode fast, presented such a melancholy and travel-stained appearance that I was frightened.

"Annie is safe," he hastened to say, seeing my anxiety; "but she was too tired to ride today. I could find no one to send, so I was obliged to leave her. You had better take a carriage for her. She is over at Dr. St. Jean's;" and after giving me minute directions for finding her he rode homeward. I stood a moment looking after him a little bewildered by his unusual manner. He was bent over like a very weak or very tired man; his face was perfectly colorless, and even his voice sounded strained and unnatural. If the ride had exhausted him so, poor Annie would need more than one day's rest. So I got out the largest available carriage, filled it with cushions, some wine, some books, and a basket of eatables a little better than a small farm-house would be likely to afford; and being thus armed and equipped I started forth like a wandering knight going to the rescue of his "ladye faire," in the nineteenth century.

After the first few miles the country began to grow wilder, and the farm-houses smaller and farther apart. The road was either up-hill or down all the time, and seemed not to have been worked since the Deluge washed off the dirt and left the stones.

Suddenly, in the midst of the most unpromising region that I have ever seen, I came upon a small farm which seemed to have been taken up bodily from some more favored country and hidden away among these barren hills and bleak pine-trees. The air was heavy with the sweet breath of grape-vines; while opposite, the beautiful waving grain stretched away toward a dark wall of chestnut and evergreen trees. This must be the place; I had often heard it described, for a teacher of Annie's lived there, and Annie used sometimes to go there to see her. As I walked up the neat gravel-path Annie herself came out to meet me.

"Don't go in just yet," she said, leading me to a seat on the piazza. "They have just received good news from France. You know they are political exiles, suspected of being mixed up in something that Mademoiselle says they never even heard of until they were accused of it. But they have friends in Paris; and at last the truth has been discovered, Mademoiselle says, and they are to have back their titles and what is left of their estates. Somebody has died, and left them money besides."

I was deeply interested in the St. Jean family, but nevertheless I interrupted here to ask about her ride.

"Oh, don't speak of it!" she said, impatiently. "The horses ran away, and before we could stop them we got lost. After a while we found our way here, and I told Fred I wouldn't go any farther; I was too tired, and besides I wanted to see Mademoiselle. So he went home to tell you we were alive."

Just then the door opened, and Mademoiselle came out. She had evidently been crying; but she sat down with us and tried to tell us the whole story. It was a sad one. Her father had died in prison; she came with her mother and brothers to this country under an assumed name, and since then they had lived a life of toil and privation, but never lost courage, she said, until her mother died. She showed us a little inclosure close by, containing a single grave carefully tended by her hands, where they had laid her.

Annie's pleasure in the good fortune of her friends seemed even greater than that of Mademoiselle—la Baronne Amelie de C., she called herself. To know a real exile, and a real baroness! and to hear her story in such a way. It was almost an adventure.

My faith in Annie's fatigue had vanished by this time, so I suggested that we had better go home, to which she, after extracting a solemn promise from Mlle. la Baronne to visit her before she sailed, and promising to go to Europe for the express purpose of seeing her in the halls of her ancestors, consented; and we drove home, with the extra cushions under the seats, and Hannibal meekly following. As we turned the corner I looked back. Mademoiselle was kneeling by the solitary grave, whose quiet occupant had found the last refuge of a broken heart in a strange land, with her hands clasped as if in prayer.

Annie was as fresh and talkative as ever, but she would not say a word about "that stupid ride." She could not think or speak of anything but her French friends. Even the news Brown told us as he helped us out of the carriage did not divert her mind from Mademoiselle.

"Fred Mortimer's been and enlisted since you went away," he said. "And folks do say it's because that gal o' his'n has took up with another feller, but I don't believe a word on't. Fred's a right up and down good fellow, and any gal that don't think so is a fool. Eh, Miss Annie?"

But Annie was busy with the cushions and baskets, and did not hear.

Well! It isn't much to make a story of. It shows how little Annie knows of life when such a trifle is an event. I began to tell her at the breakfast-table what poor success her plan had met with; but just then the morning paper was brought in, and I took that up first, as being the most important of my daily duties. There had been a great battle, and I glanced hastily over the list of names. Yes, there was one: Frederick J. Mortimer, Major—th Reg. N. Y. S. M., killed.

"Why, Annie!" I exclaimed, "can that be Fred?"

But Annie did not answer. She stood in front of me, staring at the paper with wide-open, frightened eyes, like a little child, until I looked up and repeated my question. Then she fainted away at my feet; and my story is a love story after all.

BONNIE MAY.

THE sunbeams kiss thy forehead fair,
And rest upon thy golden hair,
My bonnie May!

They can not choose but love a face
That meets them with so sweet a grace,
Thou bonnie May!

To me thou art a ray of light
Making the whole world wondrous bright,
My little May!

My heart thrills at the simplest word,
The soft tones of my singing bird,
My pretty May!

The best, the bravest, truest love
That e'er was sent man from above,
My peerless May!

Thou'rt always true to Hope, and she Hath never yet forsaken thee,
Her loyal May!

Thou say'st whene'er my heart is bowed,
"The sun still shines behind the cloud,"
My comfort May!

As we have shared life's woe and sorrow,
That there will come a brighter morrow,
Let us not doubt!

Ay, love, we will go hand in hand
Until we reach the promised land,
My darling May!

And every hour, and every day,
I upward lift my heart and say,
"Heav'n bless my May!"

Light of mine eyes, my hope, my life,
God love for aye my sunshine wife,
My peerless May!

ANGEL AND WOMAN.

FAITH is beautiful. And the faith of some men in some women is beautiful. But the faith of some other men in some other women is so far from beautiful that it is simply absurd and ridiculous.

I have just been spending a month with a woman who was described to me as an angel by a man who is reputed to possess excellent discernment and rare judgment.

The woman is Eleanor Saxe.
The man is Roger Platt.

He told me she had a fair complexion beautifully tinted with pink like sea-shells.

I nodded my head approvingly. Angels are not supposed to be tanned, or freckled, or blotched.

Moles and pimples, too, would be out of character on the face of an angel, I suppose, if, indeed, angels have faces.

He told me she had naturally wavy hair that fell around her shoulders in masses of golden beauty.

I nodded approval of that too. If an angel's hair waved, of course it would wave naturally, for probably patent crimpers and frizzing irons are inventions the angels have not looked into.

He told me her teeth were like pearls and as even as false ones.

I bowed. Angelic teeth could be no more. He told me her eyes had the soft, liquid beauty of the gazelles, with mysterious depths like mountain lakes.

To tell the truth I never examined the eyes of a gazelle, or explored the depths of mountain lakes; but then I never saw an angel's eyes, so I had no reasonable ground of objection.

He told me her neck was white as alabaster, and plump and round.

An angel's neck gaunt and bony, with the clavicle and scapula scantily protected, it never entered into man's imagination to conceive; and in this particular also Miss Saxe might be angelic.

He told me her hands were white and delicate, and her feet the tiniest he ever saw.

Being in doubt concerning an angel's proportions, I could not say whether or not these Lilliputian extremities gave Miss Saxe a claim to be included among the angels.

He told me she had soft, gentle tones, and sang divinely.

That was angelic, I confessed, if it were true. He told me she wore becoming colors, and the most bewitching knots of ribbon and bewildering bonnets it was possible to imagine.

I shook my head. White is the only orthodox color for angels, and the knots of ribbon and bewildering bonnets belong to Parisiennes rather than angels.

He told me she danced like a sylph, and had pretty, piquant ways and graceful manners.

He paused.
"What else?" I asked.
"Nothing," he answered. "I believe that is all."

"Miss Saxe has a cousin," I remarked. "One Rachel Endermier."

"Yes," replied Roger Platt, indifferently. "She is not at all pretty or interesting, only a very ordinary woman."

"I am somewhat weary of my bachelor state," he continued, confidentially, after a pause. "I think I shall take to myself a wife to cheer and bless me all my life. There is something so beautiful in the patience, unselfishness, and enduring love of woman. I shall get them all by making Eleanor Saxe my wife, for, as I said before, she is an angel."

Roger Platt is a lawyer, and in the summing up of his cases I have been impressed with the acumen displayed in collecting valid testimony, and rejecting that which had no bearing on the case.

It seemed to me Roger Platt's argument was weak this time, however. In establishing the point that Eleanor Saxe was an angel he had mentioned fair complexion, golden hair, pearly teeth, liquid eyes, alabaster neck, delicate hands, tiny feet, gentle voice, graceful form, becoming dress, and piquant air. Possibly these were angelic, possibly not. As for patience, unselfishness, and enduring love, they were inferences deduced from irrelevant facts. As far as I could see no witness had testified concerning them.

For the past month I have been thrown in daily intercourse with Eleanor Saxe and Rachel Endermier.

I have seen Roger Platt's angel with her hair in curl-papers, her feet slipshod, and her form untidily clad, and I have said that, according to his reasoning, all the difference between an angel and a shabby woman is paint, powder, hair-oil, and dry-goods.

I have seen Rachel Endermier in season and out of season, with tidy head and feet, and a form that is always neatly clad. No one thinks of calling her angel. Her highest praise is—womanly. Contrasting the two characters, I have said it is better to be a woman than an angel.

I have seen the mother of Roger Platt's angel toiling wearily in the kitchen while the angel lounged in the parlor. Eleanor Saxe's hands may well be lily white. Toiling and spinning mar not their delicacy.

I have seen the mother of Roger Platt's very ordinary woman blessed with the care of the woman's willing hands and the forethought of her loving heart. Rachel Endermier's hands are brown and not so small as Eleanor's—but when I have thought that angels are ministering spirits, I have said Rachel Endermier is more an angel than Eleanor Saxe.

I have seen Eleanor Saxe unreasonable and unjust. I have seen her cruel and severe. I have said, "Alas for angels, if these be they!"

I have seen Rachel Endermier just when justice was not easy, and kind when kindness cost a sacrifice. I have seen her pitiful when others were pitiless, and merciful when others were severely just. I have said, "All hail to women if these be they!"

I have seen Eleanor Saxe impatient and vindictive. I have seen her eyes flash with fury and her lips curl with proudest scorn.

I have seen Rachel Endermier patient under provocation, submissive under discipline, and forgiving under injury. I have said, "Roger Platt is in error. Eleanor Saxe has not the patience we attribute to the angels, and Rachel Endermier has."

I have seen Eleanor Saxe seek her own comfort at others' expense, and Rachel Endermier sacrifice her own for others' pleasure, and I have said, "In this too is Roger Platt mistaken; Eleanor Saxe has not the unselfishness of angels, and Rachel Endermier has."

I have seen Eleanor Saxe a flirt and coquette. I have seen Rachel Endermier true in trial and faithful in adversity. I have said, "Roger Platt is at fault again; Eleanor Saxe's is not the enduring love that blesses him that hath it, and Rachel Endermier's is."

To-day I have talked with Roger Platt just in sight of the angel and ordinary woman. The angel lounged, the ordinary woman sewed. They were characteristic attitudes.

Roger Platt bade me observe the delicate pink that tinged Miss Saxe's cheek and faded into pretty whiteness at her temples, and tell him if I ever saw any thing half as lovely.

"Your gift of yesterday was like it," I answered.

I put in his hand a faded flower. The day before it was delicate pink, fading into snowy whiteness at the petals' edges, but to-day, as I gave it in his hands, it was withered and void of beauty.

"Miss Endermier is a model of industry," I remarked.

"But sewing pricks a woman's fingers so outrageously!" answered Roger Platt.

I declare I laughed, thinking of the day that will surely come when Roger Platt will fail to find compensation in the pink and white of an angel's face suffering for the careful stitches of an ordinary woman.

"Miss Saxe has a perfect profile," observed Roger Platt, after another survey of Eleanor's side face. "I think you never saw more regular features."

For answer I pointed to a broken statuette. The day before it had stood in the beauty of delicately-chiseled chin, and lip, and nose, and brow. To-day it was worthless as a broken toy.

"Miss Endermier has a good face, full of truth," I said.

"I never could abide a retroussé nose on a woman's face," was the answer.

I laughed again, thinking of the hour that is inevitable when the perfect profile of an angel's face will not weigh in the balance with the goodness and truth of an ordinary woman.

"Miss Saxe unconsciously takes attitudes fit for pictures," remarked Roger Platt, studying the easy negligence of her position in the most comfortable chair in the room.

"I like Miss Endermier's better," I answered. She had just arisen and exchanged her comfortable chair with an invalid, whose seat was straight-backed and less easy.

"I hate to see a woman sit bolt upright," answered Roger Platt.

I did not laugh. I sighed for thinking of the day when the grace of an angel would gladly be exchanged for the unselfishness of a woman like Rachel Endermier.

"Miss Saxe has the rare faculty of dressing becomingly," remarked Roger Platt. "Did you ever see any thing more bewitching than those jaunty little bows that loop up her over-skirt?"

"Yes," I said, with my eyes on Rachel Endermier, who was soothing the child Eleanor Saxe had driven from her lest it should soil her dress. "Miss Endermier has the most loving heart and true of any woman I know," I added, by way of conclusion.

"I am sure you are mistaken," replied Roger Platt. "Miss Saxe must be affectionate and noble, with such a face."

Such a face! That is the secret of Roger Platt's error, the rock on which his judgment wrecked.

I turned away with the old justification. "Ephraim is joined to his idols, let him alone." The history of another will be Roger Platt's in another year:

"But when a twelve-month passed away,
Jack found his goddess turned to clay."

SERVANTS' DRESS.

THE English journals are agitating the question as to whether by some means Bridget and Molly can not be persuaded to lay aside tawdry finery for a neat and becoming dress. One writer goes so far as to propose that the ladies shall form an association, pledging themselves to adopt, each family for itself, a uniform for their female servants, and to admit none into their service who refuse to wear it. The uniform is not to be old-fashioned or disfiguring, but merely neat, simple, and consequently becoming. The following ornaments are to be absolutely prohibited: Feathers, flowers, brooches, buckles or clasps, ear-rings, lockets, neck-ribbons and velvets, kid gloves, parasols, sashes, jackets, Garibaldi's, all trimming on dresses, crinoline, or steel of any kind. No dress to touch the ground. No pads or frisettes, no chignons, no hair-ribbons.

Morning dress: Lilac print, calico apron, linen collar. Afternoon dress: Some lighter print, muslin apron, linen collar and cuffs. Sundays: A neat alpaca dress, linen collar and cuffs, or a frill tacked into the neck of the dress, a black apron, a black shawl, a medium straw bonnet with ribbons and strings of the same color, a bow of the same inside, and a slight cap across the forehead, thread or cotton gloves, a small cotton or alpaca umbrella to keep off sun and rain. The winter Sunday dress: Linsey dress, shepherd's-plaid shawl, black straw bonnet. A plain brown or black turndown straw hat with a rosette of the same color, and fastened on with elastic, should be possessed by all servants for common use, and is indispensable for nurse-maids walking out with children. Should servants be in mourning, the same neat style must be observed—no bugles, or beads, or crape flowers allowed.

It is scarcely likely that any thing so sweeping will be achieved; but it is certain that if servants would follow these suggestions, at least in the kitchen, it would conduce to the comfort of themselves and their employers. However, as another writer sensibly remarks, the reaction in favor of a neat and simple style must come from above and not below. When ladies of position and fortune cease to lavish their thousands on millinery, the imitative race in the kitchen will no longer squander their wages after their example.

CORD AND CREESE;

OR,

THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

"PICKED UP ADRIFT."

On the morning following two travelers left a small inn which lay on the road-side, about ten miles north of Brandon. It was about eight o'clock when they took their departure, driving in their own carriage at a moderate pace along the road.

"Look, Langhetti," said the one who was driving, pointing with his whip to an object in the road directly in front of them.

Langhetti raised his head, which had been bowed down in deep abstraction, to look in the direction indicated. A figure was approaching them. It looked like a woman. She walked very slowly, and appeared rather to stagger than to walk.

"She appears to be drunk, Despard," said Langhetti. "Poor wretch, and on this bleak March morning too! Let us stop and see if we can do any thing for her."

They drove on, and as they met the woman Despard stopped.

She was young and extraordinarily beautiful. Her face was thin and white. Her clothing was of fine materials but scanty and torn to shreds. As they stopped she turned her large eyes up despairingly and stood still, with a face which seemed to express every conceivable emotion of anguish and of hope. Yet as her eyes rested on Langhetti a change came over her. The deep and unutterable sadness of her face passed away, and was succeeded by a radiant flash of joy. She threw out her arms toward him with a cry of wild entreaty.

The moment that Langhetti saw her he started up and stood for an instant as if paralyzed. Her cry came to his ears. He leaped from the carriage toward her, and caught her in his arms.

"Oh, Bice! Alas, my Bicina!" he cried, and a thousand fond words came to his lips.

Beatrice looked up with eyes filled with grateful tears; her lips murmured some inaudible sentences; and then, in this full assurance of safety, the resolution that had sustained her so long gave way altogether. Her eyes closed, she gave a low moan, and sank senseless upon his breast.

Langhetti supported her for a moment, then gently laid her down to try and restore her. He chafed her hands, and did all that is usually done in such emergencies. But here the case was different—it was more than a common faint, and the animation now suspended was not to be restored by ordinary efforts.

Langhetti bowed over her as he chafed her hands. "Ah, my Bicina," he cried; "is it thus I find you! Ah, poor thin hand! Alas, white wan face! What suffering has been yours, pure angel, among those fiends of hell!"

He paused, and turned a face of agony toward Despard. But as he looked at him he saw a grief in his countenance that was only second to his own. Something in Beatrice's appearance had struck him with a deeper feeling than that merely human interest which the generous heart feels in the sufferings of others.

"Langhetti," said he, "let us not leave this sweet angel exposed to this bleak wind. We must take her back to the inn. We have gained our object. Alas! the gain is worse than a failure."

"What can we do?"

"Let us put her in the carriage between us, and drive back instantly."

Despard stooped as he spoke, raised her reverently in his arms, and lifted her upon the seat. He sprang in and put his arms around her senseless form, so as to support her against himself. Langhetti looked on with eyes that were moist with a sad yet mysterious feeling.

Then he resumed his place in the carriage.

"Oh, Langhetti!" said Despard, "what is it that I saw in the face of this poor child that so wrings my heart? What is this mystery of yours that you will not tell?"

"I can not solve it," said Langhetti, "and therefore I will not tell it."

"Tell it, whatever it is."

"No, it is only conjecture as yet, and I will not utter it."

"And it affects me?"

"Deeply."

"Therefore tell it."

"Therefore I must not tell it; for if it prove baseless I shall only excite your feeling in vain."

"At any rate let me know. For I have the wildest fancies, and I wish to know if it is possible that they are like your own."

"No, Despard," said Langhetti. "Not now. The time may come, but it has not yet."

Beatrice's head leaned against Despard's shoulder as she reclined against him, sustained by his arm. Her face was upturned; a face as white as marble, her pure Grecian features showing now their faultless lines like the sculptured face of some goddess. Her beauty was perfect in its classic outline. But her eyes were closed, and her wan, white lips parted; and there was sorrow on her face which did not seem appropriate to one so young.

"Look," said Langhetti, in a mournful voice. "Saw you ever in all your life any one so perfectly and so faultlessly beautiful? Oh, if you could but have seen her, as I have done, in her moods of inspiration, when she sang! Could I ever have imagined such a fate as this for her?"

"Oh, Despard!" he continued, after a pause in which the other had turned his stern face to him without a word—"Oh, Despard! you ask me to tell you this secret. I dare not. It is so wide-spread. If my fancy be true, then all your life must at once be unsettled, and all your soul turned to one dark purpose. Never will I turn you to that purpose till I know the truth beyond the possibility of a doubt."

"I saw that in her face," said Despard, "which I hardly dare acknowledge to myself."

"Do not acknowledge it, then, I implore you. Forget it. Do not open up once more that old and now almost forgotten sorrow. Think not of it even to yourself."

Langhetti spoke with a wild and vehement urgency which was wonderful.

"Do you not see," said Despard, "that you rouse my curiosity to an intolerable degree?"

"Be it so; at any rate it is better to suffer from curiosity than to feel what you must feel if I told you what I suspect."

Had it been any other man than Langhetti Despard would have been offended. As it was he said nothing, but began to conjecture as to the best course for them to follow.

"It is evident," said he to Langhetti, "that she has escaped from Brandon Hall during the past night. She will, no doubt, be pursued. What shall we do? If we go back to this inn they will wonder at our bringing her. There is another inn a mile further on."

"I have been thinking of that," replied Langhetti. "It will be better to go to the other inn. But what shall we say about her?"

"Let us say she is an invalid going home."

"And am I her medical attendant?" asked Despard.

"No; that is not necessary. You are her guardian—the Rector of Holby, of course—your name is sufficient guarantee."

"Oh," said Despard, after a pause, "I'll tell you something better yet. I am her brother and she is my sister—Miss Despard."

As he spoke he looked down upon her marble face. He did not see Langhetti's countenance. Had he done so he would have wondered. For Langhetti's eyes seemed to seek to pierce the very soul of Despard. His face became transformed. Its usual serenity vanished, and there was eager wonder, intense and anxious curiosity—an endeavor to see if there was not some deep meaning underlying Despard's words. But Despard showed no emotion. He was conscious of no deep meaning. He merely murmured to himself as he looked down upon the unconscious face:

"My sick sister—my sister Beatrice."

Langhetti said not a word, but sat in silence, absorbed in one intense and wondering gaze. Despard seemed to dwell upon this idea, fondly and tenderly.

"She is not one of that brood," said he, after a pause. "It is in name only that she belongs to them."

"They are fiends and she is an angel," said Langhetti.

"Heaven has sent her to us; we must preserve her forever."

"If she lives," said Langhetti, "she must never go back."

"Go back!" cried Despard. "Better far for her to die."

"I myself would die rather than give her up."

"And I, too. But we will not. I will adopt her. Yes, she shall cast away the link that binds her to these accursed ones—her vile name. I will adopt her. She shall have my name—she shall be my sister. She shall be Beatrice Despard."

"And surely," continued Despard, looking tenderly down, "surely, of all the Despard race there was never one so beautiful and so pure as she."

Langhetti did not say a word, but looked at Despard and the one whom he thus called his adopted sister with an emotion which he could not control. Tears started to his eyes; yet over his brow there came something which is not generally associated with tears—a lofty, exultant expression, an air of joy and peace.

"Your sister," said Despard, "shall nurse her back to health. She will do so for your sake, Langhetti—or rather from her own noble and generous instincts. In Thornton Grange she will, perhaps, find some alleviation for the sorrows which she may have endured. Our care shall be around her, and we can all labor together for her future welfare."

They at length reached the inn of which they had spoken, and Beatrice was tenderly lifted out and carried up stairs. She was mentioned as the sister of the Rev. Mr. Despard, of Holby, who was bringing her back from the sea-side, whither she had gone for her health. Unfortunately, she had been too weak for the journey.

The people of the inn showed the kindest attention and warmest sympathy. A doctor was sent for, who lived at a village two miles farther on.

Beatrice recovered from her faint, but remained unconscious. The doctor considered that her brain was affected. He shook his head solemnly over it, as doctors always do when they have nothing in particular to say. Both Langhetti and Despard knew more about her case than he did.

They saw that rest was the one thing needed. But rest could be better attained in Holby than here; and besides, there was the danger of pursuit. It was necessary to remove her; and that, too, without delay. A close carriage was procured without much difficulty, and the patient was deposited therein.

A slow journey brought them by easy stages to Holby. Beatrice remained unconscious. A nurse was procured, who traveled with her. The condition of Beatrice was the same which she described in her diary. Great grief and extraordinary suffering and excitement had overtaken the brain, and it had given way. So Despard and Langhetti conjectured.

At last they reached Holby. They drove at once to Thornton Grange.

"What is this?" cried Mrs. Thornton, who had heard nothing from them, and ran out upon the piazza to meet them as she saw them coming.

"I have found Bice," said Langhetti, "and have brought her here."

"Where is she?"

"There," said Langhetti. "I give her to your care—it is for you to give her back to me."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

ON THE TRACK.

BEATRICE'S disappearance was known at Brandon Hall on the following day. The servants first made the discovery. They found her absent from her room, and no one had seen her about the house. It was an unusual thing for her to be out of the house early in the day, and of late for many months she had scarcely ever left her room, so that now her absence at once excited suspicion. The news was communicated from one to another among the servants. Afraid of Potts, they did not dare to tell him, but first sought to find her by themselves. They called Mrs. Compton, and the fear which perpetually possessed the mind of this poor, timid creature now rose to a positive frenzy of anxiety and dread. She told all that she knew, and that was that she had seen her the evening before as usual, and had left her at ten o'clock.

No satisfaction therefore could be gained from her. The servants tried to find traces of her, but were unable. At length toward evening, on Potts's return from the bank, the news was communicated to him.

The rage of Potts need not be described here. That one who had twice defied should now escape him filled him with fury. He organized all his servants into bands, and they scoured the grounds till darkness put an end to these operations.

That evening Potts and his two companions dined in moody silence, only conversing by fits and starts.

"I don't think she's killed herself," said Potts, in reply to an observation of Clark. "She's got stuff enough in her to do it, but I don't believe she has. She's playing a deeper game. I only wish we could fish up her dead body out of some pond; it would quiet matters down very considerably."

"If she's got off she's taken with her some secrets that won't do us any good," remarked John.

"The devil of it is," said Potts, "we don't know how much she does know. She must know a precious lot, or she never would have dared to say what she did."

"But how could she get out of the park?" said Clark. "That wall is too high to climb over, and the gates are all locked."

"It's my opinion," exclaimed John, "that she's in the grounds yet."

Potts shook his head.

"After what she told me it's my belief she can do any thing. Why, didn't she tell us of crimes that were committed before she was born? I begin to feel shaky, and it is the girl that has made me so."

Potts rose to his feet, plunged his hands into his pockets, and walked up and down. The others sat in gloomy silence.

"Could that Hong Kong nurse of hers have told her any thing?" asked John.

"She didn't know any thing to tell."

"Mrs. Compton must have blown, then."

"Mrs. Compton didn't know. I tell you that there is not one human being living that knows what she told us besides ourselves and her. How the devil she picked it up I don't know."

"I didn't like the cut of her from the first," said John. "She had a way of looking that made me feel uneasy, as though there was something in her that would some day be dangerous. I didn't want you to send for her."

"Well, the mischief's done now."

"You're not going to give up the search, are you?" asked Clark.

"Give it up! Not I."

"We must get her back."

"Yes; our only safety now is in catching her again at all hazards."

There was a long silence.

"Twenty years ago," said Potts, moodily, "the Vishnu drifted away, and since the time of the trial no one has mentioned it to me till that girl did."

"And she is only twenty years old," rejoined John.

"I tell you, lads, you've got the devil to do with when you tackle her," remarked Clark; "but, if she is the devil we must fight it out and crush her."

"Twenty-three years," continued Potts, in the same gloomy tone—"twenty-three years have passed since I was captured with my followers. No one has mentioned that since. No one in all the world knows that I am the only Englishman that ever joined the Thugs except that girl."

"She must know every thing that we have done," said Clark.

"Of course she must."

"Including our Brandon enterprise," said John.

"And including your penmanship," said Clark; "enough, lad, to stretch a neck."

"Come," said Potts, "don't let us talk of this, any how."

Again they relapsed into silence.

"Well!" exclaimed John, at last, "what are you going to do to-morrow?"

"Chase her till I find her," replied Potts, savagely.

"But where?"

"I've been thinking of a plan which seems to me to be about the thing."

"What?"

"A good old plan," said Potts. "Your pup, Johnnie, can help us."

John pounded his fist on the table with savage exultation.

"My blood-hound! Good, old Dad, what a trump you are to think of that!"

"He'll do it!"

"Yes," said John, "if he gets on her track and comes up with her I'm a little afraid that we'll arrive at the spot just too late to save her. It's the best way that I know of for getting rid of the difficulty handsomely. Of course we are going after her through anxiety, and the dog is an innocent pup who comes with us; and if any disaster happens we will kill him on the spot."

Potts shook his head moodily. He had no very hopeful feeling about this. He was shaken to the soul at the thought of this stern, relentless girl, carrying out into the world his terrific secret.

Early on the following morning they resumed their search after the lost girl. This time the servants were not employed, but the three themselves went forth to try what they could do. With them was the "pup" to which allusion had been made on the previous evening. This animal was a huge blood-hound, which John had purchased to take the place of his bull-dog, and of which he was extravagantly proud. True to his instinct, the hound understood from smelling an article of Beatrice's apparel what it was that he was required to seek, and he went off on her trail out through the front door, down the steps, and up to the grove.

The others followed after. The dog led them down the path toward the gate, and thence into the thick grove and through the underbrush. Scraps of her dress still clung in places to the brushwood. The dog led them round and round wherever Beatrice had wandered in her flight from Vijal. They all believed that they would certainly find her here, and that she had lost her way or at least tried to conceal herself. But at last, to their disappointment, the dog turned away out of the wood and into the path again. Then he led them along through the woods until he reached the Park wall. Here the animal squatted on his haunches, and, lifting up his head, gave a long deep howl.

"What's this?" said Potts.

"Why, don't you see? She's got over the wall somehow. All that we've got to do is to put the dog over, and follow on."

"WHY, DON'T YOU SEE? SHE'S GOT OVER THE WALL SOMEHOW."

The others at once understood that this must be the case. In a short time they were on the other side of the wall, where the dog found the trail again, and led on while they followed as before.

They did not, however, wish to seem like pursuers. That would hardly be the thing in a country of law and order. They chose to walk rather slowly, and John held the dog by a strap which he had brought with him. They soon found the walk much longer than they had anticipated, and began to regret that they had not come in a carriage. They had gone too far, however, to remedy this now, so they resolved to continue on their way as they were.

"Gad!" said John, who felt fatigued first, "what a walker she is!"

"She's the devil!" growled Clark, savagely.

At last, after about three hours' walk, the dog stopped at a place by the road-side, and snuffed in all directions. The others watched him anxiously for a long time. The dog ran all around sniffing at the ground, but to no purpose.

He had lost the trail. Again and again he tried to recover it. But his blood-thirsty instinct was completely at fault. The trail had gone, and at last the animal came up to his master and crouched down at his feet with a low moan.

"Sold!" cried John, with a curse.

"What can have become of her?" said Potts.

"I don't know," said John. "I dare say she's got took up in some wagon. Yes, that's it. That's the reason why the trail has gone."

"What shall we do now? We can't follow. It may have been the coach, and she may have got a lift to the nearest railway station."

"Well," said John, "I'll tell you what we can do. Let one of us go to the inns that are nearest, and ask if there was a girl in the coach that looked like her, or make any inquiries that may be needed. We could find out that much at any rate."

The others assented. John swore he was too tired. At length, after some conversation, they all determined to go on, and to hire a carriage back. Accordingly on they went, and soon reached an inn.

Here they made inquiries, but could learn nothing whatever about any girl that had stopped there. Potts then hired a carriage and drove off to the next inn, leaving the others behind. He returned in about two hours. His face bore an expression of deep perplexity.

"Well, what luck, dad?" asked John.

"There's the devil to pay," growled Potts.

"Did you find her?"

"There is a girl at the next inn, and it's her. Now what name do you think they call her by?"

"What?"

"Miss Despard."

Clark turned pale and looked at John, who gave a long, low whistle.

"Is she alone?" asked John.

"No—that's the worst of it. A reverend gent is with her, who has charge of her, and says he is her brother."

"Who?"

"His name is Courtenay Despard, son of Colonel Lionel Despard," said Potts.

The others returned his look in utter bewilderment.

"I've been thinking and thinking," said Potts, "but I haven't got to the bottom of it yet. We can't do any thing just now, that's evident. I found out that this reverend gent is on his way to Holby, where he is rector. The only thing left for us to do is to go quietly home and look about us."

"It seems to me that this is like the beginning of one of those monsoon storms," said Clark, gloomily.

The others said nothing. In a short time they were on their way back, moody and silent.

"HE LEAPED FROM THE CARRIAGE TOWARD HER, AND CAUGHT HER IN HIS ARMS."

SHE COMES TO GATHER FLOWERS.

Put on your brightest, richest dress,
Wear all your gems, blest vales of ours!
My fair one comes in her loveliness—
She comes to gather flowers.
Garland me wreaths, thou fertile vale!
Woods of green, your coronets bring:
Pinks of red, and lilies pale,
Come with your fragrant offering!
Mingle your charms of hue and smell,
Which Flora wakes in her springtide hours;
My fair one comes across the dell—
She comes to gather flowers.

Twilight of morn! from thy misty tower
Scatter the trembling pearls around,
Hang up thy gems on fruits and flower,
Bespangle the dewy ground!
Phœbus! rest on thy ruby wheels—
Look, and envy this world of ours!
For my fair one now descends the hills—
She comes to gather flowers.
List! for the breeze on wing serene
Through the light foliage sails:
Hidden amid the forest green
Warble the nightingales,
Hailing the glorious birth of day
With music's divinest powers!
Hither my fair one bends her way—
She comes to gather flowers.

THE WORLD BEWITCHED.

THE Prince Imperial was in a frightful temper! dancing about for rage! And he had pulled the tutor's nose and boxed the Lord High Fiddlestick's ears! All because he could not tell, "if one pound of ginger cost five cents, how much should nine pounds cost?"

"I hate arithmetic and I despise geography," shouted the Prince, tearing his arithmetic in two and flinging his geography out of the window. "I wish I might never hear of them again."

The tutor, who was rubbing his nose, stopped short. "The book that you have torn is mine," said he.

"I don't care," answered the Prince.

"There is not another like it in the whole world," continued the tutor.

"I hope there is not. I should like not to see another school-book for the next five years. Geographies; grammars; multiplication-tables; I wish every soul of them was burned," snapped the Prince.

"Twice!" said the tutor, in such an awful voice that the Lord High Fiddlestick ran in a fright for the queen.

For you see it was vastly imprudent to talk in that way to the tutor, who was no other than the wisest man in the kingdom, and wrote on his door-plate, "Wisest Man, B. G. L. O. F. D. F. A. R. M. S. G. H. M. D. D. D. A. B. A.," and many other learned titles; and had lived several hundred years or so, and had studied magic.

The queen was clear-starching her fine laces; but she dropped them in the tin basin of suds, and, without waiting for her train-bearer or any of her ladies of honor, she ran up to the school-room, where she arrived in time to hear the Prince say:

"I tell you I would be glad if there wasn't one in the world."

"Three times!" cried the tutor, picking up his cane and walking past the queen with so little ceremony that he stepped on her train.

Down stairs he went, his cane thumping on every step, and pulled the palace gate so hard after him that the palace shook. But what became of him then nobody knew; for when the queen recovered sufficiently from her astonishment to send after him, he was not to be found.

Now every body looked sober, for who knew whether he might not transform them all into pumpkins, or something of the sort? and some people had tingling sensations about the neck and ears as if leaves might be preparing to sprout there, and some fancied that they were growing a pair of rosewood fore-legs and would shortly become chairs; and every one was alarmed and uneasy except the Prince Imperial, who went off quite at ease to play in the school-room.

But he came scampering back in a hurry.

"Oh, come and look!" said he.

"There, I told you so!" cried the queen.

"Just as I said," panted the Lord High Fiddlestick, hurrying after her.

"We thought so all the time," whispered the courtiers, nodding and looking wise as they nudged on, though none of them had the least idea what they were about to see.

In the school-room there was a sound of stamping, buzzing, and fluttering, and a confused singing, and a creaking and squeaking! The desk covers were wide open. So were the doors of the book-cases. So were the books! And oh! wonderful to relate, all the letters were stepping out, and all the figures, and all the maps were taking themselves in pieces! And there sat Europe on the mantle, and Asia on a book-case, stretching and gaping; and curly eights and fives were running about the room with threes, and sixes, and sevens, and nines hard after, while ones, twos, and fours looked on stiff and disgusted; and down stepped the multiplication-table, all its figures in single file, and singing "Twice one are two" as they marched about the room; and all the hard sums followed them, stamping very hard, with their answers in their pockets; and out stepped from the dictionary a magnificent word, called, followed by all the other words in the dictionary—the long words first, the little ones huddling behind.

they go down the street: and oh, your royal highnesses! just look at the letters and figures coming out from every house! There will not be a school-book, or a rule, or a map left in the whole city."

"So much the better," insisted the Prince Imperial, capering about. "Now children can play all day long."

And I suppose you think that you would have capered if you had been in his place. But wait a little.

In the morning the Prince waked up and heard a great hubbub below. So he rang the bell for one of the pages to come and tell him what was the matter.

The page came up blubbering.

"And oh, your royal highness!" he said, "there's no figures on the clocks nowhere, and nobody knows the time. And some got up at one hour and some at another; and the breakfast is all heads and points; and the milkman he ain't come, and no signs of him: and the "Very odd! I used to know, I am sure," said the Prince. "See here! The stockings are to go on my feet. I want as many stockings as I have feet."

"Yes, your royal highness; and how many is that?" asked the page.

"You idiot!" cried the Prince, "don't you know that every body has—"

Here he was obliged to stop again, for he found that he did not know either how many feet he or any body else had.

So the page brought an armful of stockings, and the Prince drew one on each foot, but still it vexed him that he could not tell how many feet he had; and at breakfast he asked the queen if she knew.

"How shocking to speak of feet!—to be sure I do. You have—"

And here she found that she knew no better than the Prince.

"How very unpleasant!" said the king. "And that reminds me! how many muffins has the Prince eaten? I gave—well, I don't know—how many I gave him. How many did you give him, my Lord High Fiddlestick?"

But my lord did not know either. Consequently the Prince overate himself, as he was only too apt to do, and falling very ill, they were obliged to call in a physician.

The physician heard the symptoms and took out a bit of paper and a pencil. Then he stopped, knit his brows, scratched his head, and looked thoughtful.

"I can't remember the figures," he said. "I know the medicines; but—the quantities—I am sure, it is something about drachms, and scruples, and ounces; but I can tell nothing more about them."

Then they sent for another physician; but he was even worse than number one. He remembered nothing about quantities, but he rather thought that the Prince needed about a ton.

The king proposed that they should send the name of the medicine to the apothecary, who might remember.

But the apothecary said that there were no stamps now on his weights. They had all disappeared the night before, and he could not remember any thing about them; but he would send some at a venture.

"Very good," said the king; "what shall I pay you?"

Here was a new difficulty. Neither the king nor the apothecary could tell the value of the money in the king's purse. And the king was so much afraid of giving too much money, and the shopman was so much afraid of getting too little, that it seemed as if they would never agree.

And all this time there lay the Prince groaning with pain; and no medicine.

Meantime the butcher came; but when cook began to order the dinner she did not know what to say; neither could the butcher help her; and when they looked for the book of weekly accounts, the figures were gone from it. This was the more embarrassing, because on that day the ambassadors from No Man's Land were invited to dinner. Besides, the butcher was so much afraid of getting too little money for too much meat that they were three hours in buying the dinner, and the king was obliged to come down himself and lay his sceptre over their ears. Therefore the dinner was late; and cook, getting in a flurry, nearly burned it to a cinder, which was a pity; for there was already so little of it that when dinner was served it made a pitiful figure, I assure you. As to the dessert, cook nearly lost her wits over it; for how should she know whether the pudding needed six eggs or twelve; one cup of sugar or a dozen; a tea-spoonful or a table-spoonful of salt? Also, as nobody knew how to count, there were not chairs or forks enough at the table. And there was the king fuming, and the ambassadors staring at the small dinner, and the footmen running after the forks and pulling hard at their mustaches; for they began to suspect that the king was trying to insult them.

While they were waiting for the dessert they heard a noise at the door, and the Prince Imperial rushed in in his night-gown.

For, feeling nearly well, the Prince had decided to sit up in bed and play. So he called for his dissected maps. But they were gone. There were the boxes, and some ugly blocks of wood. That was all.

"Very well," said the Prince to his page. "Bring me my marbles."

But, when they were brought, neither the Prince nor the page could play, for not knowing

"SHE COMES TO GATHER FLOWERS."

Once out, Sesquipedalia looked about with a noble air, cleared its throat with a loud ahem! and, getting up on the tutor's desk, spoke as follows:

"We are free at last!

Insulted and belied, we'll groan no more,
To hear, in books and primers sticking fast,
'Be' called a now, and that 'twice three make four.'

Uprouse ye, friends! Accept your glorious fate!
Problems and syllables, genders and histories fine!
To Leaf and Cover, Desk, and Map, and Slate, Bid now a long farewell, and fall in line."

"Mercy! they are all going away!" cried the queen.

"Yes. See now what mischief you have done!" exclaimed the king.

"And look at the poor empty books, and the leaves all white, as if they had never been printed!" said the Lord High Fiddlestick. "There cook she don't know how long to do the muffins or the eggs, neither the steak; and they are all talking together; and her majesty's hair ain't out of curl-papers yet, because they is always took out precisely at ten, and nobody knows what hour it be."

Now I hope you have not failed to notice that this youthful page used very bad grammar, which was the more remarkable as this boy had been appointed to wait on the Prince on account of his language and deportment.

"Very good," answered the Prince. "Now bring me a pair of clean stockings."

"Yes, your highness," answered the page, looking puzzled. "But how many stockings is that?"

"How many, you ninny! Why, it is—it is—"

Here the Prince stopped also. He did not know how many stockings make a pair. You see he had forgotten how to count.

now to count how were they to divide them, to begin with?

"I will take my cup and ball," said the Prince; "he soon tired of that, for where is the fun if I can not remember how many times you catch the ball?"

Then they brought all the games—all the games that have ever been played—and they were all useless, because the Prince knew nothing of figures, geography, or history, and could learn nothing.

"Very well! bring me my story-books," said the Prince. "There was a story about a bear that I should like to finish."

But gone was the story about the bear, and all the other stories, and nothing was left but book-covers and blank-leaves.

Then the Prince threw his slippers at the page and rushed down to his father in his night-gown, as I said.

"My son," said the king, "these are the ambassadors from No-Man's-Land. 'You wouldn't like them to go home and tell their Prince that they had seen you crying in your night-clothes, would you?'"

"Where is No-Man's-Land?" asked the Prince.

"Why," commenced the king, "it is"—but he stopped here, for he was conscious of a curious, numb sensation in the head. Had he ever known where it was? He could tell nothing about it.

"Where is it?" repeated the Prince.

"Sure, I don't know," answered the king.

At this the ambassadors, who were already out of humor with the smallness of the dinner and the confusion about plates, forks, and chairs, concluded that the king desired to insult them, and went away in a rage.

"Let them go," said the king. "Indeed, I don't see why we should have given ourselves so much trouble about them. I can remember nothing about No-Man's-Land. It must be on the other side of the earth. Why, what is the matter now?"

This last he said to the queen, who came in sobbing behind her pocket-handkerchief.

"Oh! it is dreadful!" whimpered her majesty.

"What is dreadful?"

"Why, only look at the pink pages!"

The pink pages were standing in a row, looking very sheepish. And the king saw that each had straps on the bottom of his pink trousers, to pull them as far as possible over his shoes.

"You know we are obliged to be so economical," sobbed the queen. "The stingy people grumble so about the taxes. And I made them wear their old shoes till their toes are all out, and now the shoemaker has no shoes to fit any one but Perkins, and he says he can't make them any, for his measures are all gone, and he can't remember how he used to take a measure. And Perkins's new shoes made the others look so dreadful. I made him take them off. And there is the Prince! His boots are wearing white, and I haven't a decent pair of slippers! And I should like to know what we are going to do?"

"Do!" roared the king, flying at the Prince, and boxing him first on one ear and then on the other. "This is your doing, Sir. Do you hear? Your doing, Sir!"

"Oh! ah! ow!" screamed the poor little Prince, terrified out of his wits, and running out of the door so fast that he ran headlong into my Lord High Fiddlestick's velvet waistcoat as my Lord was coming in the door, followed by several men.

"Bless me!" cried my Lord, staring wildly at the royal family.

The queen wiped her eyes and looked majestic, and the king tried to straighten his crown slyly, for of course he was mortified to be caught in a passion like a common man.

"What do these people want?" asked the king.

"Please your majesty," said the Lord High Fiddlestick, "this man is the director of the railroads; and he says they can't run any more trains, for nobody knows the time, and there have been six dreadful accidents already. And besides, nobody knows when to come to take the trains. And they can't pay the men, for nobody knows when the day comes round, and nobody knows how much money to give. And they can't send any freight for the same reason, and the dépôt is full of people who can't get any where, and of boxes and bundles that can't be sent; and as your majesty knows every thing, will your majesty please tell them what to do?"

Now the king was in a fearful perplexity, for if he said that he did not know, why that would seem as if he were like any one of his subjects, except that he wore a crown. And yet what could he tell them to do?

Luckily just here a man and woman stepped forward.

"My Lord," said the woman, "I want justice. I am a stranger here, and a few days ago I bought a ticket on board of one of your steamships to carry me to Nears, which, as your majesty knows, is only forty miles away, and they told me the vessel would sail to-day. But to-day, when I went down, they not only said that the vessel would not sail, but that they did not know where Nears was; and when I asked for my money back, they persisted that nobody knew any thing about money now."

"Oh yes! exactly!" said the king, twiddling his thumbs and wondering if he had ever known where Nears was situated, and what "forty miles" meant.

"My Lord," said the man, "I am a stranger also. And I went into a shop and bought a dozen handkerchiefs; but the clerk only put me up three, and said that he knew nothing about a dozen. Unluckily he had taken the money I offered him, and when I demanded the change he said that he could not count, and knew nothing about it; so that all I got was these three handkerchiefs, as your majesty can see."

"Yes," answered the king, feeling the handkerchiefs, and wondering what the man could possibly mean by "three," and "counting," and "change."

By this time the Prince Imperial was over his fright, and being dressed, came down to see who was talking to his father.

"Want—men—father—what?" said the Prince, for his parts of speech, which had stuck by him so far, were going away from him.

The king was so busy in thinking what he should say, that at first he did not notice him; but the Prince pulled his gown, and said again:

"Men—want—father—what?"

"What ails the boy?" the king was about to say, but he felt a very curious sensation about the tongue, and said, instead:

"The—ails—boy?"

"My Love!" cried the queen, "you mean—"

"The—ails—boy!" interrupted the king, stamping his foot. "Say—know—what—don't I—want."

"The king is crazy!" screamed the people.

"Crazy—such—thing—no—not—he—is!" cried the queen, who began now to talk like the king.

"Dreadful—oh—I'm—how—too—going!" shrieked the Lord High Fiddlestick.

Then every body began to talk, and, excepting the strangers, they all used their words helter-skelter, and being very much frightened they ran out into the street, and whoever heard them began to talk like them.

Just think of the position of these people! For how were they to buy any tea, coffee, flour, butter, meat, or cloth, when nobody knew how to weigh or measure any of these things, nor how much money they were worth?

And how could any body get a good breakfast or dinner when nobody knew how long to boil the eggs or coffee, or to broil the steak, or to cook the pudding; and nobody had any recipes, and if they had, could not have told the difference between a cupful and a tea-spoonful?

And how could any body go to see his aunt or grandmother, and how could any gentleman come to his office in the city when watches and clocks could no longer tell him when to take the train?

And then please to look at the people who were thrown out of employment!

All the school-teachers. For there were no books, you know, and if there had been nobody could understand them.

All the book-writers. For who could write stories without any parts of speech, any figures, and any geography?

All the newspaper men, for the same reason.

All the merchants. For how could they buy and sell when they knew nothing about measures and money, and how could they send goods to foreign parts when they knew nothing about them?

All the shoemakers. No measures, you know.

All the railroad people. No time, you know.

All the expressmen, of course.

All the post-office people. No time, no geography. And then, how could they stamp the letters?

In fact, every body, for nobody had any longer any idea of the length of a day, or when pay-day came, or the difference between a dollar and a cent, a ton and a pound, a yard and an inch. And for the poor doctors, they nearly starved; for as it was quite impossible to prescribe or administer medicine, in spite of their troubles and bad cookery the people grew fat and hearty.

While the lawyers, on the contrary, were busier than ever, for every body was quarreling with every body else, because all were unable to tell whether they were cheated. And not having any parts of speech made no difference to the lawyers, because nobody ever understands what they say. And though nobody knew the difference between a dollar and a cent, that did not trouble the lawyers, for they stuck to their old rule, and helped themselves to all they could find.

As if all this trouble were not enough, word came that the King of No-Man's Land, affronted by the insults offered his ambassadors, had sent an army against them. But nobody knew how large the army was, for nobody could count, or how many men to get together, for the same reason, or how many swords and muskets to order, for the same reason. And the queen went into hysterics, the king ran about with his coat-tails standing perfectly straight out, and the little Prince laid on the bed, and said over and over:

"Oh! if I only had my multiplication-table, and my grammar, and my geography again!" only he said it all backward.

"Why, so you can!" said a very small voice, and looking up the Prince saw, or thought he saw, something like the curly tail of a Q just disappearing between the covers of his grammar.

Trembling violently, the Prince got up and ran to the school-room, and just as he reached there he heard all the books shutting with a snap. The letters were back again, so were the figures, so were the maps. And looking out the Prince saw his tutor coming in the gate. At the same time all the clocks and weights and measures were precisely as before. And every body had back his parts of speech, and knowledge of figures, and the king sent a polite apology to the King of No-Man's Land.

But the Prince, after that, always slept with his arithmetic under his pillow.

JAPANESE HOUSES.

THE following interesting details, by a traveler in Japan, concerning the mode of life of the curious, invertebrate Japanese, can scarcely fail to interest the readers of Harper's Bazar.

The houses are of very light construction, and consist generally of a ground-floor with one story. The house is raised about three feet from the ground. A veranda runs all round and gives access to the various rooms, which are separated from each other by sliding panels of wood-work covered with translucent paper. These are either windows, doors, or walls, according to the purpose to which they are applied. For instance, a room is shut up—that is to say, the paper framework panels close it in on every side. To obtain an entrance you have only to step on to the veranda, push aside one of the panels, which runs very easily in its grooves, and pass into the room. The floors are covered with beautiful, soft mats, made of very finely plaited rice-straw, about two inches thick, and bound along the edges with dark blue cotton cloth.

The rooms are almost destitute of furniture.

The dining-tables are about 6 inches high and 15 to 18 inches square. These are placed on the clean mats. The guests seat themselves round, and partake of the savory messes from variously-shaped cups and basins. The position they place themselves in is peculiar: their legs are doubled up under them, and they sit resting on their knees and heels. Custom enables them to continue thus doubled up for a long time in an attitude which a European finds absolutely unendurable. Chairs are entirely dispensed with, though a sort of low form is occasionally used. Bedsteads are unknown. Here again the mat comes into requisition, and sleepers place a small bolster on the ground, wrap themselves in a warm quilt, and slumber on what we should term the bare floor. Screens are sometimes used; they are made of a frame-work of wood and covered with paper, whereon are painted flowers and birds, the attitudes of the latter generally being very beautifully and faithfully portrayed. To furnish a house is a matter of but little difficulty. A few pots and pans, cups and basins, with a fire-box to contain charcoal and keep the pot boiling, a set of drawers, and perhaps a picnic-basket will serve to start a modest establishment, when once the house is complete and the mats are arranged.

Tea-pots and tea-kettles are, in fact, among the first requisites of furnishing. These are of various shapes and sizes, chiefly of earthenware and china, with occasionally bamboo handles. If the tea, the beverage in ordinary use, is to be drunk at once, it is made by pouring boiling water on a small quantity of tea in a cup, and covering it over for a few minutes with a small saucer; tea-pots are only used when it is wished to keep some ready at hand. The kettles in the tea-houses are very large, made of copper, and capable of holding many gallons of water. To keep the water boiling a chamber is constructed in the centre of the kettle and filled with burning charcoal. The vessel is suspended from a framework, and, like our swinging table tea-urns, is nicely balanced, and can be easily tilted to pour out its contents.

AMERICANS IN PARIS.

A FRENCH writer says that in Paris the American question has swallowed up all thought of the Roman question. Paris constantly feels the need of foreign rule. Lately it was the Russians, now it is the Americans, that treat it as a conquered country. Celebrities in off are entirely out of fashion, and no singer or actress can hope for success unless her name ends in son or in. The church of the Madeleine has lost its Parisian aspect, so full it is of pious Yankees, and the Boulevard looks like a little Broadway. The beautiful American ladies are admired by Frenchmen and courted by Frenchwomen, who whisper to themselves that this beauty is ephemeral. Whether this is so or not, just at present the American star is in the ascendancy at Paris.

Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.
Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.
Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses. We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to us.

SOONER OR LATER. A Novel. By SHIRLEY BROOKS, Author of "The Silver Cord,"
&c., &c. With Illustrations by GEORGE DU
MAURIER. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00; Paper, $1 50.

We are enabled to congratulate Mr. Shirley Brooks on the many excellences of a tale by which his permanent place among English novelists will be in a great measure decided. In more senses than one "Sooner or Later" is his magnum opus so far as prose fiction is concerned.—Athenaeum.

It is not often that we meet with a novel of which we can truly say that the plot is highly ingenious, the style is singularly brilliant, and the tone is thoroughly good; but these merits are united in the case of the book now before us.—London Review.

Mr. Brooks has produced his most powerful and most artistic work. "Sooner or Later" is a more remarkable book than often comes under the critic's eye.—Illustrated London News.

There is a healthy, vigorous tone about all he writes, which never satiates, and is always welcome.—Examiner.

The great beauty of "Sooner or Later" is the perfection of character-painting which it displays. Some of the personages who figure in its pages—such as that glorious creation Magdalen Dormer, the heroine, and the quaint, witty, astute, worldly barrister, Mr. Sergeant Penguin—are simply admirable.—Illustrated Times.

Every reader who can appreciate the sparkling style, the fine healthy flow of animal spirits, the artistic effects, the smart sayings, the clear emphatic common sense, that mark every page, will reap a double enjoyment from its perusal. For all those graces are added to its mere attractiveness as a story, which is very great. The mystery of the opening chapter is kept up to the last, and the interest is absorbing all along. Besides which there are several distinct side currents, full of life and fun and cleverness, that run parallel to, and touch and mingle with, the main stream.—Scotsman.

For Mr. Shirley Brooks, though claiming full scope in conversations and descriptions for the display of his rare epigrammatic skill and power of clear, bright narration, indulges himself and his readers with a tremendous, harrowing plot, whose mystery is most dextrously maintained throughout.—Daily Telegraph.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S JOURNAL:

OUR LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS.

LEAVES FROM THE JOURNAL OF OUR LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS, from 1848 to 1861. To which are prefixed and added Extracts from the same Journal giving an Account of Earlier Visits to Scotland, and Tours in England and Ireland, and Yachting Excursions. Edited by ARTHUR HELPS. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

The charm of this volume is, in one word, its inimitable artlessness, and its entire freedom from pretension, affectation, and cant. These are marks of the highest breeding, and the highest breeding adds dignity and grace to the highest station. . . . In the Journals all is natural and all is pure.—Edinburgh Review.

They have the charm which perfect naturalness combined with exquisite gracefulness might give to another writer; but from their actual writer they have a far higher interest. They serve, as nothing which was written for the purpose of doing it could serve, to set before her people the real tone of the life which their queen has been for so many years continually leading: its simplicity, its truthfulness, its high family affectionateness, its thorough sympathy with all around the royal persons who form the centre of the group, and who, even in hours of unusual rest from public business, are still engaged in discharging family duties with a care and kindness which few households could equal, and perhaps none surpass.—Quarterly Review.

Her Journal is remarkable for a healthful simplicity; it shows her to possess a well-trained mind, refined and cultivated taste, rational judgment, and a ready appreciation of goodness. . . . A valuable legacy to after times, and a most useful contribution to the history of her reign.—Round Table.

A mute appeal to our better nature.—Fraser's Magazine.

A unique book in literary history.—Round Table.

THE DUTCH REPUBLIC. The Rise of the Dutch Republic. A History. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY. With a Portrait of William of Orange. 3 vols., 8vo, Cloth, $10 50.

THE UNITED NETHERLANDS. History of the United Netherlands: from the Death of William the Silent to the Twelve Years' Truce. With a full View of the English-Dutch Struggle against Spain, and of the Origin and Destruction of the Spanish Armada. By J. LOTHROP MOTLEY, LL.D., D.C.L., Author of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic." Portraits. 4 vols., 8vo, Cloth, $14 00.

All the essentials of a great writer Mr. Motley eminently possesses. His mind is broad, his industry unwearying. In power of dramatic description no modern historian—except perhaps Mr. Carlyle—surpasses him, and in analysis of character he is elaborate and distinct.—Westminster Review.

Mr. Motley we owe him English homage.—London Times.

Mr. Motley's place is now with Hallam and Lord Mahon, Alison and Macaulay, in the old country, and with Washington Irving, Prescott, and Bancroft in this.—New York Times.

The name of Motley now stands in the front rank of living historians.—Church Journal.

RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

THE RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

IX.

IN country walks and climbing hills crinoline was found to be troublesome, and a remedy had to be sought. A brilliant genius thereupon shortened the hoop-skirt considerably, so as to apply the coquettish and useful porte-jupe, which, by means of certain hidden contrivances, raised the dress to such an extent that high boots became necessary for the sake of decorum. Besides this, some ladies wore a jacket with standing collar, gauntlets, and a Scotch cap and feather; and those who wished to be very fashionable, a black, shiny knapsack and a walking-stick. Cigars and eye-glasses were not unheard of, and now and then snuff was taken, but this only by some extreme radicals. Such was the costume of a pedestrian lady in the nineteenth century, as worn by the Princess Murat, who, in company with her ladies and Prince Napoleon, made a tour in the Scottish Highlands a few years ago, and created no little excitement by the style. The ladies were very proud of their dress, and were generally a little ahead of their cavalier, as those who are acquainted with the Prince's appearance will easily believe.

FACETIÆ.

In a real property case before a French Judge, at an early period of the Revolution (the story is told by the older Berryer), the defendant, whose title was contested, proved that the estate had been in his family for more than two hundred years. "Well, then," said the Judge, "it is now full time for another family to have a turn."

A REVOLUTIONARY CHARACTER—The man in the moon.

A fellow coming from the top of the Alleghenies to New York, in winter, was asked whether it was as cold there as in this city. "Horrible cold," said he; "for they have no thermometers there, and, of course, it gets just as cold as it pleases."

What kind of essence does a young man like when he pops the question?—Acquiescence.

A GREAT AID TO THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE—Lemonade.

A house-maid who was to call a gentleman to dinner, found him engaged in using a tooth-brush. "Well, is he coming?" said the lady of the house, as the servant returned. "Yes, ma'am, directly," was the reply; "he's just sharpening his teeth."

"Sir, you have broken your promise," said one gentleman to another. "Oh, never mind; I can make another just as good."

In some of the fashionable churches the programmes of the music are printed and distributed in the pews. It is suggested that opera-glasses will come next. But that is not the worst calamity that might befall—the ladies might encore a pet parson's sermon!

Oh, Don't!—When people in a storm at sea perceive a wave about to break over their devoted heads, they have only simply, but fervently, to say "Eau, don't!" and the breaker, touched with the pathetic appeal, will immediately recede!

But judge of the conductor's surprise and wrath in finding him aboard when fairly under way.

"Did I not tell you to get off?" said the conductor.

"And sure I did."

"Why then are you here again?"

"And sure did you not say all aboard?"

This was too much for the worthy conductor, and notwithstanding the decrees against "dead-heads" Pat was allowed to pass.

three rounds wide, must appear purl on the right side of the work; the bag must be turned before and after each of these narrow blue rounds, so that they shall be worked from the wrong side. In order to shape the bag, narrow a few stitches in each row; in two rounds 2 stitches in each, and in the third following round 3 stitches. Crochet together, from the right side, the foundation stitches in single crochet, and sew in the lining, which is knitted of the required size of white wool backward and forward. Make on the under edge a row of chain stitch scallops, alternating 4 chain stitches with 1 single crochet in a border stitch. In each scallop tie a fringe of different colored wools, as shown in the pattern. Two similar tassels are fastened on the upper edge. It may be lined with flannel in place of the knitted lining.

THE NOSE.

THERE is no feature of the face so essential to good looks as the nose. It admits of great variety of form, but it must be there in some shape or other. Though the nose is not capable, as the eye and mouth, of much variety of expression, its particular conformation has more to do than that of any other single feature with the individual character of the human countenance. Change this in a drawing, without altering any other part, and you will find with each variety a complete transformation of the whole face.

The Grecian nose, with its straight lines and symmetrical arrangement, has been generally accepted by artists as the most beautiful; but different nations, notwithstanding, cling fondly to their own particular forms of this organ. A Hottentot Venus, we may be assured, would never receive the prize of beauty from any Paris of her own race if she were destitute of the national flat nose. Sir Joshua Reynolds, who held that the idea of beauty was dependent upon the association of ideas, would evidently have approved the principles of the African judge. He would, however, at the same time have congratulated himself, doubtless, that being an Englishman he was not bound to accept the flat nose of Ethiopia as a necessary element of his own idea of beauty. "I suppose nobody will doubt," he says, "if a negro painter was to paint the goddess of beauty, that he would represent her black, with thick lips, flat nose, and woolly hair; and it seems to me that he would act very unnaturally if he did not; for by what criterion will any one dispute his idea?"

There seems to be no absolute standard of nasal beauty. The Romans were proud of their stern and portentous aquilines, and the Israelites would probably not be content to lose the smallest tip of their redundant beaks. The Tartars, having no noses to speak of, affect to consider the deficiency a beauty. The wife of Jenghis Khan was esteemed the most charming woman in all Tartary because she only had two holes where her nose should have been.

The peculiar form of the nose seems in fact to have but little influence upon our likes and dislikes. Mirabeau, who had a nose as wide-spread as that of a Hottentot, and Gibbon and Wilkes, whose noses were reduced to barely-perceptible snubs, were very successful suitors of the female sex. The turn-up nose can not be justified by any principle of taste, and yet the nez retroussé, by which French appellation we are fond of dignifying the pug, is so far from diminishing that it seems to increase the admiration of man for the woman who possesses it. No heroine of a modern novel appears complete without the nez retroussé, and Madame Du Barri, the common town courtesan, owes to it her place in history by the side of the worthless Louis XV.

The nose, as is well known, is the organ of smell. For this purpose it is endowed with a pair of nerves, called the olfactory, whose abounding filaments pierce the many holes and cover the multiple surfaces of the light and porous structure termed the spongy bone, which lies at the root of each nostril. This peculiar organization is with the object of giving free entrance to the air, through the medium of which odor is conveyed to the nerve, in which the sense of smell resides. The act of smelling is performed by closing the mouth and breathing through the nostrils, which expand to the odoriferous gale which thus enters and is diffused through every opening and over each surface of the bone where the nerve penetrates and expands its closely-woven net of threads. Man is naturally endowed with an acute sense of smell, but its power can be greatly increased or diminished by art. Those whose vocation is among stenches become by practiced indifference almost regardless of them; and others, whose business requires a discriminating nicety of the sense, obtain by studied attention a marvelous acuteness of smell. There was a night-man in Berlin who declared that he was not sensible of the intensest smell of his odoriferous occupation. On the examination of his body after death no olfactory nerve was found. Whether this was an original defect, or only the result of a long and resolute disuse of his sense of smell, could not be determined. Nature or art had made him the right man for the right place. The dog and some other animals have a much acuter sense of smell than man, and we accordingly find in them larger olfactory nerves and more extensive, porous, and convoluted spongy bones for the exposure of their filaments to the odoriferous breath of the air. A dog by the sense of smell will trace and nose out his master in the most multitudinous crowd. This proves not only the acuteness of the sinelling power of the animal, but establishes the fact that each man, as well as every race of men, has a peculiar odor.

Most nations, not content with the sweet odors that Nature so bountifully supplies, resort to artificial sources. The most refined people, however, avoid as much as possible personal perfumes, and hold that the absence of all odor is the best savor of human communion. They agree with Lord Bacon that the "breath of flowers is far sweeter in the air, where it comes and goes, like the warbling of music, than in the hand." Those of nice taste eschew all perfumes but those which are evanescent, such as Cologne and the like. It is a curious fact that the eau de Cologne is a native of that worst smelling of cities where Coleridge smelt we forget how many stenches. This seems to confirm the suspicion that a perfume is but a mask for an ill odor. The Cologne owes its well-deserved reputation to the harmonious mixture of a variety of essences, chiefly those of lemon, juniper, and rosemary, so well combined that there is no predominating smell. It is moreover very evanescent, and has a spirituous and enlivening scent, which causes it to be used rather for one's own refreshment than for the delectation of others. This should be the rule in regard to all perfumes. They should be kept as far as possible for the individual, and never employed so strong as to penetrate the surrounding atmosphere. All intensely adherent smells, such as musk, should be avoided.

The labor and cost which man will endure for the small luxury of a smell are exemplified by the difficulty and expense of manufacturing the attar or otto of roses. Two grains only, it is said, of oil can be squeezed with the utmost care from a thousand roses, and this is sold in India, on the spot where it is made, for fifty dollars in gold a rupee in weight, which is about 176 grains. At two grains a thousand, a rupee of oil would require nearly ninety thousand roses!

We need hardly protest against the misuse of the nose in turning it into a dust-hole or a soot-bag, for the habit of snuff-taking has gone so out of fashion that you will hardly find now even a grandmother to venture upon a pinch. This habit, apart from its filthiness, weakens the senses of smell and hearing, and perverts the human voice to a grunt by thickening the soft and sensitive membrane which extends without a break through the nose, ear, and throat, whose every part is reached by the irritating particles of tobacco inhaled.

There is no part of the physiognomy which reveals so quickly and clearly ill temper and bad habits as the nose. Every snarling, discontented, proud, and envious emotion is accompanied by a lifting of the end of each nostril through the agency of a little muscle, which after frequent action gives to the nose a permanent turn-up, which is as repulsive as the snout of an ill-tempered dog. The nose, moreover, like the door-post of an old-fashioned inn, scores every excess of eating and drinking, and so prominently as to be read by every passer-by.

The nose is naturally so noticeable from its position that any artificial means of drawing attention to it only renders it an insufferable impertinence. It accordingly should be kept as quiet as possible and never fondled before company. This, like all other organs, augments in size by frequent handling, so we recommend you to keep your own fingers and those of your friends or enemies away from it.

THE DANGER OF A STOVE.

THE uncomfortable sensation produced by the heat of an excessively hot stove or furnace has been experienced by us all in this country, where our severely cold winters impel us to raise the temperature of our dwellings to the highest possible point. There has always existed a suspicion that the usual mode of heating was unwholesome, because its effects were felt to be more or less disagreeable and painful. The suspicion has been now confirmed.

Dr. Carret, a surgeon of distinction, suspecting that an epidemic in Savoy was owing to the use of cast-iron stoves in that country, submitted a report to that effect to the French Academy of Sciences. Three eminent chemists were appointed to investigate the subject. They made an exact analysis of the air surrounding a cast-iron stove heated to a high degree, and found that it contained notable quantities of hydrogen and carbonic oxyd, both poisonous gases. It seems a well-established fact that iron, when raised to a great heat, will permit the passage of a gas, and that it has a peculiar power of condensing and absorbing the carbonic oxyd. It has also been found that air which passes over an iron surface intensely heated becomes impure and hurtful to breathe.

An ordinary stove and furnace when raised to a great heat thus become sources of poison. The hydrogen and carbonic oxyd gases produced by the combustion of the fuel pass through the iron walls and corrupt all the surrounding air.

The results of the experiments of the French Academy of Sciences may be thus summed up: 1. The gases which result from combustion pass through the walls of a cast-iron stove heated to a dull or bright red, in consequence of the porosity of those walls. 2. Iron raised to a red heat absorbs 4.15 times its volume of carbonic oxyd when it is exposed to an atmosphere composed of this gas. 3. The carbonic oxyd absorbed by the inner surface of the stove diffuses itself exteriorly in the air, and this process goes on continuously.

If these conclusions of the French Academy shall be confirmed it will become necessary to abolish iron stoves and furnaces, and confine ourselves to open fire-places, porcelain heaters, and hot-water boilers for the purpose of warming the interior of our houses.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to a Youth about to be Married.

MY DEAR THEODORE,—It is certainly a very delicate duty that you impose upon me; for to advise a youth upon his manners who is about to be married should surely be a work of supererogation. When marriages spring from love—and I should like to see the face of Theodore, and the eyes of Theodora, if they should hear any doubt thrown upon the case of an impending marriage, which shall be nameless—when, I say, marriages spring from love, who so accomplished a teacher of manners as Cupid, who so tender an exemplar as Hymen? This very thought occurred to me also yesterday, when I made a short evening call upon my old friend, Bob Bouncer, whom I have scarcely seen since his marriage, for he comes to the Club no more, and I do not meet him as I did formerly, pounding along in the Central Park any pleasant morning.

Robert, as you know, last year led to the hy-meneal altar, amidst the most resounding salvos of reportorial rhetoric, for the fact was published in all the newspapers, and the dresses and all the rest of it described—and my first bit of advice to you is to shield your bride most carefully from that horrible fate—a lady who had the advantage of him in years. Mrs. Bouncer is not very much older than Robert, but he is undoubtedly younger than she. Nor will I stop to advise upon this point. It is one which must be left to fate and good sense. Yet this, perhaps, I ought to say to your younger brothers, that if they fall in love at the age of eighteen with a belle of twenty-six or eight, and nothing is more likely when the case becomes desperate and they are resolved upon matrimony, they should take a voyage to China by the way of the Cape of Good Hope, returning leisurely through Europe. If they return as they went, and insist upon going to church with sweet twenty-nine or thirty, I, for one, will not forbid the bans.

I found Mr. and Mrs. Bouncer taking a cup of tea after dinner, and the lady poured a cup for me.

"Darling," said Mr. Bouncer to his wife, "did you put sugar in Mr. Bachelor's tea?"

"Yes, dearest, I did."

"But, my darling," replied Bob, with a smile, "how do you know that he takes sugar in his tea?"

"Why, my dearest Robert," said his wife, with a sweet smile, "people generally take sugar in their tea."

"Yes; but, my dear Amanda, how can you tell how many lumps?"

"I presume two lumps are enough for our cups, dear," said Mrs. Bouncer, with the least possible dryness in her tone.

"Yes, dear; but it happens that Mr. Bachelor never takes sugar in his tea."

"Well, and how was I to know it, dear, if he did not tell me?" replied the wife of Bouncer's bosom, smiling at me. Then I tried to break into the conversation.

"I assure—"

But Bob was not to be balked. "You see, my sweetest girl, in these little things it is better to begin right. I thought it was always customary to ask a guest whether he would have sugar or cream, as the case might be."

I thought this was indiscreet in Robert, and I made another plunge:

"The fact is—"

"Of course, dear," retorted Mrs. B., with considerable warmth, while I sat idiotically beaming at her and sipping my tea—"of course, dear, I know very little; but, Mr. Bouncer, I really think that I know how to pour out a cup of tea."

"My dear, I said nothing about your pouring out a cup of tea."

"My dear, you insinuated that I did not understand how to prepare tea for a friend to drink."

"Well, my dear?"

Robert Bouncer wagged his foot as he said this, and looked at his life's partner, who was evidently exercising great self-control.

"Well, my dearest husband, what a pity you did not make the discovery before!"

Mr. Bouncer smiled at his wife, and, turning to me, began to talk about the cold winter and the sleighing in the Park, and presently Mrs. Bouncer sailed into the conversation. But I was not comfortable. I confess I thought of the club, and in a little while I wished them a good-evening, and proceeded to the club of the Capitoline Jupiter, where I smoked a cigar, and meditated upon matrimony and manners.

For what was the difficulty in the Bouncer household? I remember Bob Bouncer when he could no more have been testy and petulant to Amanda Aggerwayte than Romeo to Juliet. He would sooner have cut off his hand than have hinted that she did not understand all the amenities of social intercourse, and I believe he would have sacrificed both legs rather than have said it before a stranger. I made myself a detective in manners; I said to myself as I very carefully shot rings of smoke from my mouth—for an old smoker will have his tricks—"A year ago Robert Bouncer would not have done it. What has happened in the mean time that he does it now?" The answer was too plain—matrimony. I remember the brilliant description in the city items of the morning paper: "As the happy pair turned from the altar the face of the gallant bridegroom was flushed with auroral hues, and the shrinking cheek of the lovely and queenly bride was suffused like the half-opened petals of a moss-rosebud; and as they passed through the crowd of fashionable friends to the door, the great organ, under the impressive touch of the genial and gentlemanly organist, Timothy Tompkins, Esquire, gave out in triumphal strains the beautiful and appropriate 'Wedding March' of Mendelssohn."

Nothing but his marriage had happened, and behold how Bob Bouncer behaved! My dear Theodore, the manners of the lover were lost in those of the husband. He permitted himself to show all his little, and in the seclusion of his home when no visitor was present, I fear even his great ill-humors. His theory of home was evidently that of many and many a husband, that it is a place where a man may slip off politeness with his coat, and put on peevishness with his slippers; where his will is law and his whims are to be respected, and where he has the inalienable right of making himself an unmitigated nuisance to his wife. I have learned to be afraid of the fine epithets of matrimony. I observe that endearments and respect do not necessarily go together; and when I hear "my dear" and "dearest" and "deary" I prick up my ears. But when I hear "darling" and "sweet" I pick up my hat and fly before the tempest.

My dear Theodore, the beginning and end of my advice to you is never to suffer the familiarity of home to release you from the ordinary restraints of good-manners. If the dullest woman of his acquaintance comes to Bouncer's house, or if he meets her elsewhere, he is always courteous. He does not allow himself to be peevish and sour and snarling. Why should he be so to the woman he loves best in the world? He is very anxious, I know, for his mother has told me so, that his wife should be always well-dressed and in the fashion. He will have her wear a veil to save her complexion. He has been caught studying this very paper, through whose columns I have the honor of writing to you, and suggesting pretty little tags and rags and bobtails for the personal decoration of Mrs. Bouncer. In a word, he requires that she shall be always neat and graceful and tastefully dressed at all hours, morning and evening, for his own satisfaction as well as his pride. He demands that his wife's person shall be always attractively attired, while the good-for-nothing vagabond lets his soul, as it were, go slopping about in an abominable undress. Spiritually down at the heel this miserable tyrant expects his slave to be forever pleasing in his sight.

If he puts no curb upon his humor, and is sullen or captious or cross or sarcastic, doesn't he teach her to be so also? If his theory of home is that it is a place for his selfish comfort merely, his wife and children will pay the penalty. Whether she retorts, or retires with dignity into herself, or pines, or sulks, or dashes into the vortex of the world, she is equally balked and unhappy. Why, Theodore, my boy, we are great selfish louts. It is women, not we, who make the sacrifice in marriage, if any there be; and if I were a father, and suspected that a daughter of mine were treated by her husband as I know the daughters of many of my friends are treated by their husbands, I should call my son-in-law to pretty sudden account—unless I felt that I should make her lot harder if I did so. And if I were constrained to silence, how I should chafe under my deeper consciousness of the wretched selfishness of my sex!

My dear young friend, in whose ears and heart the marriage-bells begin to ring, as you look upon Theodora, and smile to read the warning words I write, remember that every year thousands of Theodores swear, and mean, to love, honor, and cherish thousands of Theodoras. Their vows are as ardent, their faith is as sure, as yours. How many of them honestly keep the vow, how many do not forswear the faith? Yet if you will require of yourself to treat the wife with the same courtesy that you treat the sweet-heart, you will go through life as those who wore the amulet threaded the enchanted wood. The romance, I know, must change; but it need not die away. Never mind about calling your wife "dear," if your behavior shows her that she is so.

This is my orange flower for you, dear Theodore; and if you take it I believe it will last as long and as sweet as any that Theodora will wear.

Your congratulating friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SPRING BONNETS.

WE have been favored with a glimpse of the Spring bonnets imported from the most reliable French houses. Importers say that the new shapes are a trifle larger; but we are inclined to think that the appearance of increased size is given by the high coronet and rolling brim that in many cases extends around the sides and back of the bonnet. Flaring fronts and a broad roll surrounding the bonnet are found on both the Fanchon and Marie Antoinette shapes when a mantilla veil is not worn. If the veil is used the roll extends only down the front and sides.

Straw, silk, Malines lace, and illusion with satin polka dots, are the materials that will be most used. Yellow straws will be very much worn as well as a black straw, thin but not so transparent as the Neapolitan, and sprinkled with steel beads. There are bonnets formed of round Leghorn cords; others are rouleaux of interwoven straw and satin; a dark-brown straw is made of thick rolls like piping; gray and black, and black and white braids are mixed together; and bands of chip and of yellow straw are alternated with points and blocks of silk.

Malines lace is a new powdered tulle that has the appearance of being covered with frost. It is very pretty and gossamer-like, and is used for overstrings, and as a transparent over satin and silk. This beautiful novelty was shown us in all the old colors, and in two new shades, viz.: the caroubier, or cranberry, very similar to Mentana red, and a flame-like tint called Sultan.

MANTILLA VEILS.

The mantilla veil is worn long, falling over the shoulders, and crossing in front like a fichu. It is caught together low down on the breast by flowers or a rosette, and is often so embodied in the bonnet that it really forms the bonnet, instead of being a mere accessory. The frames of such bonnets are made of steel wire, slight but firm, and fitting closely to the head. A bandeau of velvet and flowers surmounts the forehead, and to this is attached a tulle drapery that constitutes at once the veil and the bonnet, flowing gracefully over the chignon, beneath which it is held in place by a velvet band. The steel frame is almost invisible, and there is but one thickness of tulle over the head. This is a fashion that can not fail to be popular, as it will display to advantage the present elaborate styles of dressing the hair. On other bonnets the veil is fastened at the back of the frame beneath a bow of ribbon or cluster of flowers.

ORNAMENTS.

Gilt will be little worn except in conjunction with steel. Very pretty ornaments, such as butterflies and medallions, are made of cut steel. Small jet beads are intermingled with straw in the bandeaux, and acorns are pendent from them. Similar bands are made with steel beads and with garnets, while others are formed entirely of beads without straw. Pearl leaves have cut-steel stars on them that glitter like jewels, and there are steel veins in bunches of straw leaves. Straw fringes are headed with jet, and acorns of pearl and of satin are bursting from a straw shell. There are feather flowers with beetles and butterflies among them, and agraffes formed of myriads of tiny enameled insects. Very narrow poult de soie ribbons are used. Transparent metallic grasses, crimson berries, pine burrs, and forest leaves of autumn tints are among the ornaments. Colored blonde edges and feathery fringes surround the mantilla veils.

A beautiful bonnet, made by the celebrated Madame Virot of Paris, is of frosted Malines lace of straw color puffed over silk of the same shade. A wide Leghorn braid surrounds the bonnet. The coronet is of metallic autumn leaves and grasses. High up on the back is a blush rose with leaves and tendrils. A veil of Malines lace bordered with straw braid falls over the back hair and is fastened low down in front with rosette. Price $40.

A neat and tasteful bonnet for early spring is of plaited straw of the fashionable light tan shade. A wide roll on the front reaches almost to the back. The bandeau is of brown satin, with a cut-steel butterfly in the centre. Forest leaves and pine burrs are on the left side. Brown lace drapes the chignon, and forms strings that are held together by a steel ornament.

A pretty chip bonnet has a fan-like rosette, of rose color, over the forehead. On the left is a cluster of flowers. A bow with long ends of poult de soie ribbon is on the crown. Narrow ribbon strings.

An evening bonnet, or rather coiffure, is of white illusion, spotted with satin, over so light a frame that the whole head is plainly seen. The face trimming is a band of white velvet with slender pearl pendants surmounted by a coronet of scarlet cactus, with tendrils and buds at the sides. A mantilla veil of white illusion is attached to the band and falls over the chignon almost to the waist, covering the shoulders like a mantle, and crossing in front. Blond-lace with a feathery edge borders the veil; a bouquet of cactus confines it in front, and a white velvet roll holds the drapery at the back.

A bonnet imported for the early spring is made of diamond tulle, of a pretty shade of lavender. It partakes somewhat of the Fanchon shape, but is more flaring in front, and does not fit so closely to the head. The diadem is cut in large scallops, in each of which is a purple daisy. A cluster of daisies ornaments the left side, and a fan-shaped rosette of tulle falls over the back on the right. Narrow satin strings tie under the throat with overstrings of tulle. Price $15.

CLOTH AND SILK WRAPPINGS.

We have seen but little novelty in cloth wrappings. The spring garments will be very similar to those worn in the fall. There are probably more tight-fitting basques, and a greater number are lapped in the redingote style. Light gray cloths, tan color, and a mottled black and white will be most worn. Tan color is trimmed with a darker shade of brown. Black is used on every thing else. Wide military braid, bullion fringe, and a variety of hand-made trimmings are seen.

In silk garments the sash is the newest feature. Of fifty specimens shown us, all of them imported, not one was without a long, loosely-tied sash, or a rosette at the side from which long streamers depended. Fichus and capes of lace and of silk are worn over loose sacques and basques. One unique and expensive garment had a sash beginning under the front of the collar and falling backward over the shoulders down below the edge of the sacque, where it was caught by a rosette. Simple Polonaise or redingotes of black silk velvet, with belt and sash, are designed to be worn with dresses of any color.

TRIMMINGS.

Jet has almost entirely disappeared as a trimming for mantles. Gross after gross of tiny satin buttons adorn a single garment. Guipure lace, banished last winter, is revived again in new pointed feathery patterns. Several rows of thick military braid, or silk galloon without beads, is considered stylish. Netted and bullion and chenille fringes and ruffles of quilled silk surround capes and sacques. Pleated ruffles of silk, the small pleats all running one way, are bound on the edge with satin, and a tiny button is placed on each fold. Satin pipings, bias bands of silk with satin cord at either side, satin rouleaux, and flowers made of silk and satin, representing stem, leaf, and flower, and many intricate trimmings made by hand will be in vogue.

A paletot of heavy black corded silk is half-adjusted to the figure, and slashed at the back and sides. A belt confines it at the waist with sash at the sides. Large coat-sleeves. The novelty of this garment consists in a cape, square in front and reaching to the elbows. It is gathered up in the back and loosely tied together with long flowing ends. The trimming is a pleated ruffle two inches wide, made of silk and bound on the lower edge with satin. Bias folds above the ruffle. Price $150.

Another of a different style was tight-fitting in front like a basque, while down the back was a wide double box pleat, beginning at the neck, and extending the whole length of the garment. The trimming was of guipure lace bands, pointed on both edges. Small satin buttons in great numbers were also used. Sash and belt.

A short flowing garment is lapped like a redingote. Five rows of military braid surround the skirt, and a guipure lace over chenille fringe is sewn on the edges.

SPRING SILKS.

We have spoken before of the chameleon striped silks. Later importations are also in stripes, with chené figures, very small checks, and larger square blocks. For the present intermediate season there are alternate black and white stripes, varying from the hair lines of white to stripes an inch in width. These are of very fair quality, three quarters of a yard wide, and from $2 to $3 a yard. In lighter colors there are half-inch stripes of mauve, of green, and of blue, besides a black and white chené stripe of the same width on a white ground. Pearl color and cherry are pretty together, and apple-green with a chameleon of pink and gray. The chené patterns are in the various shades of gray and brown on white, or a gayer combination of several colors, mottled together, yet prettily blended. $3 a yard is the price asked for them; they are of excellent fabric, and five-eighths wide. There are tiny stripes of blue, of green, and of purple with white, and small checks of the same colors, at $2 25 a yard.

A very handsome robe, just imported, is of pearl-colored gros grain. It is embroidered with white in seed stitch to represent lace festooned about a pyramidal bouquet of flowers on the front width, and forming a border around the skirt, sleeves, and belt. Price $200. Another, at the same price, is a rich black silk, on which is needle-worked with all the accuracy of painting the gorgeous scarlet cactus. An evening dress of white corded silk is ornamented with the same brilliant flower. Each dress is accompanied with two engravings, one to show the effect of the garment when made, the other is a diagram of the different parts of the dress, displaying the way in which it should be put together.

A skirt of mauve silk is imported ready made and trimmed. It has a demi-train and is gored to fit plainly on the hips, with a full width gathered in at the back. Folds of black and white satin are in military style up the front width. Similar folds form a vandyked border around the skirt, and are finished by Maltese lace, black and white mixed. Material and trimming for waist and sleeves are furnished. Price $115.

A tasteful and inexpensive material for evening dresses is called tinsel tartan. It is a yard and a quarter wide, at $1 50 the yard. There are threads of silver and of gilt on white, on apple-green, and on the brown shade of red called Bismarck's court color. Dew-drops of crystal on white are pretty but frail. Scarlet blood-drops on black are more serviceable.

PÉRCALÉS AND CAMBRICS.

Piqués, percales, and French cambrics are either striped or in small figures. Buff grounds strewn with black or purple are in good taste. Quiet colors are seventy-five cents a yard. White grounds with high colors are $1 a yard. There are solid stripes of black, bouquets, scroll-like figures, and a pattern imitating lace. A novelty in cambrics is a robe dress of small figures with a border for trimming, the whole length of the cloth. A plate accompanies each dress, showing the way the border should be placed on the gored skirt. Double rows of wheat ears border a dress of narrow stripes. Another has small rose-buds scattered over the dress, with a vine and leaves for trimming. A dress pattern of eleven yards is sold for $6 50.

NOVELTIES IN LACE.

Among late importations are some evening dresses of Lama lace. This is, as our readers probably know, a machine lace usually made in the same patterns as thread lace, which it closely resembles without being an imitation. The dresses are woven in the shape of a princess robe, with demi-train. The corsage is low-necked with sleeves scarcely an inch long, and is woven to fit the bust without a seam. They should be made up over silk. The white one shown us was displayed over lavender. There are a variety of patterns in black, varying from $50 to $150. A Polonaise or redingote of black Lama is graceful and new. A lace belt and sash confines it at the waist. A white rotunde or talmia is suitable for receptions. There are short jackets with open flowing sleeves, and a new sacque called the Castellan, with long square Greek sleeves. Besides these there are mantilla coiffures worn in the Spanish fashion without a bonnet, covering the head and fastening loosely under the chin, or thrown over the bonnet, forming a coquettish masque-veil that conceals the upper part of the face. Wide lace sashes with bows and loops, or with rings, are also imported, and a variety of Marie Antoinette fichus of Lama, Valenciennes, and guipure, at from $26 to $36.

PERSONAL.

WE place reliance upon the truthfulness of the BEECHERS, and therefore confide in what one of the ladies of the family writes of HENRY WARD BEECHER, viz.: that when the latter, at the age of eleven, was sent to her school he was regarded as "an inveterate joker and an indifferent scholar," and he was therefore returned to his parents. It was the opinion of his class that there was much talent lying about loosely in him that needed to be "licked" into shape. Are not advised as to whether it was "licked" or not.

—EARL DERBY, who has just resigned the British Premiership, is sixty-nine. His son, Lord STANLEY, Secretary for Foreign Affairs, is forty-two, but so very grave and serious that his father calls him "the old man."

—GENERAL EMORY UPTON, whose book of Tactics has been adopted by the United States Army, and who has just obtained a year's leave of absence, was married a few days since to Miss EMILY NORWOOD MARTIN, of Willowbrook, Cayuga County. He goes to Europe on his bridal tour, or "trial trip," as it is now called by owners of steamships.

—MR. JOSEPH HOWARD, a clever young "gentleman of the press," once had the honor of being the nation's guest for a short period at Fort Lafayette, as a compliment for having successfully launched into the reading world a proclamation purporting to have been written by the late President LINCOLN. A few days since he called at one of our publishing houses and remarked that he thought of doing "a little something in the biographical line; biography pays." "Ah! yes, HOWARD," remarked an impertinent hireling, "write about Lafayette; that's your forte!" J. H. applied his handkerchief to his spectacles, and said he would ruminate about it.

—That longevous but lively composer, ACBEE, though seven-and-eighty summers' suns have rested upon him, has just completed a new opera, called "Un Jour de Bonheur," which is to be presented on the stage in Paris this month. The critics who have heard it pronounce it equal to the best productions of his best days.

—ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS is receiving much attention from Boston folk, though from the conversation no one would ever dream that there had been any little troubles between North and South.

—The exact amount paid by Mr. A. T. STEWART to Mr. DERBY for ROSA BONHEUR's "Horse Fair" was thirty-five thousand dollars—the largest price ever paid for a single picture in this country.

—At the dinner given at Florence to Admiral FARRAGUT, Mr. SELLA, the former Minister of Finance, got off a neat little thing when he said that "upon iron hearts and not iron-clads" the Admiral based his fame. Mr. DEPRENTIS, Secretary of Marine Affairs, spoke of America as "the country found by COLUMBUS, baptized by VESPUCCI, and celebrated by BALBOA."

—Women preachers are becoming a feature among the Universalists. Rev. OLYMPIA BROWN has for nearly five years preached at Weymouth, Massachusetts. Rev. R. A. DAMAN, recently settled at Cavendish, Vermont, "is meeting with fine success." Rev. Miss A. J. CHAPIN has been recently called to Mount Pleasant, Michigan. Rev. Mrs. P. A. HANAFORD has been preaching at Hingham, Massachusetts, for over a year. There are lady preachers of the same denomination in East Boston, Roxbury, Arlington, Lowell, and other places; and "others are waiting to meet with proper encouragement." ANTOINETTE BROWN BLACKWELL, the first regularly-ordained woman preacher in America, we believe, still lectures and preaches at times, though no longer connected with any church.

—ROBERT LINCOLN is soon to be married to a daughter of Senator HARLAN. Mr. LINCOLN is a young gentleman of superior abilities, industrious, unassuming, practical, and has an auspicious prospect before him.

—MR. HOPE, the banker, has the largest and finest pearl now known. It is two inches long and four inches round, but like all such rarities, is of such enormous and uncertain value that no one would buy it at the market-price. The most beautiful collection of pearls, however, belongs to the Dowager Empress of Russia. Her husband was exceedingly fond of her, and as he shared with her other fancies, also that for fine pearls, he sought for them all over the world. They had to fulfill two conditions rarely to be met with; they must be perfect spheres and they must be virgin pearls, for he would buy none that had been worn by others. After twenty-five years' search he presented his Empress with a necklace such as the world has never seen before.

—The men must look to it or they will find themselves overtaken by the ladies in some of those professions and studies in which they have hitherto reigned supreme. In England, at the Royal Academy, Miss LOUISA STAN has carried off the Gold Medal. A female clerk has found her way into a Government office. Schoolmasters in villages are to be replaced by females, and the Apothecaries' Company is to examine females as to their proficiency in dispensing drugs. The thing can not be estopped.

—According to the Rev. Dr. BELLOWS, who is one of the most sensible and conscientious letter-writers of the day, VICTOR EMANUEL is fast losing his hold upon the affections of the Italian people. His homely visage, unshapely and repulsive, hangs upon most walls and windows; but now that he has forfeited, in Italian eyes, the proud title of galantuomo, it seems to stand out, a just exponent of the aversion which is openly confessed for his person and character.

—The Duchess Dowager of SOMERSET is a lady after the American female heart. Always a firm friend of the Yankee she said not long since, in a burst of enthusiasm, that she wished she could go to the United States as Minister. "I would soon set things smooth, I assure you. I would give dinner-parties, say civil things, and make peace generally. I think I must ask Lord STANLEY to send me."

—The wife of the heir-apparent to the Russian throne is said to be the most beautiful princess in Europe.

—MR. THORNTON, the new British Minister at Washington, will soon move into the large, odd-looking house formerly occupied by Sir FREDERICK BRUCE. It was built by a dentist. A doctor of divinity passing there one day was asked by a friend who accompanied him to what order of architecture the porch belonged. The doctor replied: "I don't know, unless it is the Tusk-an."

—The Empress CARLOTTA was born June 7, 1840. She is fine-looking, graceful, and gentle; her face oval, complexion bright, and readily flushed; her nose is a little aquiline; her mouth is pretty, and beneath her rosy lips is a set of regular pearl-white teeth; her eyes are not large, but very bright, and when she becomes excited they flash like fire. She has a heavy head of hair of a beautiful dark auburn shade. Nature formed her for an empress, and her acquirements not less fitted her for the station. She speaks and writes the French, Spanish, German, English, and Italian languages. Her union with MAXIMILIAN was purely an affair of love. She revered him as "a man of intelligence, of dignity, of power, brave to a fault, and the personification of affection."

—Alas! for the memories that hedge around a great name! The library of the late JOHN C. CALHOUN, embracing many choice works of great value, was recently sold at auction for the paltry sum of $250, to satisfy debts. Whole shelves of books were knocked down for from $1 to $6 per shelf. The sale of the house and land was to have taken place soon afterward, but General CANBY's order reserving to every family a house and twenty acres of land, will for the present enable his widow and her children to retain their home.

—LADY ANNA GORE LANGTON, Lady AMBERLEY, Sir GEORGE BOWYER, Mrs. SOMERVILLE, Sir ROWLAND HILL, The O'DONOGHUE, MARY HOWITT, Lord ROMILLY, Lady GOLDSMID, Rev. C. KINGSLEY, Sir J. SIMPSON, M.D., Mr. GOLDWIN SMITH, together with 14,000 others less known, have petitioned that single women and widows, duly qualified as rate-payers, may be allowed to vote for members of Parliament.

—To map out a dinner for England's QUEEN, and carry it to a successful termination, is a serious matter indeed, requiring the services of one chief cook, three master cooks, three yeomen of the kitchen, two roasting cooks, and four apprentices. There are also two larders and stores, a store-keeper, two green-office men, three kitchen-maids, and two men to superintend steam apparatus. The salary of the chief cook is about $3500 a year; that of the two master-cooks one-half that sum. The salaries of the others vary from $3 a week to $1050 a year. The chiefs of the kitchen dine in state every day at three o'clock, the chair being taken by Her Majesty's chief cook, or in his absence by the senior master cook.

—THE PRINCESS IGNATIEFF were recently at a ball at Nice a stomacher and tiara of diamond-work worth $100,000. She thought, no doubt, she would be alone in her glory, and great must have been her chagrin when she came vis-à-vis with Madame HARTMAN, whose diamonds were as valuable as her own, though M. HARTMAN was only the "fortunate inventor of the Magenta dye." The Naples ROTHSCHILD and his wife, who were present, were conspicuous for their unpretending appearance, but could have beaten both the Princess and the dyer in stomachers and tiara if they had chosen.

—French Cabinet Ministers are paid a trifle better than American. Marshal VAILLANT, Minister of the Imperial Household and of Fine Arts, receives $56,000 per annum. The Minister of State, M. ROUHIER, and the Minister of War, Marshal NEIL, the same. The Minister of Foreign Affairs $36,000, and the Ministers of Justice and Public Instruction $30,000 each. Our Cabinet Ministers are paid $8000, which is barely sufficient to pay for house rent, food, and the help of freedwomen. Mr. SEWARD is the only member of the Cabinet who gives fine dinners. The others give receptions.

Embroidery Patterns in Point Russe.

THESE numerous little illustrations, resembling pen-drawings, will be pleasing to many of our readers. The designs given may be used in manifold ways. Many of them are suitable for ornamenting pocket-handkerchiefs, cravats, mats, notebooks, porte-monnaies, port-folios, and the like. Some are only used as figures for a design, while others are intended for single ornaments. Any of them may be worked, according to the purpose for which they are designed, on silk, cloth, reps, or wash material, and with silk, wool, or cotton, in point russe, and diagonal half-polka stitch. The thread, however, must be very fine, in order that the design may appear delicate and resemble a drawing.

Light Screen.

MATERIALS: twisted silk of the colors given in the pattern, fine canvas, brown linen, green silk, green chenille, fine green silk cord, a polished wooden frame forming a stand as shown in the illustration.

This screen is as useful as it is beautiful, and is composed of embroidery in a wooden frame. The embroidery is done in French knot stitch, with colored twisted silk, and on canvas fine enough to be covered by the knots. The accompanying illustration gives the pattern. This use of the knotted stitch is new, and has a very pretty effect. In order to make this stitch, fasten the thread on the back of the canvas under which is laid the brown linen, then draw the thread through one of the holes in the canvas, wind it three times around the needle as shown in the illustration, put the needle again through the same hole as shown by the cross in the illustration, and bring the thread out again on the back of the work. In order that the knots may be of the same size, even in thread of dissimilar fineness, wind oftener around the needle in proportion as it is finer. The single knots are separated each by two threads of the canvas in breadth and two in width. To make a screen like the pattern, take a piece of canvas, according to the size of the frame; lay a linen lining under this, stretch it in an embroidery frame and work therein. The silk must be chosen of the colors given in the directions accompanying the pattern, but the leaves must be dark, so that they shall be distinct from the medium green of the foundation. The flower-cups are very pretty if worked in gray-green shaded silks. The foundation must make a border outside the design, as shown in the illustration. Border the still unworked edges of the canvas with a stripe of green silk, which must be laid in a fold at the corners. Sew fine green silk cord over the seams between the embroidery and the silk, as also on the pleats of the corners. Line the back of the canvas with green silk, trim the edges of the different thick-

Lingerie.

We give a number of illustrations of the following tasteful articles of lingerie, which our readers can readily copy or modify to suit their taste.

Lace fichu, edged with wide and narrow lace, narrow insertion, and grelots, and trimmed with loops and ends of pink ribbon.

Bavette collar and cuffs of fine double linen, trimmed with needle-work and Valenciennes edging in the manner shown in the illustration.

Collar with bow of needle-work. Swiss muslin insertion trimmed with a narrow needle-work frill and a Swiss muslin bow in front, which is also edged with the same frill. The sleeve terminates in a cuff of pleated Swiss muslin, edged round the top with a narrow, and round the bottom with a wide needle-work frill.

Morning cap of Swiss muslin. The crown is formed of two puffs of figured muslin. Needle-work insertion, and wide and narrow Swiss muslin frills complete the trimming.

Morning cap of Swiss muslin, needle-work insertion, and guipure insertion. The crown is trimmed with a large rosette of Swiss muslin. Waist and bodice of batiste, trimmed with needle-work insertion and narrow needle-work bands. Cuffs of pleated batiste and needle-work frills. The bodice is likewise of pleated batiste, trimmed with needle-work insertion and edging, with a quilling of batiste round the top. A puffing of batiste, edged on each side with a narrow frill of the same, passes over the shoulders.

Swiss muslin waist trimmed with narrow needle-work insertion and edging, and small leaves, with ribbon laid underneath in the manner shown in the engraving. Belt trimmed to match.

Waist with rolling collar of batiste, needle-work insertion, and narrow needle-work edging. A chemisette and collar of pleated Swiss muslin, needle-work insertion, and edging is worn underneath.

Cravat collar of needle-work, Swiss insertion, and leaves, with blue ribbon run through the same, finished in the back with loops and long ends of blue ribbon.

Cravat collar of needle-work, diamond-shaped figures, set on a Swiss muslin band, with pink ribbon underneath, and finished in the back with loops and long ends of the same ribbon. A needle-work figure is attached to each of the ribbon ends.

Swiss muslin fichu, trimmed round the edge with broad lace and pink ribbon laid underneath. The neck is finished with a quilling of the same ribbon and a frill of lace. A rosette, loops, and ends of ribbon complete the fichu.

Fichu of pleated Swiss muslin trimmed with needle-work insertion and edging. A colored ribbon is laid under the insertion. Needle-work medallions and a ribbon bow complete the trimming.

Collar and cuffs of fine double linen worked in French embroidery stitch.

Standing collar and cuffs of Valenciennes lace, with green ribbon round the neck, tied in a bow in front. The cuff is trimmed with a diamond-shaped needle-work medallion, edged with insertion and Valenciennes lace, and finished with loops of ribbon.

Low-necked waist of puffed Swiss muslin and pink ribbon. Belt of puffed muslin, edged with ribbon, and fastened with a muslin and ribbon rosette. Neck and sleeves trimmed with needle-work edging.

Waist of pleated Swiss muslin, with needle-work edging down the front. Trimming of green ribbon laid on in bretelles, as shown in the illustration. Sleeves trimmed round the bottom with green ribbon. Green silk buttons.

Crochet Hat.

See illustration on first page.

MATERIALS: Straw-colored twisted silk; white knitting cotton; white silk; brown velvet ribbon, $\frac{3}{4}$ inch wide; a small feather; a small bronze clasp; pasteboard.

This hat is worked with straw-colored twisted silk, in single crochet, over a foundation of white knitting cotton, and looks as if it were formed of fine straw braids. Begin the crown in the centre by a foundation of 6 single crochet stitches over the foundation thread of cotton; join this to a ring by a slip stitch, and draw the foundation cotton firmly, so that these stitches shall lie close together. On this foundation thread work 8 rounds, widening on the two opposite sides of the work (front and back of the hat) in such a manner that a flat oval part is formed, which shall neither lie in folds nor be stretched. Having finished, work 6 rounds, without widening, for the sides of the head; and after this the rim of the hat. In the first round of the rim, which is worked like the crown, widen by a few stitches front and back. In the second round of the rim add 1 stitch after every 5 single crochet; besides this, crochet in the 17 middle stitches front, and also back, 34 double crochet—that is, 2 double crochet in each of the stitches mentioned. Also, crochet 2 short double crochet before and after the 34 double crochet. The 3d and 4th rounds are composed entirely of single crochet, widening by a few stitches front and back. In the 4th round lay a fine wire in addition to the cotton foundation. The crown and sides are stiffened by pasteboard and lined with white silk. Trim the hat after the pattern with a 3-strand braid of brown velvet ribbon, and with a small feather, which is fastened on with a bronze clasp.

Crochet Beret.

See illustration on first page.

The crown of this hat is formed in the same manner as that of the hat just described, but is three rounds larger. Having finished this flat oval part, crochet with the same number of stitches 5 rounds for the side. The crown is stiffened with pasteboard and lined with white silk. The side, which is not yet of the required breadth, is now fastened to a circular pasteboard strip, which must be wide enough to come half an inch below the crochet sides. This pasteboard circle is cut out a little at each side of the hat, thus giving it a sloping form. Finish with a reverse of brown velvet over pasteboard. This reverse is trimmed with gilt braid which imitates a buckle in front, where a few white feathers are added. The inside of the sides is also lined with white silk.

Lavender Velvet Bonnet.

See illustration, page 325.

This tasteful bonnet is made of lavender velvet, bound with satin of the same color. Loops and ends of lavender satin ribbon form the trimming behind; and a bow of the same ribbon holds the strings together. The strings are of lavender velvet, bound with lavender satin, and edged with black lace. Inside trimming of lavender velvet flowers.

White Velvet Bonnet.

See illustration, page 325.

This bonnet is of white epigle velvet, with pointed velvet trimming round the edge, bound with the same material, and bordered with white Angora fringe, and also with white satin ribbon cut in points, as shown in the illustration. A spray of white honey-suckle and a jet ornament in front. White satin strings.

THE SEASON.

THE severity of the winter in Washington has only been equalled, say the oldest inhabitants, by the brilliancy of the fashionable season.

It began early and ended late, shone with resplendence through all its career, and though it is smothered by the extinguisher of Ash-Wednesday, it means to break out presently in the lesser fires of theatricals and charity concerts.

"No more receptions," said one of the fairest of the many fair; "they are not to be thought of in Lent. One must give a little time to Heaven.

Such dissipation wears one out besides. We shall have theatricals instead!"

So much less exciting, so much more innocent, so much more humiliating to the vanity, so much more mortifying to the flesh!

But, obliged to fall back on that poverty of entertainment in the future, how they enjoyed the only moment they could call their own, how they kept the ball rolling in a perfect Carnival-week—Cabinet and Congressional assemblies, state-dinners, masquerades, and three parties a night! Surely these bright participants in gayety need the cross of Lent to enable them to drag their existence through the remainder of the year. It is fearful to think of the deadly waste of life and strength which would take place but for the kindly intervention of Mother Church, who does for her festive children what their own mothers fail to do, and allows them a trifle of rest in which to gather their forces for the summer campaigns of Newport and Saratoga.

The houses of Washington are, in one way, peculiarly fitted for the life that is led in them—the halls, the parlors, and the suites of rooms beyond, are so spacious and lofty that the air is almost always good, and the crowd seldom too great. There are other reasons why the air should be good though, for most of the dwellings, erected only for summer shelter, as you may say, are as full of draughts and cold currents as if they were mere frames of lattice-work.

This answers very well for night-work, cooling it conveniently; but by such means chilblains and muritic acid, sore throats and sal-ammonia, rheumatisms and narcotine strike an inseparable friendship with the guests and frequenters. There are scarcely any trees to shield these houses; nevertheless, in summer the south side is the coolest side, despite a meridian sun, for from that direction blows all the wind there is; but in winter every side is cold—cold, and damp, and dismal. The older houses are generally built in such a style that the second-floor is as good for drawing-room purposes as the first, so that the owners can retire into upper seclusion, and rent the floor beneath at one of those prices from which there is no appeal, and which cause newcomers to regard the whole population, from Bridge Street to the Capitol, as a conspiracy to extort money. These abodes are seldom furnished with much luxury, those who hire them—but for some star exceptions—not caring to duplicate their properties of value, nor caring either to transport from their own distant residences their more cherished possessions. For all we know, it may be the very want of any thing like the warm and cozy element of home that drives the pleasure-seekers abroad. Abroad they always are; and it leaves one to marvel concerning the domestic life of these people, where the master of the house is out all day, and its mistress out all night. But there are other mansions, lying out of the city or set deep in gardens within its limits, or presenting an ancient front to the street, where the charm of homelike comfort is complete, where hospitalities seem a part of the atmosphere, where the upholsterer can do no more, where the green-houses are like a province of fairy-land, and where the long apartments are lined with pictures that are a fortune in themselves.

Never had wonderful toilettes more room for their pageantry than in these mansions, and never has there been a time when wonderful toilettes were so much the order of the day, or, to be more consistent, of the night—jewels, brocades, and fabulous laces, sparkling, sweeping, and floating on every side. These diamonds blind the gloating gaze of envy. Like the fair Inez who went into the west, they

"Dazzle when the sun is down,
And rob the world of rest."

This lady's dress was purchased at the price of seventy-five thousand dollars; it is to be admitted that the same amount would spare seventy-five families a cruel winter's suffering—but what is that to her? Yet one does not doubt that she is a kind-hearted gentlewoman, in spite of such indifference; but where would be her husband's advantage to do good over other men if she did not command a position, with her pearls and powder, above that to be obtained by fustian? Meanwhile the present prevailing modes in which ladies dress their hair, in setting off the charms of those already beautiful, makes a pleasant face out of a plain one; the clustering curls upon the forehead shading away the contours, darkening the eyes, softening the skin, and the high chignon giving a certain carriage to the most insignificant head. Nothing can be lovelier than this hair like Pauline Bonaparte's, unless it be this "little head running over with curls," which might belong to a Bacchante, so much does it resemble a basket of grapes!

The proportion of positive beauty in the assemblage at Washington, though large, is not nearly so large as you would expect to find it. We shall never rival the court of St. James, with an aristocracy of beauty of our own in this country, so long as it remains a republic; for the fluctuating fortunes of our millionaires will not afford us three generations of generous living with strong meat and red wine to feed and enliven that full, rich blood which blooms at last in the splendid light of the eye and color of the cheek, supplies the round, firm mould of the muscle, and gives at the outset that sense of well-being which is half the secret of well-bred behavior. Thus we are not at all surprised to find lovelier faces among the ranks of the regular residents in Washington—the aristocratic barnacles of power—than among the transient wayfarers of its political life; although, notwithstanding this general remark, the undisputed palm of beauty here this winter is carried away by a New England girl, whose golden hair and black eyebrows, rose-leaf skin and witching dimples, have no rival; she moves like a young princess indifferent through admiring throngs; and having seen her one remembers Belphebe, upon whose brow an "hundred graces sate;" still there are three others who follow so close in her shadow as to divert the gaze of a conscientious judge.

After the splendor, the chief charm of society in this place of which we speak is the freedom and ease which characterize it. Every one is considered to be an honorable person till the contrary fact may be discovered—an excellent maxim for business relations and the establishment of credit, but a questionable quality of what is called polite life, when considering the manner in which it does away with all barriers, and makes access to its drawing-rooms a far less difficult matter to manage than access to the services of its churches.

A lady who burns to parade her new Parisian wardrobe and lately-purchased family jewels has but to ascertain from the newspapers, or from the conversation at her hotel, the days on which the wife of this Cabinet officer or that Senator holds her morning reception—receptions where chocolate like a confection was handed round until the visitors, weary of the delicacy, rebelled in a body, and absolutely refused to touch it. The lady in question perhaps likes chocolate, or else she will swallow it whether she does or not, together with worse things; at any rate, her next step is to leave her cards. If the Senator's wife or the Cabinet lady is inclined to be reserved in the matter of her acquaintance, or fastidious as to her guests, some slight inquiry is instituted by her. "Who are these So-and-Sos, pray? Have you met them?"

"So-and-Sos? Oh! staying at Blank's. Enormously rich, I hear."

Cards are left for the So-and-Sos straightway. Undoubtedly then the name of our ambitious aspirant is announced at the next reception. The lady of the house, upon that, can but greet the stranger, however bold-faced, with civility. If she has a little kindness of disposition she will not like to neglect her, and will introduce her to her next neighbor, or possibly to a person of station, who perhaps fancies her, and, meeting her at this house, invites her in general terms to her own. Of course it is understood that she has a husband in the back-ground, or otherwise is a widow in her own right; and after this experience, seen twice unexceptionably, she is in society. Every day her ripple grows wider; and soon she rides on the top wave and passes sentence on others. Is her lace real? is, in point of fact, the only question that has been insisted upon concerning her.

There is a charmed circle behind this political one, where the traditions of the past are maintained in exclusive elegance by an old noblesse. Into this our adventures hardly enters, but she is able to enjoy all the far-famed pleasures of a Washington season without it. Yet unless she is willing to put up with a thousand humiliations and annoyances to pay for these brief and cheap and feverish pleasures, she will scarcely pronounce the game to be worth the candle.

And yet it is a splendid game. For look at the figures that glide across this region of enchantment; it is not youth and comeliness that entirely and by themselves compose the players; age is here, here in full feather; borrowing the foreign leaf, throats as wrinkled as baked apples flash in wreathed gems, and shoulders bearing the accumulated flesh of threescore years heave into sight and remind the beholders that to this complexion they must come at last. "Perhaps we shall die first," says youth, cheerily, and swings away on the full tide of the German. Age, too, that is reverend does not keep aloof, but young at heart joins here in the stir of life; not to speak of men grown gray in the service of equity, one's eye is often caught by the silver-crowned head of a woman, and it is always a lovely old face that turns to meet the gaze in response, a face that has had its history in the history of the country. Dignity joins the rout, moreover; the Chief Magistrate of the land, perhaps, lends his presence to the scene; the stately Chief Justice looms above the others; the General of the armies has come and gone again; and the glittering insignia of famous soldiers, the gorgeous array of the various bodies of gold-laced diplomats, the fantastic uniforms of foreign officers, make a relief to the sombre apparel of the citizen, and contrast gayly with the gauzes and gossamers of uplifted trains that flow around them in the dance; the place is ablaze with light, great fragrant flowers shed their sweetness through it, delicious music breathes its spell, and in more distant rooms the waltzers float in lingering circles till their motion seems only the visible melody. Here a tall and gray-haired man with a singularly wild and vacillating expression of face passes—it is the hero of the March through Georgia. Here a sturdy little sandy-haired fellow follows—it was of him that Sheridan's Ride was sung. Here is a small, thin old man, with an ugly scar upon a face which is a study, so curiously does it seem to have acquired its power from its owner's long occupation in splitting hairs; he is one of the first foreign officers of this or any government, who would increase his country's prestige immeasurably by causing her, as she rises breathless from the conquering struggle of her own dominions, to reach out her hands and boldly grasp the remainder of the continent. Here a cluster of three secretaries presents a coup d'œil of shrewdness seldom to be met with any where; one with a bland and genial face that you look twice at pronouncing it to be a mask for constant and close calculation; another noted for glances as sharp and penetrating as a surgeon's scalpel; the third with shaggy gray eyebrows curling upward in a Mephistophelian manner eminently becoming a politician. This dark and stalwart gentleman, whose red fez is always seen moving a-top of the crowd, is the Turkish Minister; that richly and perfectly dressed lady, who seems to sparkle like a summer midnight, is his wife—contrary to the ideas of those who imagine him the lord of a harem, he has but one. Although by birth what is known as a Levantine Frank, she has an Oriental look, and is one of the most picturesquely beautiful women in Washington. Here a tall and ruddy German Baron of the Austrian Legation moves by, celebrated at least in the name he bears, which Mrs. Shelley rendered famous when she created Frankenstein. Here, in the son of the Grecian Minister, an almost pure specimen of the golden-haired Greeks of Homer is to be seen. One can not look with indifference at the fresh growth of an immortal root as it starts up round the ruins of the Acropolis, nourished by Athenian sunshine, dews gathered from the blue Aegean, and all the hoary inheritance of freedom, heroism, and art. Here one catches a glimpse of a handsome young French Duke, with the head of an antique himself, and who is the grand-nephew of Madame de Staël. And here are the indefatigable attachés of the British Embassy, who waltz from night till morning, and with their winning manners increasing social kindness perform the whole of their diplomatic mission.

The foreigners, be it said, in passing, are quite the masters of the social situation here. In vain the native youth aspire, or sneer, or stand aside—the freshest belles hover round these titled flames; not, perhaps, till their wings are singed, but till a second season has taught them that, though a woman be as beautiful as Cleopatra, not one of these starred and gartered chevaliers is available as a husband for her, unless, like Cleopatra in another respect, she can afford to spice her wedding-wine with pearls each worth their kingdom.

One stands sometimes in a species of amazed rapture, and observes all these phantasmagoria of fame, or youth, or grace, or loveliness, and always of wealth of costume, pass by like the procession at a theatre; not with a simply vulgar curiosity concerning this or that worthy, this or that party magnate, but giving judgment as to how well they become their spheres, wondering to see them as human as one's humble self, hearkening to the voice that, it may be, changes the destiny of millions, and the eye often dwelling on the fairer portion with a pure artistic satisfaction. Can you look at the lace worn by the happy and handsome wife of our Agitor Abroad with any other emotion than that with which you gaze at an exquisite sea-weed or wonderfully fragile madrepore? Of course, if you are a woman, you will envy it—but all the more you will admire; it is not in feminine nature to refuse tribute to the perfection of the thing over its soft turquoise-blue shimmer of silk beneath—those fibres like the white threads of the blanched skeleton flowers; that design of phantom bluebells, pansies, violets, and ferns, that wantons over all the web like a frozen mist, as intricate and dazzling as the breath of a winter's morning on the pane! Or possibly you prefer the lace that another lady sometimes wears, laid over purple velvet, the whole front breadth a single piece of old Venice Point—in Europe prized so inestimably for altarlace, and every where fit for a queen, and which appears as if it could have been woven only out of snow-flakes with their spiculae just melting into one another; yet, for all its value and its beauty, bearing a ridiculous resemblance to that endless work which goes among young ladies by the name of tating. And if lace neither fascinates nor rouses you, let us but examine the attire of a third person—a thick white corded silk, with a train that "reaches out into the other room," long slight boughs of the delicate and pale-pink locust-blossom going from the waist to the shoulder and down on either side around the skirt; above this an overdress of tulle, like a transparent vapor, softening the whole toilette into a sort of repose from which shines, in magnificent relief, a tiara of diamonds set in the fashion of roses and buds, fuschias and leafy sprays; there are pendant ear-rings and a double necklace, too, of the same precious stone; and then there is a stomacher that fits in from the belt to the shoulder, a mass of diamonds again—great stones, that seem to breathe and to pulsate with a life of their own, wrought into all sorts of floral entanglement and frosty splendor. Were it a fancy-dress, might not its owner be taken for the spirit of the hoar-frost at sunrise?

Dress, under such circumstances, and with such rivalry, acquires the importance of one of the fine arts; and the heavy velvets and old English threads, that in another place are a patent of nobility, become in such companionship mere backgrounds of respectable mediocrity.

If, therefore, Dame Censor dare to lift her voice in derision of this pictorial pleasure of the eyes, as it unrolls its shifting scenes and puppets before her, she must needs labor under strong suspicions. And if one could only look into her heart, as now medical skill, by the cunning arrangement of lenses and mirrors, looks into the brain and the stomach, one would be very likely to find a queer conglomerate of delight and spite, envy and admiration—a sort of serpent's broth. Shall smiling shapeliness not array itself like the lilies of the field because that blue and silver brocade has taken the lustre out of the Dame's poplin, the pride of her heart—because her best black silk has degenerated into a rough serge beside that superb celadon green with its garniture of white silk leaves and its peplum of netted pearls—because her little shabby sandal-wood fan only gives a heated blast in view of that gold-mounted point-lace mystery, that looks like the apotheosis of some exquisite lace-winged insect—because all her dear, well-cared-for drapery turns into a mere line of shadow when these satins sweep along, rippling with lights, with sheets of broken reflections and melting splendors, as if pearls and opals and moonstones had been dissolved in the dye of their warp and woof? Because she is virtuous shall there be no more cakes and ale—and chocolate? Let her get her to a nursery! She is not wanted here.

Of course, then, for the fit display of these tints and sparkles that do no less than compete with Nature in her flower-petals, and her constellations, and her sunset clouds, all these receptions, and operas, and delightful private parties are needed, and a thousand more besides; so that the hops at the hotels, and the afternoon circles, where the daylight is shut out, and the gas is set flaring, and music and dancing deceive so happily that one issues into the daylight again with a singular sensation of living in two worlds at once—so that these extra-parochial opportunities do not by any means come amiss.

Nothing comes amiss, in fact—not even Lent. For by that time trains are soiled, laces are torn with much trampling, stimulants will no longer sustain, narcotics refuse the brief slumber begged by the excited brain, ether has lost its power, there are no more long gloves in town, and it is time to go to bed and have the doctor. Ah, merciful Lent! It is not necessary now to paint a delicate circle of almost imperceptible shade around the eye in order to deepen its depth of darkness—tired Nature has painted it permanently and not imperceptibly. Belladonna will not make that eye bright with the drug's former virtue; it needs a washing with tears, an indulgence of darkness and fallen lids, of regular sleep, of a week's repose. It will take no more than that, for then it must be wide awake to the religious dissipation that approaches—not to the primitive practice of penitents in the early days of Christendom who put sackcloth on their backs in token of contrition, and cast dust and ashes on their heads to remind them of the dust from which they came and the ashes to which they should return—but to the cloak and garment of charity; to theatricals for charity, wax-works for charity, fairs, concerts, lotteries for charity, and every day a long, delicious drowse in church—the dark and dim benignant church that never betrays its dreamers unless they betray themselves. And is not that drowse for charity too—the charity that begins at home?

But, serious as the fatigue may be that now finds refreshment in the first blessed week of the old Saxon Spring, which is the literal rendering of Lent, it is not all due to the strain of festal nights. There has been some other business—business of a totally divergent nature—that has, perhaps, exhausted half the forces of endurance in its turn. Our pretty butterflies, though they be votaries of fashion, are almost always devotees besides. Their consciences are all unseared; they have compromised with those members of their moral economy, and have bought their evenings with their mornings. They have in these mornings, it may be, made such a number of drawings to be sold for the poor. It takes many of them indeed to equal the value of one Valenciennes fichu; but then the old woman, whose coal they will help to buy, does not need a fichu, to be sure! They take their turn in district visitings, and carry light with their sweet young faces into miserable dwellings. They give so many hours from the twenty-four to sewing for the needy with their own dainty fingers—tiring back, and eyes, and hands in the real sacrificial work. Or if there are any who may be more lazily, less unselfishly inclined, there are regulations to meet their case, by allowing them to compound for their shortcomings, or rather long-goings, by reading two hours a day from any good book. Alas! when what should be a perfect pleasure becomes a high-church penance!

But although a mad excess in any thing is to be condemned, it is, nevertheless, easy to understand how one is drawn into the fashionable vortex—first from motives of policy and curiosity; then because others go; lastly, from sheer enjoyment. All asperities of political feeling vanish before the glazing gas-light of the drawing-room; this man's son dances with the daughter of his arch-enemy; deference is accorded to the opinion of a woman upon state affairs as if she already possessed a right of suffrage; there is an interchange of rare freedom and gentle courtesy, which is delightful to-night, and allures you to repeat it to-morrow. Beyond this it is not, after all, the inane and fashionable conversation of other centres that one listens to; for every man is present here owing to some supposed intellectual excellence, and nearly every woman is the wife or daughter of other men superior to their fellows; there is a certain exhilarating mental exercise in meeting and avoiding and overlooking, and it is upon this mutual emulation in light and skillful skating over dangerous surfaces that, in great measure, the social existence depends. Those at a distance think of Washington as a great visible stage of events—as a kind of whirlpool of incident and emotion—but no one in the latter portion of the week before Lent, when the coaches rolled out with their fair burdens, when gay murmurings of compliment and complaisance filled the perfumed air of the salons, when music swelled above the happy voices and waltzers swam to the enchantment of the tune, no one, passing from the warm and beaming rooms into the open midnight, would have supposed that the most important day of all our history had dawned and set in shadow, uncared for and unheeded by all these eager revelers.

FROM MY WINDOW.

WAS there ever such another "well-spring of pleasure" as that blessed baby across the way?

I sit by my window and gaze over there most untiringly, and my neighbors would say most impertinently, were they themselves not so entirely absorbed in their devotion to the dear little belaced, be-ribboned, and beloved household idol that they have no eyes for any thing else. Father, mother, five aunts, two uncles, and a purse devote themselves singly and collectively to the little six-months-old possessor of their affections and unwitting absorber of their cares. Every pleasant day baby must be taken out for an airing, carried by nurse, and attended invariably by either the mother or one of the five adoring maiden aunts. On Sundays the airing is taken in an open carriage, into which are deposited shawls ad libitum—weather precautions, of course; then enters the nurse, to whom baby is carefully handed by the mother, who follows, and as many of the aunts as can find place, the father mounting beside the driver.

At an early hour for such a thrifty, well-to-do business-man, the father comes home from his business, hastens up stairs to the front room to find his little magnet, gives first a kiss to his young wife—he albeit is no longer young, having married in advanced bachelorhood—then seizes upon the precious baby, and almost devours it with kisses, holds it this way and that, admiration depicted on every feature, and finally dumps it into the mother's lap, where it coos its satisfaction, and rewards him for his energetic finger-snapping efforts to win a smile, by opening longitudinally its rosy mouth, and showing two tiny white specks that promise to become in time those precious pearls yclept teeth. Now come home the uncles and take their turn at making devotional demonstrations, such as kissing, tossing, and whistling to win an opening of that little fissure in the face "That's made to put the vict' in."

And so from morning till night "the baby over the way" is watched, fondled, and admired by the paternals and ancestrals, verifying that

"A little child shall lead them."

P.S. A beautiful little carriage has just been brought home for baby. It has a shiny black top, with silver mountings, a delicately straw-colored body, blue lining and cushions, carpet with blue ground sprinkled with bright flowers, and a little love of a white fur mat.

P.S. No. 2. Wish I were a dear little pet over the way.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

PARIS, February 13, 1868.

IN this "capital of the world" one can buy not only almost any thing, but can buy at almost any price. The differences in price in the retail establishments chiefly depend, without doubt, on differences in quality; but every traveler learns that there are shops, one almost might say streets, in which prices are high because customers are indifferent or ignorant. A "prudent" French lady does not do all her shopping on the Boulevards or in the Rue St. Honoré. She rather avoids the shops that indicate their dependence on travelers' purses by the sign "English spoken," and frequents those, although perhaps less stylish, whose prices are adjusted to domestic competition.

I met with a singular instance of contrast in prices the other day. I went to one of the most famous horlogers, or watch-makers, of Paris, to whom I had been recommended for the purpose, with a watch which needed some repairs. I went up stairs, and being invited to walk in by a servant in livery, found myself in a beautiful suite of rooms, carpeted and furnished with easy-chairs and cloth-covered tables. I was received with great courtesy by the gentleman in charge, and prevailed upon to take a chair before entering upon business. Comfortably seated, I stated my errand; and the gentleman placed the watch which I handed him among others in a drawer, and replied that I should be informed by post of what was necessary to be done.

Having expected that he would stick a horn ring into his eye and tell me in two minutes, I was somewhat surprised, and as I indicated this he explained that it required an examination, and that I should receive a report in writing in the regular course of business. I yielded to what I thought might perhaps be one of the customs of the country; but the next day, in passing the door, I called in person for the report. It was not yet ready. The evening of the third day I found at my lodging a note, of which this is a translation:

"MONSIEUR,—I have the honor to inform you of considerable expenses to be necessary to the watch which you have confided to me. [Here followed an enumeration of the matters necessary to be done.] It will cost 58 francs, and will require at least fifteen days of time."

"While waiting that you may make known to me your orders, will you accept, Sir, my distinguished consideration."

The fifty-eight francs was unexpected, and the fifteen days was equally so. As I then expected to leave town within that time I went a third time, and received my watch again, with many bows and assurances of undiminished respect. Fortunately I did so, for passing through the Palais Royal that afternoon carrying my dumb watch the good old rule of three came into my head. It solved my problem thus: As three days to look at a watch are to fifteen days to mend it, so one day to look at it is to five days to mend it.

I was at once satisfied that I could have it done within a week if I could find a watchmaker who could examine it the same day.

Accordingly I went into Le Roy's, a well-known establishment of high repute, who sustained the accuracy of the rule of three, by telling me after a few minutes' examination that I could have it in five days, but to be better regulated it should be left six or seven.

I was uncertain whether the rule of three applied to the price would not make it cost me 150 francs; and he repeated twice that it would be 15 francs before I was quite sure that I understood him correctly.

In a week the watch was in my pocket, running again as well as ever; and I concluded that a written report and assurances of distinguished consideration were dear even at 43 francs, to say nothing of an extra week of time.

Agreeably to the law which requires the fronts of houses in Paris to be cleansed every few years, a notice appeared recently that the owners of property in specified districts of the city must have this work done the present year. To-day, on the corner of the Rue de Rivoli, opposite the Louvre, I stood among a crowd of spectators watching the operation performed with steam instead of water. Two men stood on a narrow scaffolding outside the third story, or, as we should call it, the fifth. They were dressed in black water-proof garments with large capes. Each had a scraping-tool in his right hand, and with the left he directed against the wall a noisy jet of hot steam from a rubber hose which hung over his shoulder, reaching thence in great festoons down to the entresol, or second story, where the steam-boiler was placed. On the balcony beneath them was lashed the sign of the contractor who undertook the work in this new style.

Ten minutes afterward, on crossing the river, I found myself in another little crowd by the lock, watching a flat-boat and a ladder. A round object, looking like the bottom of a zinc pot, rose from the water in front of the ladder, and then came a pair of hands, then arms and shoulders, cased in water-proof, emerged, elevating the huge metallic helmet which we had first seen, and gradually the amphibious creature crawled up the ladder. Although he seemed at home in the water he was quite helpless out of it, and was assisted into the boat by five men, who directed every movement he made and unfastened his wrappings. They detached his breathing-tube and unscrewed his head-piece exactly as if they were twisting off a giant's head, and, lifting it carefully off his shoulders, disclosed a red-faced woolen-capped head, puffing away as if fresh air were a great luxury. This was a diver who had been at work at the bottom of the river.

GRATIAN.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

ALTHOUGH there is no "royal road" to knowledge there is so much to be learned in life that it is well to give children such helps in difficult paths as the ingenuity of the age affords. It is, for example, always a tedious matter for a child to learn to write well; yet nowadays the tedium is greatly relieved by the numerous facilities which are given to the learner. And recently drawing exercises have been combined with writing lessons in copy-books, which will train both eye and hand, and afford pleasant amusement to children. Harper's Writing Books, with Marginal Drawing Lessons, present an entirely new plan, which it is believed will insure success in the Art of Drawing, while contributing to advancement in writing. A series of ten copy-books of the ordinary size gives progressive lessons in drawing and writing, with such general directions as are needful. A knowledge of the principles of drawing is becoming a very essential part of education; and a practical artist has sensibly remarked: "Any one who can learn to write can learn to draw; and drawing combined with writing will be found to greatly facilitate advancement in the latter."

There is also a "Copying Slate" which will be found useful and amusing for children. It consists of a slate with a groove in the upper part of the frame, containing a dozen cards, which can be taken out, reversed, or exchanged at pleasure. The cards are black, but printed in white upon them are exercises in simple arithmetic, writing, and drawing. The slate itself is specially prepared to assist the young child in correctly copying the lessons.

Every child is eager to imitate his elders and write letters. He must have a pen, dabble in the ink, and spoil half a dozen sheets of paper before he is satisfied. Half the trouble he causes others and experiences himself comes from the fact that ordinary paper does not give sufficient guidance to the little, unsteady hand and eye. There is, however, plenty of paper now to be obtained, ruled in colors, with horizontal and vertical lines, so that little folks using it can readily see where each letter should be made and how large. A moderate quantity of such paper, with envelopes to match, and a good black pencil, a sharpener, and a bit of rubber, would give peace to many a mother who knows not how to answer the constant question, "Mamma, what can I do?"

The weather has been severe in this section of the country—there is no doubt of the fact—and in all other sections, too, if thermometer reports are true. But really Illinois must bear the palm, if the assertion of a lady hailing from that State can be relied on. She was at a dinner-party in Washington. She was pretty and talkative, and—but the story will tell what else she was. The usual topic of the weather was introduced, and some one remarked how exceedingly cold it had been. "Yes," responded the lady, glibly, "very cold; but nothing compared to the cold weather we have in Illinois. Why, where I was last winter it was a hundred and thirty below zero!" "Indeed," replied a grave Senator; "one hundred and thirty below zero! That was cold!"

Some people, as it has been remarked very justly and sensibly, are as careful of their troubles as mothers are of their babies; they cuddle them, and rock them, and hug them, and cry over them, and fly into a passion with you if you try to take them away from them; they want you to fret with them, and to help them to believe that they have been worse treated than any body else. Their trouble makes them selfish—they think more of the dear little grief in the basket and in the cradle than they do of all the world besides; and then consider you hard-hearted if you say, "Don't fret." "Ah! you don't understand me—you don't know me—you can't enter into my trials."

Dr. Bellows, writing from Dresden, says: "A German dinner, at the table d'hôte of a good hotel, is a capital institution. A light soup; a carp or an eel, with a cold sauce of salad-dressing; a piece of over-cooked beef (usually boiled) with a good gravy and small potatoes cooked with butter; a fowl, with salad and some cooked fruit (plums or cherries or apples), served together; a roasted hare larded; a pudding (mehl-speise) with a raspberry sauce; some ice-cream and a cup of coffee; this, or something very like it, is the usual dinner at a first-rate hotel. Every body drinks a half-bottle of Rhine or French wine with dinner, and many add a glass of light beer. The service is slow, an hour and a half being the usual length of the dinner. The Germans dine at one o'clock, but four or five is becoming not unusual. The waiters are attentive, respectful, and intelligent, often speaking French and English as well as German. They are even polished in their manners, always carefully dressed, and wearing black dress-suits."

A curious story comes from Paris, which illustrates how easily a person may lose an article naturally, when the loss is so strange and mysterious that a thief gets the credit of it. A lady in Paris recently found in her muff a bracelet of great value, a splendid collection of diamonds and opals, worth thirty thousand francs. How it got there she could not imagine.

Some evenings after, at a select party, she heard the Countess B—grieving over a lost bracelet, the description corresponding to that which had been so mysteriously found. The lady produced it, and the Countess was enraptured. At last she said:

"I have no idea how I lost it. I had been to the milliner's, the glove-store, the fur-store—"

"The fur-dealers!" That suggested something.

"Did you try on a muff while you were there?"

"Yes, several."

"Was this one of them?" And the lady exhibited her own.

"Yes, and I remember the man told me it had only been sent for repairs, and was not for sale."

And the mystery was explained.

A nice table is often seriously injured in appearance by some one placing on it a pitcher of boiling water, or a hot dish, which leaves a whitish mark. To remove this it is only necessary to pour some lamp oil on the spot and rub it hard with a soft cloth; then pour on a little spirits of wine or Cologne water, and rub it dry with another cloth. The white mark will thus disappear, and the table look as well as ever.

A very youthful man in Elmira, who has been paying close attention to a young lady of the same city, either with a view to matrimony or money, a short time since became chivalric, and eloquently offered to prove his love by any task, however difficult. "Bid me," he impetuously exclaimed, "bid me tame the lion in the jungles, or restrain an office seeker on his way to Washington, and I will do it. Ask me to climb the loftiest peak of ice-crowned Mount Olympus, or address a tumultuous assemblage of woman's rights in opposition to female suffrage, and it is done! Command that I should bring snow-flakes from the torrid skies of Africa or an iceberg from the sulphuric waves—" "Hold!" cried the maiden; "you can more easily contribute to my pleasure. There is a youth, Weston is his name, who started from Portland, Maine, and is even now stretching his legs with eager intent toward home. Imitate his noble example—" "What?" "Walk!" Strange to say the orator took the hint, and—his hat.

They have many good ideas in Paris—very good ideas. For instance, it is just now seriously proposed, on account of the great adulteration of milk there, to establish a cow-house from which the animals shall be driven each morning to the different houses, and that milkmaids, jauntily dressed, shall milk them in the presence of the customers. The increased price of milk will, of course, indicate to what extent the milk has hitherto been adulterated, if the anecdote of the French poet be any criterion. He had hired a house in the country to pass the summer. As soon as he was fairly installed in it he went in search of a farmer who had a milch cow. Having found one he stated his want. "My good man, my servant will come every morning to buy a pint of milk." "Very well, it is eight sous." "But I want pure milk, very pure." "In that case it is ten sous." "You will milk in the presence of my servant." "Oh, then, it is fifteen sous."

The latest French romance is concerning a Marquis, who, while pursuing the chase in a lonely part of Brittany, fell into a pit used for storing vegetables. Here he remained several hours before any one heard his cries for help. Then a band of peasants appeared, but refused to aid him until he should first give them every article in his possession. He was about to comply with this outrageous demand when, by accident, a young girl who was reaching over the edge to receive something from his hands fell down. The Marquis then told her friends that unless they at once drew him out the girl should suffer for it. Alarmed at this the brutes scampered away, and the couple remained in the pit for three days and nights. The Marquis, to his astonishment, found his fellow-prisoner very pretty, intelligent, and agreeable; and when at length they were rescued, he took her to Paris, where he had her educated. At his death he left her a piece of land and a house in the suburbs of Paris, which by the rise of property became worth in three years' time several millions of francs. At present the former peasant girl has an Italian title, and is received in the first society.

OPENING DAY IN NEW YORK.

OUR artist, Mr. HOMER, has given us a very beautiful and effective birds-eye view of the great fashion carnival, THE OPENING OF THE SPRING STYLES, when the rooms of the fashionable modistes are thrown open to a select party of the élite of their patrons, and the newly-imported fashions for the coming season are unveiled to their gaze. These Openings are the source of much interest and curiosity among ladies, and are thronged with invited guests. The bright and eager faces of the beautiful girls in the picture attract our attention from the bewildering maze of bonnets, cloaks, parasols, and flowers through which they are threading their way, and for a detailed description of which we must refer our readers to our column on New York Fashions, which chronicles the changes that come with the advent of Spring.

OPENING DAY IN NEW YORK.—[SEE PAGE 327.]

DAYS OF REST.

By HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

Sweet Sundays, rising o'er the world,
Have never failed to bring their calm,
From their tranquil wings unfurled,
On the tired heart distilling balm.
A purer air bathes all the fields,
A purer gold the generous sky,
The land a hallowed silence yields,
All things in mute glad worship lie—
All save where careless innocence
In the great Presence sports and plays,
A wild bird whistles, or the wind
Tosses the light snow from the sprays.

For life renews itself each week—
Each Sunday seems to crown the year—
The fair earth rounds as fresh a cheek
As though just made another sphere.
The shadowy film that sometimes breathes
Between our thought and Heaven's parts,
The holy hour so brightly wreathes
Its solemn peace about our hearts.
And Nature, whether sun or shower
Caprices with her soaring days,
Rests conscious, in some happy sense,
Of the wide smile that lights her ways.

THE WASTE-PAPER BASKET.

JOHN HOWDEN sat at his writing-desk trying to write a letter, but he tore up three or four sheets of note-paper before he got the letter just as he wanted it; then he threw the torn fragments of paper into the basket at his side and, lighting a cigar, prepared to saunter out, evidently in no very pleasant humor.

"Confound the luck!" he muttered; "no other fellow who had fallen in for such a good thing would trouble himself about the other. I tried to make it as gentle, yet as decided, as I could. It's all very well to say 'It's best to be off with the old love before you are on with the new.' It's so easy to advise; but sometimes it's just impossible to get rid of these foolish entanglements contracted in one's boyhood, before one knows any thing of the world, his own heart, or the woman that would suit him for a wife."

As he pursued his reflections he directed an envelope in a large, legible hand, and dried it on the blotting-paper; then brushed his hair—not that it needed it, but it gave him an excuse to look into the glass, and went out to the business of the day, thrusting his note into a letter-box as he walked down Broadway, breathing, with a sigh of relief, "There! that's off my mind!"

His looks all that day belied his words; clients came, but the young lawyer could not listen as attentively to the statement of their woes or wrongs as was his custom. As the door closed on one after the other his high white brow contracted into thoughtful wrinkles, and he kept repeating to himself:

"Well! it can't be helped now, and at any rate it's off my mind."

But it was not off his mind, or he wouldn't have tried so hard to convince himself that it was.

Buried in thought he sat in no very graceful attitude, for one foot was screwed over and under the round of his chair, which he adroitly balanced on its hind legs, while the other calmly reposed, high and dry, on his great office-desk. As he sat there in his contemplative mood he was a very handsome man to look at: tall, well-formed, muscular, with large, flashing black eyes, and hair so raven as to form a dazzling contrast to the delicate whiteness of his skin. He was thoroughly Italian in appearance, and had been dressed in "doublet and hose," with a silk-velvet hat, and scarlet plume drooping over his pallid brow, one might have imagined him that magnificent Venetian stripling for whom the lovely Bianca Cappello imperiled her impassioned soul.

One of John Howden's college chums—Charles Drake—had fought through three years of the late rebellion in the same regiment with himself; and the hardships, perils, and adventures of war had cemented their boyish friendship.

John Howden was now on a visit to Charles Drake, and was supposed to be very much in love with his sister, Mrs. Mortimer, a young and charming widow.

It does not fall to the lot of every woman to be young, handsome, healthy, wealthy, and a widow, all at once; and Mrs. Mortimer was naturally the recipient of a great deal of admiration and attention; but she was not a coquette, and gave encouragement to no one—that is, until the fascinating Howden came on a protracted visit to her brother; then—

"Love took up the glass of Time and turned it in his glowing hands."

An engagement was speedily entered into, and the wedding-day was not far distant.

Mrs. Mortimer was a thorough little house-keeper, and regularly every morning flitted from cellar to attic, from pantry to parlor, to see that there was no dust on the gilt-backed, red-satin chairs that stood in stately grandeur in the drawing-room; and that not a fold on the fine fresh linen of the large French bedsteads was disarranged.

She usually sent before her to clear the way a domestic skirmishing force of chamber-maids. One of these was named "Bella"—Isabella, strictly speaking—"Bella" in the vulgate, and in the super-vulgate "Beller."

She was of that unpleasant age which in boys is designated "hobbledehoy," but hath no name in girlhood, when there is no bundle too large, no errand too small for her; when, if she have sisters, she wears their cast-off clothes without troubling to make them fit her, as, if they don't fall to pieces first, she will "grow into them;" and when she has a fierce struggle to convince her relatives that she is a young woman.

Bella had a dress which came but a little below her knees, notwithstanding a tuck had been let down, leaving a bright strip around, showing what had been the original color and design of that oft-washed, much-faded fabric. Various nails catching in her hoop, and pulling it into numerous irregular angles, had momentarily impeded her progress through the domains of pantry, kitchen, and cellar.

She never hurried over her household duties, but was as long over them as Miss Lucy Long herself. She especially loved to linger in the enchanted apartment assigned, pro tem., to Mr. John Howden—not that she affected him—oh no! She thought Pat, the butcher's boy, with fat streaky red cheeks and stumpy limbs far better-looking, and considered his figure particularly light and graceful, when on bitter cold days he waited somewhat impatiently for the front-door to open, and receive the matutinal joint; crying in the interim to keep warm by whistling nigger songs, blowing and snapping his fingers, and dancing an impromptu breakdown, which he varied by vigorously and rapidly embracing some invisible friend in the frosty air.

"Beller" loitered over Mr. Howden's room because he had such beautiful things on his toilette-table; nice strong hard-bristled brushes, which she tried on her frowzy head, after saturating them with his dear Parisian hair-oil.

She was pleased to finger the ivory-handled pen-knives and tweezers which lay spread in splendor before her dazzled vision; but most of all, she delighted to bedew her faded frock with the rare perfumes he kept in cut-glass bottles of Venetian delicacy. It was her hour for self-culture too, for having mastered print, Bella was athirst to "read writing;" and as Mr. Howden left all his little notes about the room, she had a good opportunity of improving her knowledge of chirography as illustrated by his numerous correspondents.

On the morning in question, however, whether what was "on his mind" had made him more cautious or not, certain it is that Mr. Howden had removed his letters and billet-doux.

This was a terrible disappointment to Bella, which was not mitigated until she took up the waste-paper basket to empty it. An idea struck her and she set it down, that is, the basket and herself down beside it, and began reading the torn scraps.

She had less difficulty in reading than in understanding the pieces as she tried to match them. She laid them out on his writing-desk and fitted them together like bits of mosaic, and took her time to decipher them, thus:

"MY DEAR ELLEN—can no—im—you will—got the blues—ply—yesterday came down—gly—my luck—Mortimer—I can—"

Not very intelligible this; but Bella did not particularly care for the sequence of what she read until she came across a good many fragments on which the same words were written, as if a letter of similar purport had been written, rewritten, and destroyed again. This piqued her curiosity, and after some difficulty and much patience she succeeded in fitting together an entire letter which ran thus:

"MY DEAR ELLEN—I am very sorry that—circumstances have arisen—ke it impos— to fulfill our engagement—regret that—so long in your way of—making some one else happy—can not marry you—impossible—ingly, JOHN HOWDEN—"

Bella was so intent on matching and spelling out the letter that she was not aware another was looking over her shoulder and reading too.

Mrs. Mortimer had come into the room to see that Bella was not idling, and had stolen on tip-toe to see what so engrossed her.

Mrs. Mortimer uttered a low groan, and Bella retreated in confusion.

A few moments before, and Mrs. Mortimer had been as blithe and light-hearted as that careless girl herself; and now—what did it all mean? She pondered over the letter, trying to solve its import.

Had John deserted some one for her? had he been engaged to marry another?

How could she solve this mystery she had stumbled on, which filled her with dreadful suspicions and jealousy? how be convinced of his perfidy? Who was the woman, where did she live, could she not see her, and get the truth from her, since John would, she thought, never tell her? That is, she would never know whether he was truthful or not; he had been deceitful, and that inspired her with distrust of all he might urge in extenuation.

But where find this "Ellen?" She ran her hand through the waste-paper basket—there was no envelope there.

Suddenly she swept the fragments of the fatal note off the blotting-book where Bella had so skillfully placed them, and held it before the glass. Yes, there was the address in characters too distinct to be doubted:

Miss Ellen Phillips,
No. 17 Waterton Street,
City.

Having got this clew she determined to follow it further, for any thing was better than such suspense and anxiety; so she seized her hat, and, careless of appearances, almost ran till she reached No. 17 Waterton Street.

Without giving herself time to think she rang the bell. The door was soon opened by a pretty, delicate-looking girl in a rusty, black alpaca dress.

"Is Miss Phillips in?" asked Mrs. Mortimer, sternly.

"I am Miss Phillips," she answered, in astonishment at the agitation of her unknown visitor.

"Can I speak with you alone a few moments?"

"If you don't mind going up stairs to my little room—yes."

It was indeed a little room, and for all the neatness and attempt at comfort it was almost squalid—a table, a chair, an iron bedstead, and a sewing-machine was nearly all the furniture it contained. There was an air of refinement about Ellen Phillips contrasting strangely with the poverty of her room. Two or three gayly-colored tarlatan dresses were thrown over the bedstead, showing Ellen to be a dress-maker.

She offered Mrs. Mortimer a chair, and they both sat. There was an awkward pause, the young, impetuous widow not knowing how to begin. She had made up her mind that she was the only injured person in the affair, as it never occurred to her that however wretched she was there might be another still more to be commiserated.

The evidences of hard, poorly recompensed toil spoke to the better feelings of her really kind, forgiving, and noble nature. Her anger melted at a nearer view of Ellen's pale face, which bore unmistakable traces of both penury and care.

At length Mrs. Mortimer spoke. "I believe you are acquainted with Mr. Howden, Miss Phillips?"

As if anticipating and dreading evil with his name, Ellen flushed and paled in painful alternation, and she hid her trembling hands under the folds of her rusty dress as she timorously replied,

"Yes, but he has not been to see me for a long time. I can't imagine why. I am afraid something has happened to him, or—"

"Or what?" asked Mrs. Mortimer, kindly observing her hesitation. "Come, tell me all about it. I am a friend of Mr. Howden's, and think you may safely confide all your troubles about him to me."

Ellen was a simple-minded, unsuspecting girl, and Mrs. Mortimer's friendly tones and kind manner immediately won her confidence; she had lived such a lonely life that she naturally longed to speak of her cares to one of her own sex; and therefore did not need much coaxing to continue her recital.

"I am afraid he is offended at something, or is in some new difficulty, or perhaps means to leave me altogether; if he should it would break my heart. We were to have been married some years ago, but my father failed in business and John went to the war. My father died soon afterward, and I was left to struggle for a livelihood. How lonely and desolate were those years without him!—but he wrote me such sweet letters all the time—see!" She rose and brought a packet of letters to the widow, who saw, as she glanced through them, expressions of endearment and allusions to their engagement—the same hand, the same style, almost the same words he had so often used to her! She pushed them away, and Ellen went on.

"I prayed for his safe return, during the long, solitary, friendless, unprotected years. I gloried in his bravery, and was sustained through all my tedious toil by the hope that after all the weary waiting I should be a soldier's wife. He came back, and for a short time seemed the same ardent lover as when he first pursued me with vows of everlasting love. Then, for no reason that I could see, his manner grew colder, and he deferred our marriage from time to time, saying he was too poor to marry. Then his visits became less frequent, and now it has been so long since I saw him that I'm afraid he will never come again."

"Have you ever suspected that he might be paying attention to some one else? Suppose he were to engage himself to another?"

"Impossible! My John could never be so base; he would not deceive me and desert me so cruelly. I know that's not the reason of his staying away. It's because he's too poor to marry just at present, and it frets him to see how unhappy it makes me. He could not marry another loving me as he does and has for years. No one would marry him knowing my story, or suspecting my solitary wretchedness in this dismal garret. Poor John! it grieves him so much to know he can not take me out of it, even after so many years of struggling for bread and waiting to make me his wife."

Ellen broke down, and sobbed piteously. Mrs. Mortimer was a feeling and generous woman. The sight of this friendless, trusting, unsuspecting girl moved her to forget her own sufferings and resolve on a noble deed. She took leave of Ellen with a cordial shake of the hand, assuring her that "it would be all right with John. She was going to prepare a pleasant surprise for him, and to keep up her spirits," actually trying to cheer the rival whom but a short time before she had burned to see. Once having seen her, animosity turned to pity and sympathy.

As she meditatively walked home she asked herself if she could now marry John Howden, knowing that his affections were given to another? Could she respect him after breaking his word to Ellen, and withholding all knowledge of a previous engagement from her? Could she believe his motives were any thing but mercenary? No, no; she would "give him a pleasant little surprise."

Old Weller cautioned all mankind to "beware of the widders."

By the time our widow reached her home she was in a very different mood from what she had been when she had left it that morning, and had her plan all nicely arranged.

Her manner was very nearly the same as ever to unsuspecting John Howden, to whom she said no word of her hasty visit to Ellen; at the same time he never took her hand again without her speedily withdrawing it, and when she sang "the old songs" she took care that the long raven mustache did not as of yore touch the red bloom of her rounded cheek. The wedding-day came. The guests assembled, and the bride entered with the bridesmaids, enveloped in a long white veil.

It was not until John Howden stood up to be married, and took a delicate hand within his own that he saw the face of his bride—Ellen Phillips!

Mrs. Mortimer whispered to him, "I know all. Make her reparation, and you make it to me!"

This was the pleasant little surprise she had so cleverly prepared for him. Ellen herself thought he knew she was to be the bride.

John's legal mind saw and accepted the situation at once. He felt that he had better make the best of it, and have no scandal or laughing at his expense; besides, he really loved Ellen, and thought that "Man proposes, but God disposes."

Thus he was actually united to Ellen when he expected to marry Mrs. Mortimer. Oh these widows! to get the better of sharp John Howden—a lawyer, too!

The widow never told Ellen of her engagement to John. She did not break her heart in giving him up, as she married not long after his pleasant little surprise.

Ellen never received the letter he sent her. In his agitation he had forgotten to put a stamp on it, and it never went; thus she remained in happy ignorance of his temporary defection. No one ever knew from Howden that he had married the wrong woman, though he confessed to himself that Mrs. Mortimer had done him a service, as, loving Ellen, he was happier than he could have been with a woman whose beauty and wealth dazzled him for a time, but for whom he cared nothing beyond.

He was most successful as soon as he applied himself to business, and felt that his professional career was more manly and noble than it could have been as a mere inactive dependent on a rich but unloved wife.

CORD AND CREESE; OR, THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

By THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XXXV.

BEATRICE'S RECOVERY.

It was not easy for the overtasked and over-worn powers of Beatrice to rally. Weeks passed before she opened her eyes to a recognition of the world around her. It was March when she sank down by the road-side. It was June when she began to recover from the shock of the terrible excitement through which she had passed.

Loving hearts sympathized with her, tender hands cared for her, vigilant eyes watched her, and all that love and care could do were unremittingly exerted for her benefit.

As Beatrice opened her eyes after her long unconsciousness she looked around in wonder, recognizing nothing. Then they rested in equal wonder upon one who stood by her bedside.

She was slender and fragile in form, with delicate features, whose fine lines seemed rather like ideal beauty than real life. The eyes were large, dark, lustrous, and filled with a wonderful but mournful beauty. Yet all the features, so exquisite in their loveliness, were transcended by the expression that dwelt upon them. It was pure, it was spiritual, it was holy. It was the face of a saint, such a face as appears to the rapt devotee when fasting has done its work, and the quickened imagination grasps at ideal forms till the dwellers in heaven seem to become visible.

In her confused mind Beatrice at first had a faint fancy that she was in another state of existence, and that the form before her was one of those pure intelligences who had been appointed to welcome her there. Perhaps there was some such thought visible upon her face, for the stranger came up to her noiselessly, and stooping down, kissed her.

"You are among friends," said she, in a low, sweet voice. "You have been sick long."

"Where am I?"

"Among loving friends," said the other, "far away from the place where you suffered."

Beatrice sighed. "I hoped that I had passed away forever," she murmured.

"Not yet, not yet," said the stranger, in a voice of tender yet mournful sweetness, which had in it an unfathomable depth of meaning. "We must wait on here, dear friend, till it be His will to call us."

"And who are you?" asked Beatrice, after a long and anxious look at the face of the speaker.

"My name is Edith Brandon," said the other, gently.

"Brandon!—Edith Brandon!" cried Beatrice, with a vehemence which contrasted strangely with the scarce-audible words with which she had just spoken.

The stranger smiled with the same melancholy sweetness which she had shown before.

"Yes," said she; "but do not agitate yourself, dearest."

"And have you nursed me?"

"Partly. But you are in the house of one who is like an angel in her loving care of you."

"But you—you?" persisted Beatrice; "you did not perish, then, as they said?"

"No," replied the stranger; "it was not permitted me."

"Thank God!" murmured Beatrice, fervently.

"He has one sorrow less. Did he save you?"

"He," said Edith, "of whom you speak does not know that I am alive, nor do I know where he is. Yet some day we will perhaps meet. And now you must not speak. You will agitate yourself too much. Here you have those who love you. For the one who brought you here is one who would lay down his life for yours, dearest—he is Paolo Langhetti."

"Langhetti!" said Beatrice. "Oh, God be thanked!"

"And she who has taken you to her heart and home is his sister."

"His sister Teresa, of whom he used to speak so lovingly? Ah! God is kinder to me than I feared. Ah, me! it is as though I had died and have awaked in heaven."

"But now I will speak no more, and you must speak no more, for you will only increase your agitation. Rest, and another time you can ask what you please."

Edith turned away and walked to one of the windows, where she looked out pensively upon the sea.

From this time Beatrice began to recover rapidly. Langhetti's sister seemed to her almost like an old friend since she had been associated with some of her most pleasant memories. An atmosphere of love was around her: the poor sufferer inhaled the pure and life-giving air, and strength came with every breath.

At length she was able to sit up, and then Langhetti saw her. He greeted her with all the ardent and impassioned warmth which was so striking a characteristic of his impulsive and affectionate nature. Then she saw Despard.

There was something about this man which filled her with indefinable emotions. The knowledge which she had of the mysterious fate of his father did not repel her from him. A wonderful and subtle sympathy seemed at once to arise between the two. The stern face of Despard assumed a softer and more genial expression when he saw her. His tone was gentle and affectionate, almost paternal.

What was the feeling that arose within her heart toward this man? With the one for her father who had inflicted on his father so terrible a fate, how did she dare to look him in the face or exchange words with him? Should she not rather shrink away as once she shrank from Brandon?

Yet she did not shrink. His presence brought a strange peace and calm over her soul. His influence was more potent over her than that of Langhetti. In this strange company he seemed to her to be the centre and the chief.

To Beatrice Edith was an impenetrable mystery. Her whole manner excited her deepest reverence and at the same time her strongest curiosity. The fact that she was his sister would of itself have won her heart; but there were other things about her which affected her strangely.

Edith moved among the others with a strange, far-off air, an air at once full of gentle affection, yet preoccupied. Her manner indicated love, yet the love of one who was far above them. She was like some grown person associating with young children whom he loved. "Her soul was like a star and dwelt apart."

Paolo seemed more like an equal; but Paolo himself approached equality only because he could understand her best. He alone could enter into communion with her. Beatrice noticed a profound and unalterable reverence in his manner toward Edith, which was like that which a son might pay a mother, yet more delicate and more chivalrous. All this, however, was beyond her comprehension.

She once questioned Mrs. Thornton, but received no satisfaction. Mrs. Thornton looked mysterious, but shook her head.

"Your brother treats her like a divinity."

"I suppose he thinks she is something more than mortal."

"Do you have that awe of her which I feel?"

"Yes; and so does every one. I feel toward her as though she belonged to another world. She takes no interest in this."

"She nursed me."

"Oh yes! Every act of love or kindness which she can perform she seeks out and does, but now as you grow better she falls back upon herself."

Surrounded by such friends as these Beatrice rapidly regained her strength. Weeks went on, and at length she began to move about, to take long rides and drives, and to stroll through the Park.

During these weeks Paolo made known to her his plans. She embraced them eagerly.

"You have a mission," said he. "It was not for nothing that your divine voice was given to you. I have written my opera under the most extraordinary circumstances. You know what it is. Never have I been able to decide how it should be represented. I have prayed for a Voice. At my time of need you were thrown in my way. My Bice, God has sent you. Let us labor together."

Beatrice grasped eagerly at this idea. To be a singer, to interpret the thoughts of Langhetti, seemed delightful to her. She would then be dependent on no friend. She would be her own mistress. She would not be forced to lead a life of idleness, with her heart preying upon itself. Music would come to her aid. It would be at once the purpose, the employment, and the delight of her life. If there was one thing to her which could alleviate sorrow and grief it was the exultant joy which was created within her by the Divine Art—that Art which alone is common to earth and heaven. And for Beatrice there was this joy, that she had one of those natures which was so sensitive to music that under its power heaven itself appeared to open before her.

All these were lovers of music, and therefore had delights to which common mortals are strangers. To the soul which is endowed with the capacity for understanding the delights of tone there are joys peculiar, at once pure and enduring, which nothing else that this world gives can equal.

Langhetti was the high-priest of this charmed circle. Edith was the presiding or inspiring divinity. Beatrice was the medium of utterance—the Voice that brought down heaven to earth.

Mrs. Thornton and Despard stood apart, the recipients of the sublime effects and holy emotions which the others wrought out within them.

Edith was like the soul.

Langhetti like the mind.

Beatrice resembled the material element by which the spiritual is communicated to man. Hers was the Voice which spoke.

Langhetti thought that they as a trio of powers formed a means of communicating new revelations to man. It was natural indeed that he in his high and generous enthusiasm should have some such thoughts as these, and should look forward with delight to the time when his work should first be performed. Edith, who lived and moved in an atmosphere beyond human feeling, was above the level of his enthusiasm; but Beatrice caught it all, and in her own generous and susceptible nature this purpose of Langhetti produced the most powerful effects.

In the church where Mrs. Thornton and Despard had so often met there was now a new performance. Here Langhetti played, Beatrice sang, Edith smiled as she heard the expression of heavenly ideas, and Despard and Mrs. Thornton found themselves borne away from all common thoughts by the power of that sublime rehearsal.

As time passed and Beatrice grew stronger Langhetti became more impatient about his opera. The voice of Beatrice, always marvelous, had not suffered during her sickness. Nay, if any thing, it had grown better; her soul had gained new susceptibilities since Langhetti last saw her, and since she could understand more and feel more, her expression itself had become more subtle and refined. So that Voice which Langhetti had always called divine had put forth new powers, and he, if he believed himself the High-Priest and Beatrice the Pythia, saw that her inspiration had grown more delicate and more profound.

"We will not set up a new Delphi," said he. "Our revelations are not new. We but give fresh and extraordinary emphasis to old and eternal truths."

In preparing for the great work before them it was necessary to get a name for Beatrice. Her own name was doubly abhorrent—first, from her own life-long hate of it, which later circumstances had intensified; and, secondly, from the damping effect which such a name would have on the fortune of any artiste. Langhetti wished her to take his name, but Despard showed an extraordinary pertinacity on this point.

"No," said he, "I am personally concerned in this. I adopted her. She is my sister. Her name is Despard. If she takes any other name I shall consider it as an intolerable slight."

He expressed himself so strongly that Beatrice could not refuse. Formerly she would have considered that it was infamous for her to take that noble name; but now this idea had become weak, and it was with a strange exultation that she yielded to the solicitations of Despard.

Langhetti himself yielded at once. His face bore an expression of delight which seemed inexplicable to Beatrice. She asked him why he felt such pleasure. Was not an Italian name better for a singer? Despard was an English name, and, though aristocratic, was not one which a great singer might have.

"I am thinking of other things, my Bicina," said Langhetti, who had never given up his old, fond, fraternal manner toward her. "It has no connection with art. I do not consider the mere effect of the name for one moment."

"What is it, then, that you do consider?"

"Other things."

"What other things?"

"Not connected with Art," continued Langhetti, evasively. "I will tell you some day when the time comes."

"Now you are exciting my curiosity," said Beatrice, in a low and earnest tone. "You do not know what thoughts you excite within me. Either you ought not to excite such ideas, or if you do, it is your duty to satisfy them."

"It is not time yet."

"What do you mean by that?"

"That is a secret."

"Of course; you make it one; but if it is one connected with me, then surely I ought to know."

"It is not time yet for you to know."

"When will it be time?"

"I can not tell."

"And you will therefore keep it a secret forever?"

"I hope, my Bicina, that the time will come before long."

"Yet why do you wait, if you know or even suspect any thing in which I am concerned?"

"I wish to spare you."

"That is not necessary. Am I so weak that I can not bear to hear any thing which you may have to tell? You forget what a life I have had for two years. Such a life might well prepare me for any thing."

"If it were merely something which might create sorrow I would tell it. I believe that you have a self-reliant nature, which has grown stronger through affliction. But that which I have to tell is different. It is of such a character that it would of necessity destroy any peace of mind which you have, and fill you with hopes and feelings that could never be satisfied."

"Yet even that I could bear. Do you not see that by your very vagueness you are exciting my thoughts and hopes? You do not know what I know."

"What do you know?" asked Langhetti, eagerly.

Beatrice hesitated. No; she could not tell. That would be to tell all the holiest secrets of her heart. For she must then tell about Brandon, and the African island, and the manuscript which he carried and which had been taken from his bosom. Of this she dared not speak.

She was silent.

"You can not know any thing," said Langhetti. "You may suspect much. I only have suspicions. Yet it would not be wise to communicate these to you, since they would prove idle and without result."

So the conversation ended, and Langhetti still maintained his secret, though Beatrice hoped to find it out.

At length she was sufficiently recovered to be able to begin the work to which Langhetti wished to lead her. It was August, and Langhetti was impatient to be gone. So when August began he made preparations to depart, and in a few days they were in London. Edith was left with Mrs. Thornton. Beatrice had an attendant who went with her, half chaperon half lady's maid.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE AFFAIRS OF SMITHERS & CO.

FOR more than a year the vast operations of Smithers & Co. had astonished business circles in London. Formerly they had been considered as an eminently respectable house, and as doing a safe business; but of late all this had been changed in so sudden and wonderful a manner that no one could account for it. Leaving aside their old, cautious policy they undertook without hesitation the largest enterprises. Foreign railroads, national loans, vast joint-stock companies—these were the things that now occupied Smithers & Co. The Barings themselves were outtrived, and Smithers & Co. reached the acme of their sudden glory on one occasion, when they took the new Spanish loan out of the grasp of even the Rothschilds themselves.

How to account for it became the problem. For, allowing the largest possible success in their former business to Smithers & Co., that business had never been of sufficient dimensions to allow of this. Some said that a rich Indian had become a sleeping partner, others declared that the real Smithers was no more to be seen, and that the business was managed by strangers who had bought them out and retained their name. Others again said that Smithers & Co. had made large amounts in California mining speculations. At length the general belief was, that some individuals who had made millions of money in California had bought out Smithers & Co., and were now doing business under their name.

As to their soundness there was no question. Their operations were such as demanded, first of all, ready money in unlimited quantities. This they were always able to command. Between them and the Bank of England there seemed to be the most perfect understanding and the most enviable confidence. The Rothschilds spoke of them with infinite respect. People began to look upon them as the leading house in Europe. The sudden apparition of this tremendous power in the commercial world threw that world into a state of consternation which finally ended in wondering awe.

But Smithers & Co. continued calmly, yet successfully, their great enterprises. The Russian loan of fifteen millions was negotiated by them. They took twenty millions of the French loan, five millions of the Austrian, and two and a half of the Turkish. They took nearly all the stock of the Lyons and Marseilles Railroad. They owned a large portion of the stock of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company. They had ten millions of East India stock. California alone, which was now dazzling the world, could account to the common mind for such enormous wealth.

The strangest thing was that Smithers himself was never seen. The business was done by his subordinates. There was a young man who represented the house in public, and who called himself Henderson. He was a person of distinguished aspect, yet of reserved and somewhat melancholy manner. No one pretended to be in his confidence. No one pretended to know whether he was clerk or partner. As he was the only representative of Smithers & Co., he was treated with marked respect wherever he appeared.

The young man, whether partner or clerk, had evidently the supreme control of affairs. He swayed in his own hands the thunder-bolts of his Olympian power. Nothing daunted him. The grandeur of his enterprises dazzled the public mind. His calm antagonism to the great houses of London filled them with surprise. A new power had seized a high place in the commercial world, and the old gods—the Rothschilds, the Barings, and others—looked aghast. At first they tried to despise this interloper; at length they found him at least as strong as themselves, and began to fancy that he might be stronger. A few experiments soon taught them that there was no weakness there. On one occasion the Rothschilds, true to their ordinary selfish policy, made a desperate attempt to crush the new house which dared to enter into rivalry with them. Widespread plans were arranged in such a way that large demands were made upon them on one day. The amount was nearly two millions. Smithers & Co. showed not the smallest hesitation. Henderson, their representative, did not even take the trouble to confer with the Bank of England. He sent his orders to the Bank. The money was furnished. It was the Directors of the Bank of England who looked aghast at this struggle between Rothschild and Smithers & Co. The gold in the Bank vaults sank low, and the next day the rates of discount were raised. All London felt the result of that struggle.

Smithers & Co. waited for a few months, and then suddenly retorted with terrific force. The obligations of the Rothschilds were obtained from all quarters—some which were due were held over and not presented till the appointed day. Obligations in many forms—in all the forms of indebtedness that may arise in a vast business—all these had been collected from various quarters with untiring industry and extraordinary outlay of care and money. At last in one day they were all poured upon the Rothschilds. Nearly four millions of money were required to meet that demand.

The great house of Rothschild reeled under the blow. Smithers & Co. were the ones who administered it. James Rothschild had a private interview with the Directors of the Bank of England. There was a sudden and enormous sale of securities that day on 'Change. In selling out such large amounts the loss was enormous. It was difficult to find purchasers, but Smithers & Co. stepped forward and bought nearly all that was offered. The Rothschilds saved themselves, of course, but at a terrible loss, which became the profits of Smithers & Co.

The Rothschilds retreated from the conflict utterly routed, and glad to escape disaster of a worse kind. Smithers & Co. came forth victorious. They had beaten the Rothschilds at their own game, and had made at least half a million. All London rang with the story. It was a bitter humiliation for that proud Jewish house which for years had never met with a rival. Yet there was no help, nor was there the slightest chance of revenge. They were forced to swallow the result as best they could, and to try to regain what they had lost.

After this the pale and melancholy face of Henderson excited a deeper interest. This was the man who had beaten the Rothschilds—the strongest capitalist in the world. In his financial operations he continued as calm, as grave, and as immovable as ever. He would risk millions without moving a muscle of his countenance. Yet so sagacious was he, so wide-spread were his agencies, so accurate was his secret information, that his plans scarcely ever failed. His capital was so vast that it often gave him control of the market. Coming into the field untrammelled as the older houses were, he had a larger control of money than any of them, and far greater freedom of action.

After a time the Rothschilds, the Barings, and other great bankers, began to learn that Smithers & Co. had vast funds every where, in all the capitals of Europe, and in America. Even in the West Indies their operations were extensive. Their old Australian agency was enlarged, and a new banking-house founded by them in Calcutta began to act on the same vast scale as the leading house at London. Smithers & Co. also continued to carry on a policy which was hostile to those older bankers. The Rothschilds in particular felt this, and were in perpetual dread of a renewal of that tremendous assault under which they had once nearly gone down. They became timid, and were compelled to arrange their business so as to guard against this possibility. This, of course, checked their operations, and widened and enlarged the field of action for their rivals.

No one knew any thing whatever about Henderson. None of the clerks could tell any thing concerning him. They were all new hands. None of them had ever seen Smithers. They all believed that Henderson was the junior partner, and that the senior spent his time abroad. From this it began to be believed that Smithers staid in California digging gold, which he diligently remitted to the London house.

At length the clerks began to speak mysteriously of a man who came from time to time to the office, and whose whole manner showed him to possess authority there. The treatment which he received from Henderson—at once cordial and affectionate—showed them to be most intimate and friendly; and from words which were dropped they all thought him to be the senior partner. Yet he appeared to be very little older than Henderson, if as old, and no one even knew his name. If any thing could add to the interest with which the house of Smithers & Co. was regarded it was this impenetrable mystery, which baffled not merely outsiders but even the clerks themselves.

Shortly after the departure of Langhetti and Beatrice from Holby two men were seated in the inner parlor of the office of Smithers & Co. One was the man known as Henderson, the other the mysterious senior partner.

They had just come in and letters were lying on the table.

"You've got a large number this morning, Frank?" said the senior partner.

"Yes," said Frank, turning them over; "and here, Louis, is one for you." He took out a letter from the pile and handed it to Louis. "It's from your Brandon Hall correspondent," he added.

Louis sat down and opened it. The letter was as follows:

"August 15, 1849.

"DEAR SIR,—I have had nothing in particular to write since the flight of Miss Potts, except to tell you what they were doing. I have already informed you that they kept three spies at Holby to watch her. One of these returned, as I told you in my last letter, with the information that she had gone to London with a party named Langhetti. Ever since then they have been talking it over, and have come to the conclusion to get a detective, and keep him busy watching her with the idea of getting her back, I think. I hope to God they will not get her back. If you take any interest in her, Sir, as you appear to, I hope you will use your powerful arm to save her. It will be terrible if she has to come back here. She will die, I know. Hoping soon to have something more to communicate,

"I remain, yours respectfully,

"E. L.

"Mr. SMITHERS, Sen., London."

Louis read this letter over several times and fell into deep thought.

Frank went on reading his letters, looking up from time to time. At last he put down the last one.

"Louis!" said he.

Louis looked up.

"You came so late last night that I haven't

"AS BEATRICE OPENED HER EYES AFTER HER LONG UNCONSCIOUSNESS SHE LOOKED AROUND IN WONDER."—[SEE CHAPTER XXXV.]

had a chance to speak about any thing yet. I want to tell you something very important."

"Well!"

"Langhetti is alive."

"I know it."

"You knew it! When? Why did you not tell me?"

"I didn't want to tell any thing that might distract you from your purpose."

"I am not a child, Louis! After my victory over Rothschild I ought to be worthy of your confidence."

"That's not the point, Frank," said Louis; "but I know your affection for the man, and I thought you would give up all to find him."

"Well!"

"Well. I thought it would be better to let nothing interpose now between us and our purpose. No," he continued, with a stern tone, "no, no one however dear, however loved, and therefore I said nothing about Langhetti. I thought that your generous heart would only be distressed. You would feel like giving up every thing to find him out and see him, and, therefore, I did not wish you even to know it. Yet I have kept an account of his movements, and know where he is now."

"He is here in London," said Frank, with deep emotion.

"Yes, thank God!" said Louis. "You will see him, and we all will be able to meet some day."

"But," asked Frank, "do you not think Langhetti is a man to be trusted?"

"That is not the point," replied Louis. "I believe Langhetti is one of the noblest men that ever lived. It must be so from what I have heard. All my life I will cherish his name and try to assist him in every possible way. I believe also that if we requested it he might perhaps keep our secret. But that is not the point, Frank. This is the way I look at it: We are dead. Our deaths have been recorded. Louis Brandon and Frank Brandon have perished. I am Wheeler, or Smithers, or Forsyth, or any body else; you are Henderson. We keep our secret because we have a purpose before us. Our father calls us from his tomb to its accomplishment. Our mother summons us. Our sweet sister Edith, from her grave of horror unutterable, calls us. All personal feeling must stand aside, Frank—yours and mine—whatever they be, till we have done our duty."

"You are right, Louis," said Frank, sternly.

"Langhetti is in London," continued Louis. "You will not see him, but you can show your gratitude, and so can I. He is going to hire an opera-house to bring out an opera; I saw that in the papers. It is a thing full of risk, but he perhaps does not think of that. Let us enable him to gain the desire of his heart. Let us fill the house for him. You can send your agents to furnish tickets to people who may make the audience; or you can send around those who can praise him sufficiently. I don't know what his opera may be worth. I know, however, from what I have learned, that he has musical genius; and I think if we give him a good start he will succeed. That is the way to show your gratitude, Frank."

"I'll arrange all that!" said Frank. "The house shall be crowded. I'll send an agent to him—I can easily find out where he is, I suppose—and make him an offer of Covent Garden theatre on his own terms. Yes, Langhetti shall have a fair chance. I'll arrange a plan to enforce success."

"Do so, and you will keep him permanently in London till the time comes when we can arise from the dead."

They were silent for a long time. Louis had thoughts of his own, excited by the letter which he had received, and these thoughts he did not care to utter. One thing was a secret even from Frank.

And what could he do? That Beatrice had fallen among friends he well knew. He had found this out when, after receiving a letter from Philips about her flight, he had hurried there and learned the result. Then he had himself gone to Holby, and found that she was at Mrs. Thornton's. He had watched till she had recovered. He had seen her as she took a drive in Thornton's carriage. He had left an agent there to write him about her when he left.

What was he to do now? He read the letter over again. He paused at that sentence: "They have been talking it over, and have come to the conclusion to get a detective, and keep him busy watching her with the idea of getting her back."

What was the nature of this danger? Beatrice was of age. She was with Langhetti. She was her own mistress. Could there be any danger of her being taken back against her will? The villains at Brandon Hall were sufficiently unscrupulous, but would they dare to commit any violence? and if they did, would not Langhetti's protection save her?

Such were his thoughts. Yet, on the other hand, he considered the fact that she was inexperienced, and might have peculiar ideas about a father's authority. If Potts came himself, demanding her return, perhaps, out of a mistaken sense of filial duty, she might go with him. Or, even if she was unwilling to do so, she might yield to coercion, and not feel justified in resisting. The possibility of this filled him with horror. The idea of her being taken back to live under the power of those miscreants from whom she had escaped was intolerable. Yet he knew not what to do.

Between him and her there was a gulf unfathomable, impassable. She was one of that accursed brood which he was seeking to exterminate. He would spare her if possible; he would gladly lay down his life to save her from one moment's misery; but if she stood in the way of his vengeance, could he—dared he stay that vengeance? For that he would sacrifice life itself! Would he refuse to sacrifice even her if she were more dear than life itself?

Yet here was a case in which she was no longer connected with, but striving to sever herself from them. She was flying from that accursed father of hers. Would he stand idly by, and see her in danger? That were impossible. All along, ever since his return to England, he had watched over her, unseen himself and unsuspected by her, and had followed her footsteps when she fled. To desert her now was impossible. The only question with him was—how to watch her or guard her.

One thing gave him comfort, and that was the guardianship of Langhetti. This he thought was sufficient to insure her safety. For surely Langhetti would know the character of her enemies as well as Beatrice herself, and so guard her as to insure her safety from any attempt of theirs. He therefore placed his chief reliance on Langhetti, and determined merely to secure some one who would watch over her, and let him know from day to day how she fared. Had he thought it necessary he would have sent a band of men to watch and guard her by day and night; but this idea never entered his mind for the simple reason that he did not think the danger was pressing. England was after all a country of law, and even a father could not carry off his daughter against her will when she was of age. So he comforted himself.

"Well," said he, at last, rousing himself from his abstraction, "how is Potts now?"

"Deeper than ever," answered Frank, quietly.

"The Brandon Bank—"

"The Brandon Bank has been going at a rate that would have foundered any other concern long ago. There's not a man that I sent there who has not been welcomed and obtained all that he wanted. Most of the money that they advanced has been to men that I sent. They drew on us for the money and sent us various securities of their own, holding the securities of these applicants. It is simply bewildering to think how easily that scoundrel fell into the snare."

"When a man has made a fortune easily he gets rid of it easily," said Louis, laconically.

"Potts thinks that all his applicants are leading men of the county. I take good care that they go there as baronets at least. Some are lords. He is overpowered in the presence of these lords, and gives them what they ask on their own terms. In his letters he has made some attempts at an expression of gratitude for our great liberality. This I enjoyed somewhat. The villain is not a difficult one to manage, at least in the financial way. I leave the dénouement to you, Louis."

"The dénouement must not be long delayed now."

"Well, for that matter things are so arranged that we may have 'the beginning of the end' as soon as you choose."

"What are the debts of the Brandon Bank to us now?"

"Five hundred and fifteen thousand one hundred and fifty pounds," said Frank.

"Five hundred thousand—very good," returned Louis, thoughtfully. "And how is the sum secured?"

"Chiefly by acknowledgments from the bank with the indorsement of John Potts, President."

"What are the other liabilities?"

"He has implored me to purchase for him or sell him some California stock. I have reluctantly consented to do so," continued Frank, with a sardonic smile, "entirely through the request of my senior, and he has taken a hundred shares at a thousand pounds each."

"One hundred thousand pounds," said Louis.

"I consented to take his notes," continued Frank, "purely out of regard to the recommendations of my senior."

"Any thing else?" asked Louis.

"He urged me to recommend him to a good broker who might purchase stock for him in reliable companies. I created a broker and recommended him. He asked me also confidentially to tell him which stocks were best, so I kindly advised him to purchase the Mexican and the Guatemala loan. I also recommended the Venezuela bonds. I threw all these into the market, and by dextrous manipulation raised the price to 3 per cent. premium. He paid £103 for every £100. When he wants to sell out, as he may one day wish to do, he will be lucky if he gets £35 per cent."

"How much did he buy?"

"Mexican loan, fifty thousand; Guatemala, fifty thousand; and Venezuela bonds, fifty thousand."

"He is quite lavish."

"Oh, quite. That makes it so pleasant to do business with him."

"Did you advance the money for this?"

"He did not ask it. He raised the money somehow, perhaps from our old advances, and bought them from the broker. The broker was of course myself. The beauty of all this is, that I send applicants for money, who give their notes; he gets money from me and gives his notes to me, and then advances the money to these applicants, who bring it back to me. It's odd, isn't it?"

Louis smiled.

"Has he no bona fide debtors in his own country?"

"Oh yes, plenty of them; but more than half of his advances have been made to my men."

"Did you hint any thing about issuing notes?"

"Oh yes, and the bait took wonderfully. He made his bank a bank of issue at once, and sent out a hundred and fifty thousand pounds in notes. I think it was in this way that he got the money for all that American stock. At any rate, it helped him. As he has only a small supply of gold in his vaults, you may very readily conjecture his peculiar position."

Louis was silent for a time.

"You have managed admirably, Frank," said he at last.

"Oh," rejoined Frank, "Potts is very small game, financially. There is no skill needed in playing with him. He is such a clumsy bungler that he does whatever one wishes. There is not even excitement. Whatever I tell him to do he does. Now if I were anxious to crush the Rothschilds, it would be very different. There would then be a chance for skill."

"You have had the chance."

"I did not wish to ruin them," said Frank.

"Too many innocent people would have suffered. I only wished to alarm them. I rather think, from what I hear, that they were a little disturbed on that day when they had to pay four millions. Yet I could have crushed them if I had chosen, and I managed things so as to let them see this."

"How?"

"I controlled other engagements of theirs, and on the same day I magnanimously wrote them a letter, saying that I would not press for payment, as their notes were as good to me as money. Had I pressed they would have gone down. Nothing could have saved them. But I did not wish that. The fact is they have locked up their means very much, and have been rather careless of late. They have learned a lesson now."

Louis relapsed into his reflections, and Frank began to answer his letters.

"LANGHETTI IS ALIVE."

OLD JACK FROST.

OLD King Jack Frost, in his palace of ice,
Sat blowing his fingers old;
He cough'd and he sneezed once or twice,
And said he, "It is rather cold."
"I've half a good mind to have a run—
For it's dreary and cheerless here—
A little way southward, and look at the sun,
For I've not been there for a year."
Then up he rose from his sparry throne,
And a hale old fellow is he:
He called for his skates, and he buckled them on,
And he skated the frozen sea.
[Away, away, on his lonely track,
He sped through the long, long night;
The polar star shone full on his back,
And so did the northern light.
Away, away, still onward he hies,
Watching for break of day,
And he saw the sun in the morning rise,
But he laugh'd at his feeble ray.
He met a waggoner on his way,
And he tweak'd him by the nose;
He caught some boys and girls at play,
And he bit their fingers and toes.
He trampled all over the garden beds,
And cut the kidney beans,
Made dahlias and hollyhocks hang their heads,
And nipp'd the potatoes and greens.
The pansies that grew by the garden gate
He crush'd almost to death;
He found a young rose that had lingered too late,
And wither'd it with his breath.
He tempted the heedless on to the lakes,
When the treacherous ice was thin;
"It cracks—it bears, it bends—it breaks!"
And he laugh'd as they tumbled in.
He peer'd into every fissure and hole,
Each cranny he crawled through;
Then slyly down into the cellar he stole,
And crack'd a bottle or two.
He seal'd up the pump and the water pot,
And fetter'd the running stream;
Then in at the dairy window he got,
And feasted on icy cream.
He crept in the kitchen and parlor too,
And gave us colds in our heads;
And 'twas almost as much as we could do
To keep him out of our beds.
He climb'd up the trees, and stript them bare,
And flung all their leaves below;
Then shook the powder out of his hair,
And cover'd the ground with snow.
He polish'd the pavement under our feet,
As some found out to their cost;
And when an old woman tripp'd up in the street,
"Ha! ha!" said old Jack Frost.
But soon he became a troublesome guest,
And we shrank from his antics wild;
When lo! a young Zephyr came out of the west,
And bid him to draw it mild.
In her presence the old fellow stood subdued;
As soon as her breath he felt;
His bite was less sharp, and his pinch less rude,
For his heart began to melt.
Through fields and forests she wander'd forth,
And lighten'd each snow-bent spray;
So Jack turn'd again to his home in the north,
And weeping, he went away.

MAY AND HER STOCKING.

WHEN little May was five years old her mother gave her, for a birthday present, four bright knitting-needles and a ball of worsted, and began her first stocking for her. Little May watched her mother knitting, and thought it looked very easy, pleasant work. Presently her father came in and called her mother, who at once laid down the stocking and left the room. May called after her as she was going through the door, to know if she might go on with the stocking. Her mother said "Yes," without listening to her; and May took up the stocking, went out of doors, sat down under a tree, and began to knit. The first row, which her mother had begun, went smoothly enough, but when she had finished it she did not know what to do next, and looked about for some one to help her.

"The Spider would be sure to know, for he does much more difficult things than this," said she; so she went to look for a spider. She soon found one, spinning a beautiful round web on a rose-bush.

"Oh! Spider," said she, "will you show me how to knit my stocking?"

"Let me look at it," said the Spider; so May showed it him.

"You see I have done this row," said she, "mother did the rest; and now I don't know how to go on, or where to put my thread."

"Thread! I see no thread," said the Spider; "and what are those great pokers for?"

"These are knitting-needles, not pokers," said May; "pokers are much bigger; here is my thread," and she held it straight before the Spider's eyes.

"Do you call that thing a thread?" said the Spider, disdainfully; "I call it a rope; don't bring such great ugly things near me. Ah! take care" (as May turned her stocking round), "you will spoil my web if you touch it with your pokers. I am too busy to talk to you, so good-day. When you learn to work with proper materials perhaps I may help you," and the Spider began to spin again.

"You rude creature!" said May, "my thread is not a rope, and my needles are not pokers: you know they aren't, and you only call them so because you don't know how to knit."

"He! he!" laughed the Spider.

So May walked on with her stocking in her hand, and presently sat down by a brook that flowed through the copse. A little Mouse peeped at her with his bright eyes. "What are you doing?" said May.

"Making a nest," said the Mouse.

"Do you know how to knit?" said May.

"No," said the Mouse; "but what is this?" running up to May's knitting, which she had laid down by her side. "Oh! this is just what I want," and he showed his sharp teeth.

"Oh, don't!" cried May; "you will spoil my stocking, and it is not good to eat."

"Only a little bit," pleaded the Mouse. "I have been looking all day for something soft for my nest, and I can't find any thing."

"That is very sad," said May; "I will unwind my ball of worsted, and give you a little bit off the other end;" and she began to unwind it.

"Ah!" quoth a Magpie, flying down from an elm-tree, "if you are going to do that, you may as well give me some too, for I am building my nest in yonder tree."

"You shall have some, if you will have patience," said May, gravely. "But if you touch my wool before it is unwound you sha'n't have a bit."

"Very well," said the Mouse; "then I will come back when you are ready," and he ran into a hole.

But the Magpie, who was inclined for a gossip, seated herself on a log of wood near, and every now and then May felt a sharp pull at her worsted, but when she looked up to see who was the offender, the Magpie was always quietly seated in the same place.

"What can you do with such a quantity of wool?" said the Magpie, at last. "You might build twenty nests with it, though I dare say you want rather a big one."

"I am not going to build a nest," said May, "but to knit some stockings, and mother says they take a great deal of wool."

"What are stockings?" asked the Magpie.

"Things to put on one's feet to keep them warm," replied May. "Don't your feet get very cold without any?"

"No," said the Magpie; "not this warm weather. Sometimes the frost is rather sharp at night, and then I tuck one of my feet under my feathers like this"—(and she tucked up one of her legs). "Why don't you do so too? It would save you a great deal of trouble."

"I don't think it would be very comfortable," said May.

"Oh yes, it is," said the Magpie; "just try. Look here! one leg at a time, and when that is warm tuck up the other instead."

"But," said May, balancing herself on one leg, "I feel as if I should tumble down."

"No, you won't," said the Magpie. "If you practice every day, you will soon get used to it."

At that moment something gave May's thread such a violent jerk that the ball flew out of her hand. She stooped to pick it up, but it rolled away. She ran after it to catch it, and found that the Magpie was at the other end of it, and was flying away with the stocking in her mouth.

"Stop! stop!" cried May; "you have got my stocking."

But the Magpie only flew faster, and poor May sat down and cried.

"What is the matter?" said the Mouse, peeping out of his hole.

"Oh!" sobbed May, "the Magpie has stolen my stocking, and all my needles but this one, which I had in my hand; and my worsted has rolled away."

"Why," said the Mouse, "I thought you had unwound it."

"I was just going to," said May; "but I was listening to the Magpie."

"Ah!" said the Mouse, "those chatter-boxes are not to be trusted. Now let us look for your worsted."

So they hunted about for a long time; but even such bright eyes as May's and the little Mouse's could not find it; and as it began to grow dark poor May went sadly home.

The Magpie meanwhile flew away with her booty until she considered herself quite safe from pursuit, and she sat down on a tree to rest.

"How my feet are entangled in this worsted!" said she, "and how uncomfortable it is! I am glad I am not obliged to wear it always like little May. No wonder she can't fly, poor thing! I have lost one of the bright sticks, and I dare not go back for it; any how, I will put these three away among the family treasures. I hope no other Magpie will find them—some of them are such thieves, nothing they see is safe from them, especially if it is bright."

So saying, she carefully deposited the needles in a hole in a tree, which served her for a store-house, and then set to work to disentangle her feet. But the worsted broke, and one end of it remained twisted in a tight knot round her left leg, and gave her considerable pain, and as she flew slowly homeward she pondered in her own mind whether the possession of two bright knitting-needles fully counterbalanced the pain in her left leg, and what the poor human beings did who were always obliged to have wool twisted round their feet if they wished to be warm.

The next day May went again to look for her ball of worsted; she could see nothing of her friend the Mouse, and it was dull work looking by herself, so presently she sat down by a tree, and before long she heard chit-chat above her; it sounded like the Magpie's voice, but much less merry than usual. However, she was not mistaken, for in a few minutes down flew the Magpie herself, and perched on a little twig opposite May, holding up one leg.

"Good-morning," said the Magpie; "how do you feel, my dear, this fine morning?"

"How do I feel?" said May, indignantly. "Where are my needles and my worsted, you unkind, ungrateful bird?"

"Gently, gently," said the Magpie; "I have no doubt they are quite safe; and now, my dear, I want you to do me a little service. I have somehow got something twisted round my leg, which gives me great pain, and I want you to undo it for me. I could not get a wink of sleep all last night, and this morning my leg is so swollen I can hardly move it."

May did not like to be unkind, so she bent down to examine the Magpie's leg, but started up again.

"You have got some of my worsted twisted round it; it was very wicked of you to take it."

"Why," said the Magpie, "you promised to give me some."

"Yes," said May, "I was just going to give you some, but you took it all, and now I can't knit father's stockings;" and she began to cry.

"Don't cry," said the Magpie; "you see I waited a long time, and you only sat with your mouth open, and had hardly begun to unwind your worsted when I took it."

"That was because you were talking," said May.

"Ah!" said the Magpie, "you should not listen to people who talk, when you have something better to do; you ought to be much obliged to me for teaching you such a good lesson. And now, could you not begin to undo the string round my leg? If you only knew how it hurts me!"

So May set to work with her little fingers; but the knot was so tight that she could not undo it, and only hurt the poor Magpie more. At last she remembered a very tiny pair of scissors which her aunt had given her, so she said, "Wait a moment while I fetch my scissors;" and off she ran, and soon came back with a small pair of very bright scissors in her hand.

Very gently she cut first one thread then another, while the Magpie stood very patiently, looking enviously at the bright scissors May was working with.

"Thank you! thank you!" said the Magpie, when at last she felt her leg free. "Now I feel like a different creature, though my leg is still rather sore."

"Will you not tell me where my wool and needles are?" asked May.

"I really know nothing about your ball of wool," said the Magpie. "There is this piece of worsted which has just come off my leg, which you are quite welcome to; and there was a good deal hanging to the trees last night, but most of that was collected for nests early this morning. I should have liked some myself, but I felt too ill to move."

"But don't you know where my needles are?" asked poor May, mournfully.

"Well," said the Magpie, "after—but—certainly—one good turn deserves another, and I might have died but for you." So off she flew, and disappeared among the trees.

"She might have said 'Thank you!'" thought May.

But presently the Magpie returned, carrying in her beak something long and bright, which she laid at May's feet.

"Oh, my knitting-needle!" cried May.

"There," said the Magpie; "good-by. I feel as if I could eat my breakfast now."

"Oh!" cried May, "won't you bring back the other two needles first? If you will, and if I can get some worsted, I will knit you some stockings when I have finished father's."

"No, thank you," said the Magpie, "I have had quite enough of stockings. I am sorry to disappoint you at the same time, particularly as you have been so good-natured; but remember that I have had none of the wool you promised me, so it is but fair we should share the needles. Good-by, my dear! I really must build my nest and get my breakfast, for I declare I am getting ravenous. By-by! I hope we shall meet again!" "I don't ever want to see a Magpie again," said May, emphatically, as she flew off; but the Magpie either did not hear or did not care, and May went home sorrowfully, having only recovered one needle out of the three that had been stolen.

The next morning Mrs. Mag went to her storehouse to inspect her remaining treasures, but when she had kicked away the dry leaves which covered the collection, to her horror and surprise she found that her beautiful bright sticks were gone, and that in their place were sticks of the same size, but of a dark brown color.

"This is some trick of my mischievous cousins the Jackdaws," cried she. "But to think that I should have wasted my time and had that dreadful stuff round my foot, and yet get nothing at the end but these ugly sticks!" and the Magpie kicked them indignantly out of her storehouse.

In course of time May got another set of needles and fresh worsted, and soon learned to knit her father's stockings. She never saw either the Magpie or the Mouse again, or heard any thing more about her lost needles and worsted, though all through that spring and summer she inquired anxiously about them of every Magpie and Mouse she met; but she drew two useful conclusions from her adventure: namely, that Magpies and chatters in general are to be listened to with caution, and that it is generally better to fold up one's work neatly, and put it away before beginning to practice standing on one leg, or any other accomplishment, however useful or desirable.

FROM AN IMPECUNIOUS YOUNG LADY.

MY DEAR BAZAR,—When people are impecunious I have always heard that they write to the papers for information and assistance. I don't mean under the head of wants exactly, for I am not after a situation. My education for housework has been too diffuse, and my talents for teaching were too sorely tried by a Sunday-school class I once undertook for three weeks to attempt that branch of employment.

However, as I said before, I am impecunious, totally and entirely, and the only way I see to get out of the scrape is to be married. But there's the rub. I have never had a lover, nor do I know any young man among my acquaintance who is likely to propose. How to get one is the question. I do not exactly like to advertise, for two reasons: in the first place, there is such an uncertainty about it; and in the second, I have nothing wherewith to pay for the insertion. Then again the applicants of the other sex have such a preference for beauty and a sweet disposition, neither of which I can lay claim to; although my aunt always said my figure and carriage were remarkably fine, and my temper very good when I wasn't crossed.

My aunt is a match-maker. She was born a match-maker, and her education has but added to her proficiency, so that having obtained two husbands for her own portion, she has been at liberty for the past five years to expend her energies on me. Numberless have been the young men she has decoyed to the house with skating, and croquet, and tableaux, and dancing, all having me for their object, and all, alas, in vain. I don't think it is my fault. I like the young men, and I do my very best to make myself agreeable, for my own sake as well as aunt's. She would like to see me settled in life, she says, for she feels her days are uncertain, and there is no dependence to be placed on my step-uncle. She declares he will marry again—men always do—and then things turn up so unaccountably after the loss of a partner that there is no calculation to be made on the future.

My step-uncle is stingy. Aunt says he is saving every thing for her successor, which, true or not, adds mournfully to my impecuniosity, since I am dependent on her.

So I feel that for all our sakes it is my duty to marry speedily, and marry, not a country parsonage with five hundred a year, but a brownstone front and a coupé. With this end in view I have been looking around for some time, until I begin to find that I am not so young as I once was, and my schoolmates have all changed their names.

Then I am obliged to keep up a stylish appearance, for we live handsomely, and give dinner-parties and soirées, and I must dress as becomes them. A hundred dollars a month, however, goes no distance, and my penurious step-uncle will not allow me another cent. He has the effrontery, indeed, to tell me that times are hard and I must economize, as if such a thing were possible for an impecunious female. Once he actually had the impudence to suggest that I might earn my own living, as if one of our family could stoop to such degradation. Aunt soothed my tears over this insult by assuring me that he was a beast to dream of it, and she would invite a wealthy widower to dinner to console me. The widower, however, talked all the time about his first wife, and if there's any thing I hate it is to have somebody else's virtues held up to me.

That evening there was to be a grand masquerade reunion sociable of our set, and I made up my mind to secure a husband, for there are so many things to be said under a mask that may result seriously; and, moreover, when a man can not tell whether you are pretty or ugly, he may get involved before he knows it. If I could only gain a suit for breach of promise it might be a slight help, but thus far there had been no promise, and I felt that now or never was my time.

Then, again, our set was always so select and aristocratic that I felt no hesitation about committing myself, for only the best matches were invited, and we never pretended to mingle with the plebeians at the other end of the town. Animated by these sentiments I attired myself gorgeously as Cleopatra the enslaver, and went forth conquering and to conquer. Aunt kissed me and gave me her best wishes, not venturing to accompany me for fear of recognition, which might frustrate my good intentions. I entered the room with a queenly step—so whispered a tall black domino, and offered me his arm for a promenade. This was most encouraging. Never had a gentleman so distinguished me before, for I had been one of those unfortunates called wall-flowers, whose destiny it is too often to blush unseen. With difficulty disguising my voice I accepted in dulcet tones, and matters were soon in rapid progression. He called me his charmer; I retaliated by a playful poke with my fan and dubbed him Mark Antony, not mentioning that I had spent the afternoon in reading up. One dance after another he claimed, sweetening the figures with softest speeches, and I was in an Elysium. Who could this black domino—this unknown gallant—be? My heart was all quivering with the darts of the little god, especially when the unknown spoke of his horses and carriage, and asked me if I thought I would like a trip to Europe. He begged a flower from my bouquet, which I willingly presented, as he vowed he would cherish it always. Never had an evening sped so rapidly; but just as matters were coming to a crisis the order was given to unmask, and reluctantly we parted with the arrangement that I should hold my handkerchief in my left hand coming down stairs, and he would place himself by the piano for recognition.

How can I tell what followed? I tripped blushing down, with my kerchief in the approved style, and beheld—young Simpkins, the engaged and devoted property of Stella Syllabub, and as poor as a beggar into the bargain.

There he stood, as demurely as you please, till happening to catch sight of me, the corners of his mouth twitched, and he turned to speak to his innamorata.

It was too much. In imagination I heard him narrating my tender speeches and quizzing my soft sighs to the most satirical girl in all Villatown, and one who had never ceased envying my fine figure. It flashed across my mind that it was a preconcerted plan for the express purpose of mortifying me, and maddened by the thought I rushed from the room. I could not stay where my budding affections had been so cruelly blighted, and, without stopping to wait for the carriage, I hastened home. I can not describe Aunt's disappointment. She had built so much on the success of this party that I feared the blow would prostrate her beyond recovery, in which case Number Two would undoubtedly step in and my impecunious self step out. But this time it was not to be, and I rejoice to say that she still lives to aid me with her valuable suggestions.

Meanwhile time is going by, and I fear my chances with it. They do say that no woman goes through life without an offer, but I very much fear I am doomed to be the exception which proves the rule. It may be that my destiny was killed in the war, and I shall be forced to take up with one of those boys whom the girls seem to fancy nowadays. Perhaps it might be well to adopt one and train him up in the capacity of husband. I submit the subject to the Bazar; for it seems to me that a well-trained, obedient husband is a very excellent thing.

Last summer Aunt took me to a watering-place. It was expensive, she said, but she felt she must do her duty by her own brother's child. There was nothing eligible, however, and we soon came home, to the great delight of my step-uncle, who is increasingly stingy. This winter I wanted a velvet cloak, but the mean wretch would not give it to me unless I should get engaged. He said he had noticed that it was the fashion in our set for young ladies to appear in velvet cloaks as soon as they had secured a partner, and I must not deviate from the rule. Did you ever know such cruelty? And to think that I, a high-spirited female, with blue blood in my veins, am dependent on this creature! But then I am impecunious.

I really feel ashamed to go to church nowadays in a cloth cloak; but Aunt tells me it is my duty to keep myself before society, and so I obey her. She says if I desert my friends they will desert me, and I must remember that her health is precarious. So I go every where—on straw-rides in summer, and skating-parties in winter, though I must confess that my limbs are getting a little stiff for either amusement nowadays. There are very few of my contemporaries left single; and I can not understand how a cultivated, refined person like myself receives so little attention from gentlemen. I should think they would prefer intelligent conversation with me to the silly school-girl twaddle of the pert young misses whom I can perfectly remember in long clothes. And yet they pass me unheeded by!

Many a time, just as aunt has effected my introduction to some desirable party, have I known the individual in question, to beg me to excuse him for a few minutes, and deliberately join a more juvenile lady. And after vainly awaiting his return I have been forced to conclude that "a few minutes" meant the entire evening. And all merely because I am impecunious.

Aunt has been so kind I can't bear to disappoint her. She knows I have too much native delicacy to invite gentlemen to call on me, so she has kindly contrived all manner of little entertainments, and requested the pleasure of their company. They never fail to come, I notice, and are very polite in our house, but singular to relate, their attentions do not amount to any thing. I have them all to myself in the little parlor, and as aunt only sends for one at a time there is no possibility of any interruption. I am really quite anxious to take part in something like the love stories I read in your pleasant columns, but as yet the occasion is wanting.

I know it is only my impecuniosity that is in the way, and lately I have tried to turn even it to account. After this fashion: I heard that all the young men were in despair these hard times about getting married, because the girls were so extravagant it was really an impossibility, and they had even formed clubs for the promotion of bachelors. So I attired myself very plainly, as would be proper for a sensible, marriageable woman, and attended our sociable, although I knew I looked like a fright. But goodness, if I was neglected before, I was positively snubbed now by these same fickle gentlemen. A handsome dress had occasionally won me an invitation to dance; but that entire evening I remained sitting in a corner, solitary and alone.

It is my opinion that men are a very deceitful race. They give out that they can't afford to marry because women are extravagant and dressy; and then, when the self-sacrificing creatures dispense with the plaiting of hair and putting on of apparel, merely to gratify these same men, they don't come any where near them. The impecuniosity of the age is due to them far more than the fair sex, for to their fancies do these devoted victims minister; and if there were no men in the world there would be precious few jewels and ribbons worn.

So finding that my impecunious efforts were not crowned with the success they deserved, I relapsed into former habits, with aunt's entire approval. Aunt is a very kind-hearted creature. She informed me quite confidentially the other day that if my step-uncle died before herself she would provide for me. But, unfortunately, he seems very hale and hearty, and I fear there is no hope.

I feel more imperatively than ever that something must be done, and that without delay; and I also feel, my dear Bazar, that you are in a measure accountable for my impecuniosity. I do not for an instant intend to blame you, for I consider you most convenient and indispensable; and no one scans your well-filled columns more eagerly than myself. But alas! I have gored and re-gored my dresses, I have altered every thing each week by your most economical patterns, and yet I am no better off. The novelties you suggest I feel it my duty to purchase, if only to save money, by making them up myself; but, strange to say, I continue impecunious. I know your tender heart will sympathize with my situation and perhaps suggest a means of relief—possibly even trot out a few young men with long purses for my inspection. It is really impossible to keep up with the fashions on my meagre allowance; and you can hardly imagine my agony when I go to the city on a shopping expedition, and am unable to buy the many cheap things in this cheapest of seasons. It really seems an outrage to let them go by; and many a time have I turned with tearful, self-denying eyes from Stewart's, and Legrain's, and Arnold's, feeling my inability to possess the treasures so wonderfully marked down.

Aunt has just come to my rescue with one of her comprehensive new ideas which has suggested this letter, that I might ask your advice on the subject. She tells me this year of 1868 is the one of the Presidential election, and also that vastly more important one to our sex, the leap-year—our election if we choose so to make it. Aunt seems to consider this the time for a final strike, and says that, as annexation is now so popular in the country, she thinks it would be well for me to annex a young man. So I am thinking how I shall best arrange the matter. I don't like to give a leap-year party, for it makes the affair so public; and I have always understood that these little things are best managed between the two individuals concerned. My invaluable relative suggests for me to invite some nice, timid young man to take a walk and embrace the occasion for a proposal. I know a pleasant, rocky promenade along the edge of a precipice, where it really would not be safe for him to withdraw from any proposition on account of the declivity.

Aunt says she will have the matter all cut and dried before I am many hours older. She will assist me all in her power. I know her disinterested kindness; but she says this is a matter in which I must help myself, for every thing depends on me.

I feel my responsibility; matrimony is a very serious thing, and I hope it will turn out all right. If any thing should happen to prevent, woe betide me, for I shall then remain to the end of my days

AN IMPECUNIOUS YOUNG LADY.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MABEL AND LOTTIE.—Young girls of twelve and fourteen can wear their hair in two long braids, hanging down, and tied with ribbon of the same color as the trimming of the dress. Black velvet bands with ornaments of cut steel, or colored velvet, studded with Roman pearls or steel beads, are pretty and becoming for the hair.

NINETEEN.—Two yards and a quarter from the belt to the edge of the skirt makes a train of good length for a lady of medium height. The combination of redingote and Gabrielle which you suggest is not worn.

COPYING WHEEL.—This Wheel, by means of which patterns can be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease, is now ready, and can be had of most of the News-dealers; or will be sent by mail, postage prepaid, on the receipt of 25 cents.

FRENCH BREAKFAST AND DINNER COFFEE, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lots at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

BOGUS OR IMITATIONS.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the

RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

THE RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

X.

CRINOLINE IN THE CABINET OF ANTIQUITIES. —Perhaps the very worst position in which a lady in crinoline can find herself is that of visitor in a Museum of Antiquities. The contrast between the majestic figures of the Grecian gods, betraying their artistic outlines through their richly-folded robes, and this unnatural invention of man is too striking. One would think that the goddesses of Olympus had resolved by means of their marble effigies to hold up the mirror to the deformity of crinoline. No wonder that one sees the ladies as they enter a museum instinctively try to take in sail, and gaze musingly on those wondrous figures which force them to admit that, in spite of all the improvements and appliances of later days, Juno, and Venus, and Diana are still the most perfect specimens of female beauty and grace. What could even Phidias have made of a figure in crinoline? Or would Rachel have been what she was if she had been forced—like her predecessors—to play Phædra and Hermione in a hoop-skirt, and not in that graceful classical dress which made her majestic before she uttered a word? Alas for the perverseness of human taste! We may, however, rejoice that the reign of the terror-inspiring hoop is now over. We have now reached a period when the skirts, if not quite so yielding as the ancient classic costume, are at least wedge-shaped, and while equally comfortable to the wearer, are infinitely more graceful in appearance than were Madame Du Barry's exaggerated hoops. The loss of the flowing lines of antiquity is compensated for by the comfort of crinoline in its present form.

he possesses a share of his father's droll humor. His teacher, the other day, with a severity not altogether unheard of, had inflicted the penalty of "marks" upon another boy for the misdemeanor of blowing his nose. Pretty soon Tad's hand signaled the tutor's eye, whereupon, Tutor (log.). "Lincoln, what do you wish?" Tad. "Want to go out, Sir." Tutor. "For what purpose?" Tad. "To scratch my head, Sir." He goes.

THE FIRST HYMN ON RECORD—Adam.

THUNDER.—Stopping at a village inn, there came on a thunder-storm, and Captain Hall, surprised that a new country should have reached a perfection in these meteorological manufactures, said to a by-stander, "Why, you have very heavy thunder here." "Well, yes," replied the man, "we do, considering the number of inhabitants."

THE CART(E) BEFORE THE HORSE—The bill of fare at a horse banquet.

FACETIÆ.

MOMENTOUS QUESTIONS.—Is a ship's fender used to protect the vessel from the fire of the enemy? What kind of ammunition is used for shot silk? Will any company insure the property of a man imbued with the fire of genius? When the waves wash the shore, do they use patent washing powder? Does a captain go into mourning for a dead reckoning? If bark is used in tanning, what is the commercial value of the bark of a tan terrier? What kind of cordage is used in rigging the market?

Love's young dream often turns out to be the nightmare.

Why is flirtation like plate powder?—Because it rubs up the spoons.

SUCH A BORE.—A lady, young, attractive, and just married, left her home and went into the country, accompanied by her husband. Soon after her debut as Mrs. H—, she attended a sewing society. After the usual subjects of conversation had received attention, the lunar eclipse was alluded to. "Mrs. H—, did you sit up to see it, eh?" "No, I did not," was the reply. "Mr. H— sat up. Where I came from they are such a bore—we have them so often."

Why is it foolish to attempt to catch the 12.50 train to Albany?—Because it is 10 to 1 if you do.

"Will you have some grapes, monsieur?" asked a gentleman of a Frenchman. "No, Sare," he replied; "I don't swallow my wine in ze shape of pills."

Why are bankrupts more to be pitied than idiots?—Because bankrupts are broken, while idiots are only cracked.

AN INTERESTING GIRL.—One whose money interest is ten thousand.

What portions of the body are the best travelers?—The two wrists.

"Bridget," said a mistress to her Irish servant, "where's the gridiron?" "An shure, ma'am, I've just after giving it to my sister's own cousin, O'Flaherty; the thing's so full of holes it's no good at all."

Tad Lincoln is attending school in Chicago, where he occasionally gives evidence that he possesses a share of his father's droll humor. His teacher, the other day, with a severity not altogether unheard of, had inflicted the penalty of "marks" upon another boy for the misdemeanor of blowing his nose. Pretty soon Tad's hand signaled the tutor's eye, whereupon, Tutor (log.). "Lincoln, what do you wish?" Tad. "Want to go out, Sir." Tutor. "For what purpose?" Tad. "To scratch my head, Sir." He goes.

THE FIRST HYMN ON RECORD—Adam.

THUNDER.—Stopping at a village inn, there came on a thunder-storm, and Captain Hall, surprised that a new country should have reached a perfection in these meteorological manufactures, said to a by-stander, "Why, you have very heavy thunder here." "Well, yes," replied the man, "we do, considering the number of inhabitants."

THE CART(E) BEFORE THE HORSE—The bill of fare at a horse banquet.

Why do Irishmen resemble the waves of the Atlantic?—Because they never cease lavin' the shores of the "ould country."

TRUE TO A HAIR.—A somewhat juvenile dandy said to a fair partner at a ball, "Don't you think, miss, my mustaches are becoming?" To which she replied, "Well, Sir, they may be coming, but they have not yet arrived."

What perfume is most injurious to female beauty?—The essence of thyme.

Why is fashionable society like a warming-pan?—Because it is highly polished but very hollow.

A gentleman, seeing an Irishman fencing in a very barren, desolate piece of land, said, "What are you fencing in that lot for, Pat? A flock of sheep would starve to death on that land." "And sure, your Honor, wasn't I fencing it to keep the poor beasts out of it?" replied Pat.

What author uses the most uncommon words?—The compiler of a dictionary.

Can a man who avoids writing be considered a pen-shunner?

Why is a parish bell like a good story?—Because it is often toll'd.

On a tombstone in a church-yard in Ulster is the following epitaph: "Erected to the memory of John Phillips, accidentally shot as a mark of affection by his brother."

What word is that composed of five letters from which if you take two one remains?—Stone.

KISSING.

"Men scorn to kiss among themselves, And scarce would kiss a brother; But women want to kiss so badly They kiss and kiss each other."

A LADY REPLIES:

"Men do not kiss among themselves, It's well that they refrain; The bitter dose would vex them so They ne'er would kiss again."

Marrying a woman for her beauty is like eating a bird for its sweet singing.

A young man told Dr. Bethune that he had enlisted in the army of Zion. "In which church?" asked the doctor. "In the Baptist," was the reply. "I should call that joining the navy," was the doctor's response.

Why is the centre of a tree like a dog's tail?—Because it is farthest from the bark.

Two Irishmen were traveling, when they stopped to examine a guide-board. "Twelve miles to Portland," said one. "Just six miles apiece," said the other. And they trudged on apparently satisfied at the small distance.

What quadrupeds are admitted to balls, operas, and dinner-parties?—White kids.

A boy who heard the quotation, "A little learning is a dangerous thing," wished to stop going to school because he was afraid he should not live long enough to get past the dangerous point.

What religious sect should make the best gardeners?—The Bhudd-ists of the Flowery Land.

An Irish girl, who plumed herself on being employed in a genteel family, was asked a definition of the term. "Where they have two or three kinds of wine and the gentlemen swear," was the reply.

Why are corn and potatoes like the idols of old?—Because the former have ears and hear not, and the latter have eyes and see not.

LONG ODDS.—Tall husband and short wife.

A fellow stole a dog, and, upon being detected by the owner, promised to return the animal next day. The individual received a package at the appointed hour, on which was written, "This is your dog." On opening it, the astonished man discovered ten pounds of freshly-made sausages.

A man who is advertising lodgings "to let for early risers" adds: "Cochin China fowls of unusual vocal powers are kept on the adjoining premises."

A SETTLER.

ADOLPHUS (admired for his sentiment). "Good-Night, Beloved—may the Drowsy God soon wrap that beauteous Form in golden Slumber—may delicious Dreams hover o'er thy Couch!" EMILY (his betrothed, somewhat matter-of-fact). "Good-Night. Be sure you turn the Gas off, put your Boots out, and —don't Snore!"

EDUCATION!

PAPA (improving the occasion at Luncheon). "Now, look, Harry, the circumference of this Cake is equal to about three times the diameter, and—" HARRY. "Oh, then, Pa, let me have the c'cumf'rence for my Share!"

Two Bed Gowns for the Sick.

We give illustrations of two simple and comfortable bed gowns, designed to obviate the pain and difficulty which is often experienced in changing the linen of the sick. These bed gowns require no raising or bending of the arms, and, moreover, have the advantage of being easily washed and ironed. Fig. 1 is of white flannel; it has no seams on the shoulders or in the sleeves, and is buttoned up the front. Cut from Figs. 6 and 8 of the Supplement each two pieces, and of Fig. 7 one piece. Fell the fronts and back together under the arms from 16 to 17, hem the bottom and fronts, and set buttons and button-holes up the latter, as seen in the illustration. Gather the bottom of the sleeves, set them into a double binding, and sew them in the arm-holes to correspond with the figures on the pattern. Face the shoulders and opening in the sleeves with a strip of linen, and finish with buttons and button-holes. Cord the neck.

The bed gown shown in Figs. 2 and 3 is still simpler and more easily made. It consists of a strip of flannel two yards long and three quarters of a yard wide, which is laid smooth under the sick person, and then arranged on the body in the manner shown in the illustration. Fig. 4 shows the flannel, one-fourteenth the full size, prepared for use. Cut

For pattern see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 6-9.

1st round.—* 4 dc. (double crochet) in the first four border stitches of the band; 3 ch. (chain stitches), passing over two to three border stitches.
2d round.—10 dc. over every ch. of the former round, the dc. of the last round being always passed over.
3d round.—* 1 sc. (single crochet) between the 2d and 3d dc. of a scallop; 4 ch., 1 sc. between the 4th and 5th dc. of the same scallop; 4 ch., 1 sc. between the 6th and 7th dc. of the same scallop; 4 ch., 1 sc. between the 8th and 9th dc. Repeat from *.

in the top a slit six inches in length, and hem both sides thereof, then turn the corners over on the right side along the dotted line, thus forming the neck and collar. For the sleeves turn the corners of the flannel over on the right side along the dotted line, set buttons and button-holes at the places marked by the letters, and button the corners together. The dots in the illustration mark the place for the ribbons that tie the gown in front.

Strap for the Sick to raise themselves in Bed.

MATERIALS: Knitting cotton, twisted crochet cotton, red worsted cord.

A crochet strap, three inches wide by seventy-two inches long, is closed in a round, and thus forms a double strap which is fastened over the cross-board at the foot of the bed; to this is attached a narrower strap, two inches wide by seventy-two inches long, on which the patient raises himself. A knot of red woolen cord ornaments the places where this strap is fastened to the wider strap. Two red worsted tassels, four inches long, finish this cord. The separate pieces are worked crosswise backward and forward on a foundation of the requisite breadth in coarse knitting cotton in raised stitches. For the long narrow band crochet two strips of equal length, and sew them together lengthwise, so that the wrong sides shall lie together within. The outer edges of the strips are ornamented with a narrow edging worked lengthwise in fine cotton as follows:

PARIS GOSSIP.

THE newspapers report that at the last ball of the French ambassador at Berlin, M. Benedetti presented to the Queen of Prussia a bouquet of violets which came from Paris, and which is said to have cost 140 francs.

It would not be a bad idea to have the speeches made thus, in the "language of flowers," reported regularly in the papers, and adding the price gives emphasis to the expression. A compliment at 140 francs ought to be dear to the lady who receives it, as well as to the gentleman who pays it.

The organization of a new club in Paris is spoken of, called the Club of Flowers, which proposes to distinguish itself by a monthly display of plants and flowers, and sales of rare cuttings and slips.

The members will be forbidden to stake money on the card tables, but the stakes will consist of bouquets, pots of flowers, and curious plants.

The shop-windows of the great "magasins" or dry-goods stores in Paris are the subject of much thought and care, as they are newly arranged each day. In one of the largest establishments, which has fifteen show-windows, each clerk is required in turn to exercise his skill and taste for a week in their arrangement. A visitor in Paris thus describes the display in some of these windows at this season:

"These bright and warm sunny days announce approaching spring, and furs and heavy clothing in the shop-windows begin to be withdrawn to give place to the lighter colors and thinner fabrics for spring. Thin materials for evening dresses will still maintain their position till Lent commences, and the variety in this line of goods seems inexhaustible.

"Lace or fine tarlatan, white or colored, forms the body of these materials, upon which are worked colored flowers or graceful designs in silver and gold. Two of the large windows in one of the great establishments display a variety of these goods, each day newly arranged. To-day one has a white lace dotted with white and yellow daisies, another of same material with grape leaves and bunches of grapes; these are separated by a delicate pink tarlatan with narrow silver stripes. Upon each lies a handsomely-contrasted sash, and a coiffure of flowers for the hair. The other window has four white lace robes embroidered with flowers—one with blue, one scarlet, one with silver, and the other in gold, each with a rich satin sash placed over it. These are so gracefully displayed one can easily imagine how they will look 'made up.'

"If you prefer to see how they will look by evening light you can enter the store, and pass up stairs to a handsome room lined with mirrors and curtains, from which daylight is excluded; an attendant turns on the gas and the room is filled with its light, by which you may make your selection."

In some of the best photographic establishments in Paris copies of pictures, or reproductions as they are called, are usually taken in the open air.

The new broad flight of steps in the garden of the Tuilleries, leading down from the terrace at the foot of Rue Castiglione, is finished.

THE TRUE BETROTHAL.

The Maiden's Question.

Yes, you vow to love me ever,
As you love me now, to-day,
Say no change shall us dis sever,
Answer me one question, pray:

Ever 'tis a word supernal
Borrowed from a foreign tongue,
It belongs to the eternal
And on angels' lips first hung.

Boundless, endless is its meaning
Though men hem it in Time's space;
Each, in littleness o'erweening,
Binds it to his mortal race.

Tell me where your ever reacheth,
To Death's night or Heaven's day?
And by what your answer teacheth,
I will answer yea or nay.

Answer.

Onward to the great immortal
I my troth would plight.
Should I see thee pass Death's portal
Love should own no blight;
Short the space our souls would sever,
Brief would be Love's night;
Thus I swear to thee forever!
Love that knows no flight.

Acceptance.

Now in thine I place my hand,
Thou wilt keep it in thy clasp
Till Death part Love's mortal band,
Loose a little while its grasp.

In thy heart my heart I drop,
Joying in the sacrifice,
Since our love's sweet, grand device
Is the vast forever!

SPRING PHYSIC.

IT is no uncommon notion that the human body requires at certain seasons, and particularly in the beginning of the spring, a course of medical treatment with drugs. This idea originated with a school of doctors who held that all diseases depended upon the condition of the humors. These were supposed, like the sap of trees, to become thickened and to stop circulating in winter, but in the spring to liquefy and flow. To give impulse to this latter operation, which was deemed a natural and particularly wholesome one, the ancient doctors were wont to drench their patients with strong purgatives. Hence the popular notion, which still lingers long after the absurd theory of the humorists has been abandoned, that a rousing dose of physic of some kind or other is beneficial if not absolutely necessary at the opening of spring. This vulgar error should be abandoned since it has no foundation in nature, and leads to a practice which is injurious to health; for drugs, it should be recollected, always act as poisons upon a body to which they are unnecessarily applied.

Though the opening of the spring with an aperient of epsom-salts or castor-oil is unnecessary and may be hurtful, the human body requires some attention to adapt it to the change of season. The chemists tell us that the larger portion of the food we consume is for the purpose of keeping up the animal heat. This property is attributed to the carboniferous elements of the human diet, or those which contain as a principal constituent carbon, or charcoal. This carbon, according to the generally-received theory, is burned by being brought in contact with the oxygen of the air, which is chiefly introduced into the system by the breathing of the lungs. This combustion produces the animal heat of the body so essential to its vitality. The human fire burns so briskly that it consumes much more nutriment than that required to sustain any other vital process. The principal part of our food is thus composed of the heat-producing or carboniferous substances, such as the fat of meats, and the sugar, starch, and oil of vegetables. Though the human body demands at all seasons a large supply of fuel to keep up its vital fire and sustain the animal heat, its wants are somewhat proportioned to the temperature of the air. Carboniferous food accordingly is required in greater abundance in winter than in summer.

With the first opening of spring it may be well to adapt the body to the change of temperature by some variation of the winter diet; in other words, to slacken our human fires to suit the increased warmth of the new season. The chemists will tell us to consume fewer carboniferous articles—that is, less fat meats, and vegetables containing starch, sugar, and oil. Our natural instincts generally lead us to act in accordance with this scientific advice. With the first warm day we grow averse to the sausages, pork-steaks, bacon, well-buttered buckwheat cakes, hominy, and other carboniferous food with which we have regaled ourselves so heartily during the winter, and long eagerly for the meagre flesh of the spring chicken, and the early fruits or vegetables. There are many, however, who resolutely oppose these suggestions of nature, and insist upon keeping up as hot an internal fire in midsummer as in the depth of the coldest winter. Most of our country friends will feed upon fried bacon and other equally inflammatory material the whole year round, and thus keeping themselves in a constant state of excessive combustion, they burn to a cinder without having any of the juice of life left. The shrunken, yellow faces, meagre frames, weak stomachs, and diseased livers so common in the country, can be traced to the want of discrimination in the selection and preparation of the food of our rustic population. If they would adopt betimes a seasonable diet they would be less inclined to resort to that dangerous substitute, Spring Physic.

FEMALE DO-NOTHINGS.

ACCORDING to the London Saturday Review, which ought to know, English women are a set of drones who do nothing but flap about from house to house, and keep up a continuous buzz of gossip. "It is strange," says the Review, "to see into what unreasonable disrepute active housekeeping—woman's first natural duty—has fallen in England. Take a family with four or five hundred a year—and we know how small a sum that is for 'genteel humanity' in these days—the wife who will be an active housekeeper, even with such an income, will be an exception to the rule; and the daughters who will be any thing more than drawing-room dolls waiting for husbands to transfer them to a home of their own, where they may be as useless as they are now, will be rarer still. For things are getting worse, not better, and our young women are less useful even than their mothers * *. The usual method of London housekeeping, even in the second ranks of the middle classes, is for the mistress to give her orders in the kitchen in the morning, leaving the cook to pass them to the tradespeople when they call. If she is not very insolent (sic), and if she has a due regard for neatness and cleanliness, she may supplement her kitchen commands by going up stairs through some of the bedrooms; but after a kind word of advice to the house-maid if she is sweet-tempered, or a harsh word of censure if she is of the cross-grained type, her work in that department will be done, and her duties for the day are at an end. * * *

"The snobbish half of the middle classes holds housewifely work as degrading, save in the trumpery pretentiousness of 'giving orders.' A woman may sit in a dirty drawing-room which the slipshod maid has not had time to clean, but she must not take a duster in her hands and polish the legs of the chairs; there is no disgrace in the dirt, only in the duster. She may do fancy work of no earthly use, but she must not be caught making a gown. Indeed very few women could make one, and as few will do plain needle-work. They will braid and embroider, 'cut holes and sew them up again,' and spend any amount of time and money on beads and wools for messy draperies which no one wants; the end being finery sanctions the toil and refines it; but they will not do things of any practical use, or if they are compelled by the exigencies of circumstances they think themselves petty martyrs, and badly used by the fates."

This is not a very attractive picture of our lady cousins across the water, and we should be sorry to find any family resemblance among their American relatives.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Mr. Sirloin.

MY DEAR SIRLOIN,—I see with the greatest concern that Mr. Blot has renounced the restaurant to which I was looking as an institution that should teach us all how to cook, and how to dine. I know nothing of the circumstances, but with the rest of the disappointed public I read in the papers that there has been some kind of difficulty, and it is announced that Mr. Blot has not the least idea of undertaking any such enterprise, not the least. So much the worse for all of us. There was a chance of our being able to dine well and cheaply. It is gone—unless you will help us—and we are abandoned to the mercies of—well, I will not increase the horrors of our situation by mentioning names unnecessarily. There are plenty of names, only too familiar to all who are obliged to dine down town, the bare mention of which arouses melancholy emotions. My dear Sir, do not think that yours is among them. If it were so, I could not address myself to you, as I now do, with warm hopes, and in the interest of that very important part of manners upon the road—or conduct in life—good eating.

For it is to you that we must now turn in hope of some reform or relief. You are the host of an eating-house, and every day you provide for the dinner of hundreds of persons. There is no escape for them; they must dine down town, and I ask you if you have no ambition to make a fortune by providing the best dinners? Of course, a gentleman in your position is superior to the vulgar prejudice which insists that eating and drinking are subjects unworthy a wise man. You daily see many of the wisest men in town gravely choosing between a cutlet and a chop, and divided between apple and peach pie! And as you are a man of cultivation and refinement you know how much health and happiness depend upon the cook. A little thought—and I am sure you agree with me—a little thought given to the dinner is a clear gain to civilization.

Now before I venture upon a very few general suggestions, will you allow me to allude to an ingenious theory which I have lately heard in relation to the decrease of the native population in this country? Of the fact of decrease the scientific gentlemen seem to leave us in no doubt. The increase of the native is not in proportion to that of the foreign population, and it is our business to understand why it is so. According to my last authority, the reason of this is to be found in the mental culture of the laboring class. The moment the day's hard work is over the father must take his newspaper, then attend the public meeting, or go to his committee, or take his active part in the conduct of public affairs; and this enormous drain of vital energy necessitated by his intellectual development, and following the exhaustion of manual toil, is not sustained by a corresponding improvement of the quality of his food, and the consequence is a demoralized physical system which transmits its weakness and disease to its progeny. This was rather an unexpected turn of the argument, I confess; but its curious point was that nothing could repair this waste but an improvement of the laboring man's table to conform to his improved mind. The child of the poor Irishman or German can eat hog and hominy and thrive; but the child of a native worker fed upon such food must pine and dwindle and die. For the foreign parent has no wear and tear of brain, and when he lays down the tools of his daily labor he takes up his pipe and lets the committee and the meeting alone.

Here you see is the subject of eating presented to us in a new light. We must have better food or the population will gradually disappear. But not only must food be better, but it must be cheap so as to be accessible. Now then, my dear Sir, let us take a look about us. I invite you to make with me the tour of the down town eating-houses. Can any thing be more amazing? I do not mean now the filthy table-cloths; the clatter and riot and whirlwind; the dingy glass; the doubtful water; the long rows of melancholy men packed against a counter and bolting food: I do not now mean any of the disagreeable details; but is it not amazing that we stand it, that we actually pay a dollar or more for such dinners? Suppose now there were some heroic and sensible fellow who should invite a mass meeting of all the frequenters of Beef and Pork's dining-rooms at noon of Wednesday of any week; and when they were assembled should say to them, "Fellow-sufferers, I have endured enough; I pay every day ten or a dozen shillings for a feast of slow but sure poison, and so do you, and I therefore invite you to join me in getting redress"—what do you think would happen? Why, if he carried, as he would, a resolution that they would all agree to dine that day and the next at Cabbage's, and the whole company deserted Beef and Pork's in a body, and if Cabbage did not come up to the mark, deserted him, and tried old Cauliflower upon the same terms, my heroic and sensible fellow would have worked a peaceful revolution.

But heroes are scarce, and the work will not be done. The horrors of Beef and Pork's will continue until a superior dinner elsewhere, served more agreeably and at a cheaper rate, shall tempt their customers away. And, my friend, the man who does this will make a fortune. Legitimate success in business springs from doing your work in the best way that it can be done. When a merchant of any kind, from an apple-woman at the corner up to Mr. Stewart, forgets this, he is sure to pay the penalty. There was old Tom Boniface, who, in the Indian Summer of his life, when he liked nothing so much as picking over his ripe recollections, used to say that it took him nearly twenty years to recover from the consequences of his forgetfulness of this great truth, that success lies in always doing your best. Let us stop for a moment here at Cabbage's, while I repeat what he said. Don't soil that glass by wiping it with that napkin; and try, if you can, not to look in the direction of those castors. Well, old Tom Boniface said that when he had been Mr. Quickly's steward for three or four years he was tempted to take the hotel at Rising Sun, but merely for a few months or so, until it must be demolished to make room for the cathedral which was to be built upon the next lot. So he opened the house; and, as it was to come down so soon, he thought it would be useless to paint or to fit up. The old doors and broken railings and loose blinds and worn-out carpets and torn curtains and general squalor and decay must take their chance. It was but for a few months. The click of the shovel in the next lot was already audible, and nobody would expect any thing in a house that was as good as gone.

Now this spirit of negligence and Devil take the hindmost could not be restrained to the blinds and carpets and doors. It infected every part of the enterprise. The furniture was insufficient, and the table was mournful. The food was atrocious, and the attendance, however well-meaning, was deplorable. "Well, it is rather bad," Tom Boniface would say, in his cheerful way; "but then, you see, next month perhaps every thing will go by the board, and there is no reputation to be won in this old house. The most I can do is to make some money, so that I can begin in a new house where I can make a reputation." It happened that the Continental Conclave of the Church of Leyden, which assembles only once in a half century, was called for that very season, at Rising Sun, and Tom's house was consequently full all the time. Now, as the members of the Church of Leyden are fond of comfort, and are willing to pay freely for it, and are, moreover, men who travel and whose good word helps to make reputations, the result was a verdict of censure upon Tom Boniface. "The man," said they, "who will sacrifice us who are his guests to-day to the convenience of imaginary guests elsewhere to-morrow is a man who does not know how to keep a hotel." And although the house at Rising Sun was demolished soon after the Conclave separated, and Boniface became proprietor of the Norwich House in the Moon, the ill-name of those few months at Rising Sun followed him. The guests whom he had impressed with a sense of his unfitness as a host spread their feeling abroad, and it was many a year before this worthy man recovered from the consequences of forgetting, even for a little while, to do the best he could in his business.

Now, my dear Sirloin, the moral of all this is that you must do what Mr. Blot has abandoned. You must have an eating-house as neat and quiet and attractive as he would have made it; and while your meats must be of the very best and exquisitely cooked, your charges must be as reasonable as your whole enterprise. You have been at Tom's in London? Well, it is not a beautiful place. It is very dingy and small; and there are no gilt nor satin damask to be seen. But what a juicy steak, what a tender chop, and what a bright mug of clear ale! Now, my boy, why not try the juicy steak, the tender chop, and the bright mug in a sweet, clean, airy, attractive room; with perfectly white linen—not fine damask—with clear glass, with knives and forks and spoons as neatly burnished as possible; with salt finely-powdered in the salt-cellar; with mustard that is not black, and oil that is not rancid, and vinegar like lemon-juice. If I were you I wouldn't put many French names of dishes upon my bill of fare, nor would I put upon it the astounding news that you will furnish Schloss Johannisberger, green seal, at five dollars a bottle. You will do no such thing, and we all know it. My dear Sirloin, the people who could be gulled by such a notice do not know what Johannisberger is. No French names and no fine wines, but honest meats well cooked and a glass of sound sherry, and the bright mug as aforesaid; if you could only stick to these and to the general tidiness, you might go on enlarging your rooms until their fame was blown abroad and your fortune were secure. Do this, my dear Sirloin, and you will make us all wonder that we were ever content to stand or sit on high stools to feed at the trough known as Beef and Pork's. Your hopeful friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

RADICAL changes in dress are usually introduced in the fall. Modistes tax their ingenuity to devise novelties and variety for the gay winter season. In the spring the most successful features of the fall modes are remodeled and adapted with the necessary variations to lighter materials. For instance, the Marie Antoinette type of dress alluded to in the first Number of the Bazar has been worn during the winter, but more particularly for full dress. It will now be more generally adopted, and made up in all kinds of material.

The Marie Antoinette fichu, cape, or scarf, as it is variously called, made to cross on the breast with long sash-ends loosely tied behind, will be used as a wrapping for short suits. It will be of the same material as the dress, and in black silk. It is especially becoming to slender figures, as the effect is to enlarge the bust and display a tapering waist. When intended for the street it is deep in the back, reaching to the belt. It is trimmed with fringe, with lace, or a double ruffle of silk sewn on in box-pleats. Smaller fichus, mere scarfs, indeed, are made of lace or of silk to be worn over basques of black silk. Very pretty ones of clear muslin and lace are arranged to suit a variety of toilettes, by changing the ribbons under the puffs with which they are trimmed.

THE CORSAJE.

The style of corsage prevalent during the winter, with short shoulders and round waist, will be used with slight modifications for spring dresses. Our best modistes, however, never go into extremes, and at present fashion does not exact either a very short or a very long waist, but one fitted in accordance with the figure. Broad shoulders that need to be contracted are shaped with short seams, and the sleeve is placed very high; but if the figure is too slight, it is amplified in appearance by cutting the corsage long on the shoulders. It was formerly considered necessary, in order to make the back sufficiently narrow, to place the shoulder-seam two or three inches behind the line of the shoulders. Now it exactly describes that line, and may be seen from the front. Side bodies are made quite narrow. The waist is not so high at the throat as has been the fashion lately, but is still finished by a bias band, or a fold scalloped, or pointed and bound.

The Pompadour corsage is still in favor, together with revers, or rolling collars. The old-fashioned surplus waist open to the belt, and held together with a brooch, is revived for thin materials that are made full and gathered into a belt. Double-breasted garments are lapped in a deep point or sloped on the bias in the redingote style. Bretelles are also used.

THE SLEEVE.

Our correspondents write that they are weary of the coat-sleeve; but we are compelled to say that it has as yet no formidable rival. True, it has been worn a long time; but it is graceful and convenient, and susceptible of great variety of trimming. Four bands of bias satin, an inch in width, placed horizontally on the upper half of the sleeve from seam to seam, one band at the arm-hole, the lowest at the wrist, and the other two at regular intervals between will make a stylish trimming. This is exceedingly becoming to a long arm, as it shortens it in appearance. Another pretty style is to put a puff of silk around the elbow. Cuffs are pointed and very deep. Tight sleeves are being made for spring walking dresses. Very broad cuffs are worn with these, and a slight heading like an epaulet. Wide, open sleeves cut square at the end are worn over tight-fitting sleeves of the same material, or full puffs of muslin or of lace. The Moyen-Age sleeve is closed to the elbow, where it opens and hangs in a straight line below. It is sometimes caught together at the end. The Marie Antoinette sleeves are puffed to the elbow, and finished by a wide ruffle of the material, or fringe, or lace.

THE SKIRT.

Skirts of walking dresses are made slightly longer, almost touching the ground. They consist of eight gored widths similar to those used for trained skirts, but not so wide. Short overskirts are looped at the sides, or left open, the front forming a rounded apron and connected with the back by bands or clusters of ornaments. Black silk is in favor for spring suits. A good corded silk for this purpose, three quarters of a yard wide, may be bought for $3 a yard.

Narrow ruffles bound on each edge and gathered near the top to form a heading are arranged in waves around the skirt, or sewn on plain. Blue, green, and Bismarck silk are sometimes used for binding the frills by way of enlivening the dress. Silk, it is said, will take the place of satin for folds and bindings. Satin looks heavy and frays easily, but it is still preferred for piping. Bias bands of silk would look exceedingly plain unrelieved by the jet that is now passée, were it not for the crocheted beads and buttons that are strung on the folds in great quantities.

We are not informed of any decided change in trained dresses. There is a tendency to greater amplitude, but the fullness is still confined to the back of the dress. Usually there are seven gored widths in the front and sides, and a full one gathered in at the back. With very stout figures two full widths are used. A small pleat laid over on the gored seams adjusts the skirt into the waist. The plain width is gauged. The lap at the fastening should be over the second seam on the left. The pocket is concealed beneath the opposite seam on the right side. Small fancy pouches for the handkerchief are attached to the belt, or made to hook on the corsage.

Belts are not very wide, and are formed of narrow folds of the material of the dress alternating with others of the silk or satin used for trimming. A rosette finishes the front. The newest sashes have a rosette, and are fastened beneath each of the second seams on the side, and loosely caught together low down on the skirt. They should be a quarter of a yard wide, and bound and lined with satin. French dresses and sacques have the sash at the sides, under the arm, with a bow or rosette for heading. The plainest dress is scarcely considered complete without a sash and belt.

Trimnings are placed on the front width, simulating aprons, or in military folds of graduated length, and long sashes are sewn down the front seams. Ruffles or trained skirts are wider than those used for short dresses. They are often scalloped on each side and bound. This is a great deal of labor, and now that jet is out of fashion we are to have a variety of hand-made trimmings that require skillful and patient needlewomen. We have just seen a heavy gros grain in the hands of the modiste with two such ruffles as we have described encircling the skirt on all but the front width. Four large pipings extend down the sides and across the front. On a black satin skirt an apron is outlined with white satin, over which is an insertion of guipure lace.

THE CHEMISE Russe AND ROBES.

The chemise Russe for morning wear is prettily brought out in cashmere and delaines of rich-colored grounds, with gay Parisian patterns stamped on them for trimming. Gay Turkish jackets are in white delaine, and in black spotted with gilt or with crimson, with bright borders. $5 is asked for the cashmere patterns.

There are new fancies in cashmere and de-laine robed dresses for early spring. The garment is of some light, delicate tint—a blue, pea-green, or peach-blossom, or the soft shade of tan that is almost white, with stripes up each gored seam of wreaths of field flowers or tiny palm-leaves. A diagram with each garment shows the way of placing the trimming. $12 50.

AMONG THE FANCY GOODS.

On our late tour through the jewelry and silverware houses we saw, among a great variety of fancy goods, a number of useful and beautiful things in carved ivory. The yellow tinged ivory is the most valuable. It is made of the tusks of the animal extracted while it is alive. There were hair-brushes with ivory handles and backs, with a female head exquisitely carved on them and a border of acorns and leaves. This was $30 in gold. Another less elaborate one was $25. A glove-stretcher, very prettily cut, was $10. A paper-knife was an ivory cherub with spread wings on the handle. Ivory tablets were inlaid in a Greek pattern. There were cribbage-boards and card-cases for $30, and a case for embroidery supplied with gold thimble, bodkin, stiletto, and needle-case at $40.

WRITING-DESKS AND TOILETTE-CASES.

A convenient arrangement for travelers is a combination writing-desk and dressing-case for ladies and gentlemen. It is made of rosewood, with gilt hinges, locks, and ornamental bands, and is lined with crimson velvet. It is furnished with the various toilette articles necessary for a lady and gentleman, and with sewing apparatus and writing materials. There are brushes, combs, razors, knife, and pens with tortoise-shell handles, cut-glass inkstands, cosmetic boxes, jewel-case and soap-box with silver covers, and scissors, and crochet needles of polished steel.

There are dressing-cases furnished with solid silver. Others are of Nice wood, inlaid with several different shades. A dispatch-case of Coromandel wood mounted with gilt is $100. A portable writing-desk is of pale Russian leather, with port-folio and pockets inside, a match-box and tapers for wax, ink, pens, a calendar, paper-knife, and an abundance of paper and envelopes. Another of maroon Russian leather is inlaid with gilt. An ebony case has purple satin facings and gilt tops to the beautifully carved bottles.

BRONZES.

Inclosed in a rosewood cabinet with velvet lining is a library set—candlesticks, bell, inkstand, paper-weight, taper-holder, case for pens, and a watch-stand made of fire-gilt or yellow bronze, studded with turquoises. There are similar sets of plated bronze, and others are designed for a lady's boudoir.

The bronze ornaments are varied and beautiful. There are Roman lamps of antique shape; mantle sets, a clock, and candelabras of classical design; card-receivers and cigar-stands; salvers for cigar-ashes, with frogs engaged in a combat—their spears sever the burnt ashes from the cigars. On another are lions couchant; again there is a miniature cannon, and a grotesque figure with an immense shako on his head for receiving the ashes. A card-receiver of an elaborate pattern is marked $75 in gold. A large bird-cage of yellow bronze has a globe for gold fish and a Sèvres china vase for flowers on the summit.

There were many statuettes of interesting historical and mythological subjects; but we were especially attracted by a pair of poor cavaliers with ragged knee-breeches, torn mantles, and well-worn slippers; yet there were feathers in the chapeaux so jauntily placed on their handsome heads, and the rosettes on their slippers were faultless. The veins of the hand, the long, tapering nails, and the expressive features, proud and gay and debonair, were wonderfully perfect. We also saw a beautiful set of Parian statuettes, which were an exact reproduction of Thorwaldsen's celebrated group of Christ and the Apostles. Price $500 in gold.

VARIETIES.

An immense vase for a hall is of solid Algerian onyx, beautifully enameled and mounted in fire gilt. Price $2100.

A mantle set, a clock, and candlesticks, is of pure malachite, in massive solid blocks. $850.

An ornamental basket for silver is of carved black walnut, lined with purple velvet. The sides are cut to imitate willow. The cover is ornamented with birds, flowers, and fruits. Silver lock and key. Price $100 in gold.

A Sèvres china jardinière of a beautiful blue color, is oval-shaped. A wreath of flowers, beautifully shaded, surrounds the bowl. Price $135.

A paper weight of amethyst, a solid piece of unusual size, represents a bunch of purple grapes. Price $100.

A skate-bag of plush, with large pockets for skates and a small pouch for a chamois cloth to polish them, is prettily mounted with gilt for $17. Others, in imitation of seal-skin and chinchilla, are $14.

The head of a Brazilian humming-bird is set in pearls and Etruscan gold for a lady's brooch. It is stuffed to preserve the shape. The throat, of gold and green, looks like enamel.

A whip-handle for a gentleman is marked $140. It is of carved gold, representing horses' heads, bits, and shoes. There are jeweled riding-whips for ladies. One with a fan in the handle is $30; another has a small gilt spur, that may be concealed in the handle by a spring. There are canes with malachite balls set in gold, tortoise inlaid with pearl, hooks of yellow ivory richly carved, and of gold and oxidized silver, varying in price from $5 to $70 gold. There are silk umbrellas from $11 to $30, with amber sticks, and gold and pearl. Plain ones are of black walnut, grotesquely carved, at $18.

Mr. YOUNG's ability and experience as a journalist give promise of a most agreeable and interesting paper. Mr. JOHN R. THOMPSON, and Mr. WILLIAM WINTER, both clever, are to be on the editorial staff.

—The Southerners seem inclined to give women a hearing. Mrs. PAULINA W. DAVIS, who is wintering in the South for the sake of her health, attended the Georgia Convention, and listened to numerous speeches on class-legislation which led her to ask whether by universal they meant female suffrage. "Oh no," was the reply. This opened the argument, and the next day she received an invitation, signed by thirty-five members of the Convention, to address them on the subject. She accepted, and an evening was appointed; but owing to the illness of the President, some confusion arose, and but a meagre attendance was present. Supposing this a purpose of slight, Mrs. DAVIS refused to speak; but a day or two after she received a letter of apology from the President, Colonel PARROTT, and General BULLOCK, and a pressing invitation to deliver the promised lecture signed by twenty-five additional members of the Convention. She could not do this as she was about leaving the State, but promised to deliver a course of lectures there next winter. Mrs. DAVIS is a woman who would command attention and respect any where. She is about fifty, of commanding presence, and of remarkable beauty, grace, and refinement. Her husband, the Hon. THOMAS DAVIS, is a man of talent and wealth, and is a member of the Rhode Island Legislature; and her residence, in the suburbs of Providence, is really palatial. We understand that she intends also to lecture in Florida next winter.

—To visit a Queen, socially, as did Mrs. THEODORE MARTIN (Helen Faucit) recently, is by no means a disagreeable thing to do, especially at leave-taking, when the Queen asks you (as she did Mrs. M.) to accept as a souvenir of the visit a magnificent ruby-diamond bracelet.

—A biography of the late Chancellor WALWORTH is to be prepared by his son, CLARENCE A. WALWORTH. So requested in the Chancellor's will.

—THE QUEEN OF ENGLAND has now an even dozen grandchildren, her children having contributed in the following proportion: The Princess-Royal, five; Princess of Wales, three; Princess Alice, of Hesse, three; Princess Helena, one.

—Literary people will sympathize with Mr. B. P. SHILLABER ("Mrs. Partington"), who is afflicted with gout, which he avers he inherited from his wife's ancestors.

—The wisdom of an opulent man becoming the administrator of his own estate, and the satisfaction arising from it, are being enjoyed by Mr. GEORGE PEABODY. The annual report of the Peabody Trustees, in London, shows that by rents and interest the original fund of £150,000 has been increased to £170,000. The total population in all the buildings erected by the trustees is 1583; "the sanitary condition of the dwellings continues highly satisfactory, and the houses—well ventilated, open to free air, and kept with scrupulous cleanliness—appear to secure exemption from diseases incident to crowded localities."

—Lady AMBERLEY, recently among us, is now in London, and gives brilliant receptions, on Tuesday evenings, to rising young Liberals. She is one of the best of England's lady politicians, going to the House of Commons three or four times a week, and often remaining for several hours.

—The gentleman who presides over the principal organ of public opinion in Mount Pleasant, Iowa, has "sat under the oratory" of Miss ANNA DICKINSON, and gives it as his judgment that "woman as well as man is endowed with the gift of oratory and logic, such as enables her to fill lecture-rooms and move her auditory at will." He says, moreover, that "Miss DICKINSON's lecture on 'Idiotism and Women' was a masterly effort. Her positions on the abstract principles of right were well taken—were fairly taken; her arguments clear; her logic—like the thunder-bolts of Jupiter—fiery, scathing, and sweeping, as the tornado, every thing before it; her eloquence resistless as any orator who ever stood in our city."

—The names of two young ladies, late of New York, appear in Paris papers—Miss EMMA STONE (daughter of HENRY A. STONE), who has just been married to a banker named GONTZ, and Miss PAULINE PENNIMAN, who is engaged to M. GASTON DE BRIMONT, of Paris.

—The Bazar takes leave to introduce to its readers WILLIAM HOWITT, who will speak a short piece: "For my part, seeing the victims to fast life daily falling around me, I have willingly abandoned the apparent advantages of such a life, and preferred less popularity, less gains, the enjoyment of a sound mind in a sound body, the blessings of a quiet, domestic life, and a more restricted but not less enjoyable circle of society. I am now approaching my seventy-fifth year. I can not say, indeed, vigorous as I am, that I have reached this age without the assistance of doctors, for I have had the constant attendance of those four famous ones—Temperance, Exercise, Good Air, and Good Hours."

—After all that is said about lecturers none of them possess the power of drawing large houses in a higher degree than JOHN B. GOUGH. He has been a success for five-and-twenty years. The Chicago folk have just made a contract for his exclusive services for the next ten years, guaranteeing him $200 an evening for eighty nights each year.

—Since Count BISMARCK's absence from Berlin, on account of illness, the Prussian monarch is said to have been greatly badgered and irritated by political affairs. A story is told of a conversation between the King and VINCKE, the once staunch Bismarckian, which ended by VINCKE's saying, "I am ready to lay my head at your Majesty's feet, but not my conscience." "And do you think," the King is said to have passionately replied, "that I have no conscience myself?"—and turned his back on him.

—That Judge HOLMES, of St. Louis, who wrote a book to prove that Lord BACON was the author of SHAKESPEARE's plays, has been offered a professorship in the law school at Cambridge.

—Lord DERBY and Lord RUSSELL, both of whom entered public life more than forty years ago, are the only living statesmen who have been Prime Ministers of Great Britain. Notwithstanding the frequent changes of the English Government, the office of First Minister has, by some curious accident, remained a close monopoly. In twenty-two years there have been seven Cabinets and only four Prime Ministers.

—Lord WILLOUGHBY D'ERESBY, one of the very naughtiest men in all Great Britain, and one of the wealthiest, is patron of fifteen livings in the Church of England.

—After much legal controversy Dr. COLENSO has been declared legal bishop of Natal, by the highest court to which the case could be taken.

—It cost VICTOR EMANUEL a little something to obtain from the Pope a dispensation for the marriage of his son and heir Prince HUMBERT with his cousin, the Princess MARQUERITE, the fees being $20,000 gold. The bride's trousseau is being prepared in Vienna and Paris.

—Among theatrical people it is whispered that Miss MARY M'VICKER, a clever actress of Chicago, is about to become Mrs. EDWIN BOOTH.

—The Count OF PARIS, now in his thirtieth year, has literary talent, and, like other exiles, seeks consolation in letters. His contributions to the Revue des Deux Mondes have displayed fine literary taste.

—Mrs. COBDEN proposes to publish a collection of Mr. COBDEN's letters on public questions, commencing with those on education. An admirable Life of Cobden has been published by the HARPERS.

—Lord LYTTON, whose deafness had become so complete as almost to unfit him for all public duty, as well as for conversation, has entirely recovered his hearing under the treatment of some skillful aurist at Paris.

—The Memoirs of Talleyrand may be expected to appear on or about the 17th of May next—that being the period prior to which their publication was prohibited by his will. There will be spicy revelations therein.

—It is said of M. THIERS that when he makes a great speech he passes the greater part of the night in the Moniteur office, revising the proof-sheets with the greatest care, and drinking chocolate meanwhile. Another great orator, M. BERNIER, commits his speeches to the mercy of reporters and "readers." Being asked, after his speech on the Press Bill, whether he would not like to revise the proofs, he said: "I read over a speech that I have spoken? That would be like taking soup after coffee!"

—A very beautiful woman must be the Princess de METTERNICH, admitting the accuracy of the following description, from a Paris journal: "Eyes which have the sweetness of a German reverie; teeth of brightest enamel; a forehead smooth and clear as an infant's, high and wide as that of a thinker; and abundant silky-brown hair; the form of head as Greek as that of the Venus of Milo; her ear like a pink shell; the beautiful fall of her shoulders, the exquisite form of her arm, the long, aristocratic hands, and the narrow, dainty foot. Be she dressed in blue, red, or yellow; be she coiffed with her toque over her eyes or with a sergeant-de-ville's cap, as she appeared one day at the Tuilleries—she is and remains a princess."

—FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE has given $5000 to the fund for an infirmary at Rotherham, England.

—MR. ARTHUR HELPS, the gentleman who compiled the Queen's Memoirs of Prince Albert, is a gentleman of large estate and ancient family. He graduated at Oxford in 1838 and entered public service as Secretary of Lord Montague, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and was subsequently appointed Commissioner for Danish, French, and Spanish claims. He afterward became private secretary to Lord Morpeth, during his office as Chief Secretary for Ireland, and continued as such when Lord Morpeth, as Earl of Carlisle, became Lord Lieutenant. In 1859 he was appointed clerk of the Privy Council, in which position he has since remained. Having a cultivated literary and artistic taste, and being an accomplished German scholar, Mr. HELPS gained the warm friendship of Prince Albert, and for a number of years he was a frequent guest at the Queen's table. The Queen continues toward him the regard felt by her husband. Mr. HELPS, though not a popular writer, has published several works, displaying considerable talent and research. They consist of essays, plays, and historical works. In person Mr. HELPS is short and spare, fifty-four years old, and a widower with an only daughter.

—MR. HENRY VINCENT, an English gentleman lecturing in this country, says that the man who more than any other stirred the hearts of the British people was WILLIAM COBBETT. He taught them more of liberty than any man of his time; but the man who did more than all others was DANIEL O'CONNELL. He was the most bewitching in his manner, but he never spoke much unless he had a crowd of "the boys" near to cheer at the right time.

—Miss SARAH J. SMITH, of Glasgow, Missouri, has been well rewarded for an act of kindness. During "PRICE's raid" thereabout a rebel soldier was left on the ground dangerously wounded in the neck. Miss SMITH happening to pass by saw the wounded man, went to him, stanching his wounds, and probably saved his life. She remained with him until near nightfall, when he requested her to leave, as his companions would probably come in the night and take him away. If not, she would find him where he was in the morning, living or dead. He said he was known by the name of TUCKER, but that his real name was H. C. McDONALD, and that he was from Louisville, Kentucky. Next morning McDONALD was gone, and Miss SMITH knew nothing concerning him afterward. A few days ago Miss SMITH (who still resides in the neighborhood) received a letter from the administrator of H. C. McDONALD, Sen., informing her that she was named in the will of the deceased as the legatee of $50,000, in consideration of her having saved the life of his nephew and only heir, the H. C. McDONALD named in connection with the incident of 1864. This is all the story, and its correctness is fully indorsed. It is a very nice little romance, and worthy to be preserved in the Bazar.

Lambrequin of Pasteboard wound with Worsted.

MATERIALS: Red knitting-wool, white pasteboard.

This lambrequin, or curtain, is of cut pasteboard worked over in close button-hole stitch with red wool, and is designed for window-sills, corner-boards, etc. Fig. 43, Supplement, gives the pattern and design of half a scallop. To make these scallops lay on a board from two to three thicknesses of pasteboard of the size of a scallop over each other, and fasten them at the corners by means of small nails. On the upper piece of pasteboard draw the design given in Fig. 43, and, following the lines of the drawing, cut out the single figures with a sharp-pointed knife. Cut through several thicknesses of the pasteboard at once, so that several scallops may be prepared at the same time. The figures belonging to each scallop are worked with red wool in close button-hole stitch, taking care to join them, by reference to the pattern, as soon as they are prepared. In working the corners of the figures the needle may be sometimes put through the pasteboard, in order to lessen the work. Having worked the required number of scallops, sew them together according to the pattern, with overcast stitches taken on the wrong side. The lower point of each scallop is ornamented with a red tassel. On the upper border sew a crochet stripe. For this make a foundation of the length of the scallops, and work thereon a row of double crochet. Then work on each long side one single crochet between two double crochet. This stripe is joined to the scallops as shown in the illustration.

ground, and a very small quantity of otto of patchouly. Patchouly herb is often sold in its natural state, as imported, tied up in bundles of half a pound each. Sandal-wood sachet is good and economical, and simply consists of the ground wood, powdered by the drug-grinder. Violet sachet consists of black currant-leaves, 1 lb.; rose buds or leaves, 1 lb.; orris-root powder, 2 lbs.; otto of almonds, $\frac{1}{2}$ dram; grain musk, 1 dram; gum benzoin in powder, $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. Mix the ingredients well by sifting, and keep them in a glass or porcelain jar at least a week before using.

Cedar-wood, when ground, forms a body for sachet powder, and, distributed among clothes, will prevent moth. It yields an exceedingly fragrant essential oil, and is much used for scenting soap. Cinnamon, when ground, is used for pastilles, tooth-powders, and sachets. Cloves are used for the same purpose. Dried fennel, when ground, is also used in sachet powders. Ground nutmeg is much employed in the scented powders for scent bags—as are also dried sage-leaves.

JAPANESE WOMEN.

THE Japanese women lead lives far less secluded than is generally the custom with women in Eastern countries. Their feet are not so distorted as to prevent easy locomotion, like those of the Chinese women, nor are they shut up in dreary harems, having no intercourse with the outer world, like the women of Mohammedan countries; but all classes are permitted to mix freely in society, without let or hindrance, and it is no unusual thing to meet ladies in the streets attended by their servants, or carried in a norimon—a most peculiar and uncomfortable kind of conveyance. As single women they are allowed to associate with their friends and relatives, both male and female, and when married the utmost confidence is placed in them; they can come and go as they please.

Their appearance is very pleasing and eminently lady-like, even women of the lower classes possessing, as a rule, that refinement of manner and grace of movement which among ourselves is the proof of high breeding. They are very short, generally less than five feet in height, with hands and feet proportionably small. Their countenances are often charming, the black hair, always so carefully arranged, framing a delicate oval face, clear complexion, dark liquid eyes, and pretty nose and mouth. They move about very gracefully, notwithstanding their rough sandals and long draperies. The musical language of the country loses none of its melody from their pronunciation, for their voice is low and sweet, always an excellent thing in woman.

It is pleasant when climbing a green hill-side, or exploring a lovely valley, to exchange a cheerful "O hy o," or "Good-morning," with mothers returning from market, or leading their little ones to visit some relative in a neighboring village.

The men give utterance to none of those contemptuous expressions with regard to the female sex which are so frequently heard in China, nor does a Japanese ignore his wife and family, but readily enters into conversation respecting them. The women in consequence of this have a frank, self-reliant bearing, which shows they are treated as rational beings. The mothers have unlimited authority over their sons, whatever may be the age or rank of the latter. Though they themselves may have been bargained for and sold to husbands without regard to any will of their own, this power restores the balance and redresses the wrong, by placing woman as the mother far above man as the son. The right of women to succeed to the throne even of the Mikado, of which there are numerous examples both in ancient and modern times, is another compensation for the disadvantages to which they are subject in some other respects.

HOW TO MAKE SACHETS.

Sachets or Scent Bags.—Various substances, being put into silk bags or ornamental envelopes, are pleasant to smell, and economical for imparting an agreeable odor to linen and clothes as they lie in drawers. We quote a few instructions for making sachets, every material being either ground in a mill or powdered in a mortar, and afterward sifted:

For heliotrope sachet take $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. powdered orris-root; $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. ground rose-leaves; 2 oz. tonquin bean, ground; 1 oz. vanilla bean; $\frac{1}{2}$ dram grain musk; 2 drops of otto of almonds—to be well mixed by sifting in a coarse sieve. This, says a perfumer, is one of the best sachets ever made. For lavender sachets take 1 lb. of lavender flowers, ground; $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. gum benzoin in powder; $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. otto of lavender. For patchouly sachet, herb patchouly,

THE TRYST.

Up from the meadows brown kine are coming,
The drovers call to loitering flocks;
Here in my garden late bees are humming
On ruby-turreted hollyhocks.

Afloat in the misty silver reaches
That steadily wane from low, far skies,
The long clouds loom like purple beaches,
And the sad day shuts her dying eyes.

Fair is the garden, yet more to my fancy
Than sumptuous dahlia or drowsy rose
Is yon quiet lane with its jungles of tansy
And sweet mint-copses in shadow a-doze.

Arching branches are dewy and broad there,
Friskers dwell in them, nimble and brown,
Pale woolly mulleins carpet the sward there,
Glimmering soft when the moon leans down.

My heart will find out where my feet are going,
Love, ere I join you at moonrise again,
But the secret is safe from other knowing,
The breeze will not gossip that moves in the lane.

SAINT MAY.

ST. ALOYS the Great is both mouldy and grim,
The decalogue's dusty, the windows are dim;
If you know not the road there, you'll long have to search
To find your way into this old City church;
Yet on fine Sunday mornings I often there stray,
And see a new saint, whom I've christened St. May.

The one bell is cracked in its crazy old tower;
The sermon oft lasts rather more than an hour;
The parson is prosy, the clerk eighty-three;
The organ drones out in a sad minor key;
Yet quickly the moments I find fly away,
I pass every week at the shrine of St. May.

I have seen lots of saints in churches before—
In Florence or Venice they're there by the score;
Agnese, Maria—the rest I forget—
By Titian, Bassano, and brave Tintoret;
They none can compare, though they're well in their way,
In sweet tender grace with my lovely St. May.

She sits in a high, ancient, black oaken pew,
Which almost conceals her fair face from my view—
The sweetest of pictures it can't be denied;
With two tiny sisters who sit by her side,
Who lisp the responses, or kneel down to pray,
With little hands locked in the palm of St. May.

She's young for a saint, for she's scarcely eighteen,
And ne'er could wear peas in those dainty botines;
Her locks are not shaven, and 'twould be a sin
To wear a hair-shirt next that delicate skin;
Save diagonal stripes on a dress of light gray,
No stripes have been borne by bewitching St. May.

She's almost too plump and too round for a saint,
With sweet little dimples that Millais might paint;
Though she has no angles nor mortified mien,
No wimple of yellow, nor back-ground of green,
A nimbus of hair throws its bright golden ray
Of glory around the fair face of St. May.

What surquayne or partlet could look better than
My saint's curly jacket of black Astracan?
What coif than that bonnet, perfected with skill,
Or alb than her petticoat edged with a frill?
So sober, yet smiling—so grave, yet so gay,
Oh, where is a saint like my charming St. May?

When the sermon is finished, the blessing quite o'er,
The sparse congregation drift out at the door;
I pause, as I stroll down the gloomy old aisle,
To see my saint pass, and perchance get a smile;
My faith I would change, like the Vicar of Bray,
To pass all my life in adoring St. May.

THE TRYST.

Then I wend my way home to my chambers so drear—
More dull e'en than usual to me they appear—
And then does a vision of brightness arise
Of the pureness and truth in those loving gray eyes;
For not a mere picture or image of clay,
To worship by rubric, is gentle St. May.

Thus all through the week, at each time and each place,
I'm haunted by thoughts of that fair tender face;
I dream of her spirit, so yielding and kind,
Her goodness of heart, and her pureness of mind;
And I long for the hour, and count on the day,
To sit at a distance and gaze on St. May.

No doubt you'll aver you consider it queer
That her name in the calendar ne'er does appear;
They prattled of "May," the sweet sisterly pair,
I added the "Saint"—she was canonized there.
If saints might wed sinners, I'd yield to her sway,
And straightway would fall on my knees to St. May!

A BIT OF SCANDAL.

'Tis the pleasantest hour of all the day,
After the Mall, or before maybe,
When my Lady Mary or Lady Jane
Gives Captain Rattle a dish of tea.

Agreeable Rattle! what pleasant news,
What charmingly wicked tales he tells!
And the last bit of scandal! While he speaks
Each gentle bosom delighted swells.

"'Tis certainly off between young Jack Fane
And little Bellasis—pauvre petite!
All because she went two nights to the play,
And, they do say, secured the same seat.

"'Twas mons'ous odd. And the Duke was there—
I had the truth from a man at White's—
And he certainly bowed her into her chair
Upon one if not both of the nights.

"And now, whether or not a billet passed—
'Twould be quietly done, one understands—
I vow 'tis more than I choose to swear;
But—'tis certain they did shake hands.

"And Jack goes as attaché, that's a fact;
Goes out of the country, don't you see?
'Twas his Grace's influence managed it, too:
How vastly kind of his Grace! He, he!"

And thus the Captain sparkles along,
Pleased with himself, and pleasing the while;
What if a character goes with a shrug,
Or a name is lost through a smile?

Well, that is unfortunate, one must own;
In this the Captain would quite agree:
But chat so enlivens a kettledrum,
And gives such zest to a dish of tea!

SAINT MAY.

A BIT OF SCANDAL.

"I DO NOT LOVE YOU."

IN SIX CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

SHE was leaning in the window of that cold, comfortless room: she would lean there, though he had tried to draw her away. She was a slight, frail-looking creature; her form and her attitude suggested pliability, and told of long-settled despondency. Twining a scarlet thread round and round her finger, she gazed out with unflinching persistence. There was nothing to see: the dismal evening was falling upon the wet street of a dull country-town after a raw drizzling autumn day.

He stood half behind, half beside her—just enough withdrawn to be hidden from passers-by—and watched the pale, drooping profile and the restless fingers. His face—that of a man no longer young—was proud, passionate, and resolute; so were his words, and the impatient movements by which he now and then changed his posture were evident kickings against and revoltings at the pricks which lay between him and the accomplishment of his will. He looked a man unused to be resisted, and whom nothing could so much chafe as the mere fact of defeat, let the object of the struggle have been what it might.

"Give some sign that you at least hear me," he said. As he spoke he possessed himself of an end of that scarlet thread and twitched it from her hold, thinking by this to rouse her. Thus sharply withdrawn it cut through the delicate skin; but neither of them noticed it. The movements of the small hands continued to be much the same as before its withdrawal.

After a pause—during which he watched her with an expression of exasperation growing over his face—he put his hands on her shoulders, turning her toward him, drawing her from the window by a more decided action than he had used before.

"Have you heard any thing I have said?" he asked, as she lifted her mournful eyes to his with a pleading look, while her face told of utter weariness, of heart-ache, of despair.

"Yes, all. I have heard all."

"You have, nothing to say? No answer to make?"

"Only the same words to say, the old answer to make; the words you have heard so often—the words I hardly dare to say to you again—the words that are so true, so dreadfully true, though I have prayed lately—only God knows how fervently—for your sake to be able to believe them false. I do not love you—I do not love you—I do not love you."

"Why echo the hateful sound?" he cried, catching her clay-cold hands—which she was wringing as if in an agony of impotence—in one of his. "To hear those words once is punishment enough for a life of sin, and against you at least I have not sinned. Why echo them? Have I not heard them often enough already to make them ring through my life, sleeping and waking?"

"Give me no cause to speak them again. Be merciful! Leave my soul free. If you asked me for any thing I could give you, were it my life—"

"It is just for that, for your life, that I do ask you."

"But you want it in a way I can not, can not give it! I have no life to give in that way."

"More sophistry. You can give me all I ask for: give me yourself. Life must be very precious to you still since you love it so dearly that you will not trust it to my keeping."

"I can not. You want my life, you say, therefore you want my live self—you want my heart, my soul; and I could only give you what is dead; a dead heart, or just an empty shell—no heart, no soul at all; for," she whispered the last words, "you know that I do not love you, you know even more than that."

"Leave me to judge of what I want," he answered. "Yield your will to mine, with what comes after—let come what may—I will never reproach you. Marry me, give me the right to care for you, never speak those hateful words again. I ask no more from you than this—this you can do."

"You can not bear to hear those words just simply spoken now and then by a being you can leave when you weary of her presence. How will you bear to feel them, see them, in all ways, be made conscious of their truth daily, hourly, on and on, for all the time we are both compelled to stay on earth? How will you bear to have my daily life, day by day, telling you, 'I do not love you?'"

His grasp of her clasped hands tightened till pain sent a crimson flush over her face. It passed away quickly, and she gave no other sign. She knew why he frowned as she finished speaking. She did not know why he had smiled so strangely before he frowned. She had said "will" where she should have said "would," and he had built upon this slight foundation. In spite of that frown he now spoke gently, and with an extreme tenderness softening all his face, saying: "I hardly recognize my tender-hearted little friend to-day; she seems causelessly and willfully cruel. But I answer your cruel questions thus, Lily—I shall not have to bear such torture as you suggest. You shall love me. I feel that the power, might, and heat of my love will absolutely conquer and subdue you. You turn whiter, and you shudder; but I say it shall be so."

A faint smile, half pitying, half incredulous, flickered over her face.

"And I say," she answered, "that my heart is gone out of me—is beyond your power, as it is beyond mine; that there is an obstinate spirit in me, beyond your power and beyond mine; that, if I hated you, I could do nothing to you more cruel than consent to your will: that you had better dig up a corpse from the grave-yard and take that to your heart than make a woman your wife who knows surely and irresistibly, as I do, that she does not, can not love you."

She spoke vehemently, and as if from a sort of inspiration; but then she sickened, and the strength left her limbs. She was not, in any way, equal to a struggle of will with him. It was only his grasp of her hands that now kept her from sinking in a heap at his feet. He gathered her into his arms, saying: "You, dead or living, and no other, will I have here;" he pressed the white blank face, with its closed eyes, into his breast.

Just then the room-door opened. A woman's face looked in for a moment, then was withdrawn, and the door was closed again stealthily as it had opened.

Mr. Elphinstone heard nothing, but he saw this in the cracked mirror surmounting the empty fire-place, opposite which it chanced that he was now standing.

Seeing it he smiled to himself, as if not ill-pleased, and muttered, "One reason more, had I needed it."

He looked round the bare-boarded room—a school-room of the most rigid and comfortless description—for some resting-place more welcome than his arms to his helpless burden. Just then she gathered a little strength, drew herself away from him, and leaning against the table—

"Leave me now—for pity's sake, leave me now," she pleaded.

In that word "now" he read a second sign that she was yielding.

There was no creature in that dismal house to whose kindness he could commend her. It was hard to leave her alone, so ill and ill at ease; but she reiterated her entreaty, and he went. As he looked back at her, before closing the door, he was struck more vividly than ever by the chill and squalor of the place; he set his teeth, and muttered,

"This is not to be endured, and shall not last much longer. I have given way and been patient long enough."

His carriage was waiting for him, not at the door, but at the end of the street. He flung himself into it, and gave the word "home;" then, sitting with his eyes fixed on the place beside him, which was hers already in his imagination—thinking of his wealth and luxury, of her poverty and comfortlessness—contrasting the place in which he had left her and the home he could give her, he set his will firmer and firmer toward winning her.

He knew that to what she had long borne would now be added insult and contumely, probably dismissal and disgrace, and that for her these would be a sentence of starvation. He did not reproach himself—he had taken all reasonable precautions. They had been surprised, her retreat was cut off; it was not his fault, he could not be sorry that circumstances conspired to further his will.

His will! Had he not set his will at least as much as his heart on conquering the resistance of a weak woman? and in setting that will above her pure woman's instinct, did he not tacitly show that he valued his love above the Omnipotent Love to the shelter of which he would not trust her? rather than that, drawing her from it, into what was—for her, because she felt it to be so—sin.

CHAPTER II.

WHEN she had been some time alone, and the life that had ebbed very low in her had slowly flowed back, Lily Winters set herself to think and decide. This was foolish and dangerous; while she trusted to instinct and feeling she was comparatively safe; reason and reflection were less reliable guides. Is this unsound doctrine? I will not preach it then as a gospel of general application, only say that as for Lily Winters so for many women—let moral teachers and philosophers say what they will—feeling is a safer guide than reflection, instinct than reason.

She seated herself on one of the forms, leaning both elbows on the desk in front, buried her hands in her clustering hair, pushing it back from her brow, and set herself to think. She had two hours before her—the last two hours of a week's holiday during which the little girls, her pupils, had been absent on a visit.

When one hour, perhaps, of those two had expired—she was not conscious that more than a few moments had passed—Lily rose, standing upon a wooden stool, for she was but a little woman, and the mirror was hung high, she looked at herself in the clouded glass. It gave no flattering reflection. Look over her shoulder, and see a small face of rather dingy pallor, the lower part of it expressing just now a sort of struggle between spiritual firmness and tenacity and intellectual and physical weakness of will. The upper part of it, with its large, gentle eyes that look as if they had wept away their brightness, and learned to fear always, is fine in a curious half-elfish and yet tenderly human way. The figure looks older than the face—Lily stooped, and often seemed to be shrinking away from the world—but it is not ungraceful; has even, through its suggestion of timid helplessness, its own peculiar charm: it is perverted now rather than represented by an ill-made, ill-fitting, and very shabby dress.

"You were rather pretty once," said Lily to her own face. "But now—why can't he just leave me alone to fade? I look blighted, that is what I look. I shall soon drop off my stalk. It is because I am meant for this, and not for life, that I can not forget—can not forget."

Those last words she repeated many times: after she had turned from the glass and sat down again she repeated them, wringing her tiny hands as she uttered them. How hard she tried to pass her whole life in review—to think it all over; but there were places in which her mind hung as in a choked-up groove. She was not much past thirty, but she had lived her life, as far as love, hope, and joy made part of it. She had loved, and she had hoped with all her power. She had learned to say "had hoped," but could not learn to say "had loved;" her power of loving and living would leave her together. She had known sharp changes of fortune, but of this she neither felt nor thought. She cared nothing for luxury or even comfort. It seemed as if her heart had suffered so much that for the little frail body there was no measure nor means of suffering left.

She had been a petted only child, and an heirless; now she was an orphan—absolutely poor, and absolutely friendless, save for that man who had just left her—a man who had always loved her as child, girl, woman, as she had loved another—a man to whom her parents had owed salvation from ruin, and the peace and ease of their last days; a man, however, from whom she could take nothing, unless she took every thing. If she did this, what could she give him in return? Nothing, she said; every thing, he declared. He had shown by his life that he could not learn to forget her, to have an existence in which she had no part. The love which, unknown to her, had strengthened in him slowly, year by year, had mastered him now. He knew all the story of her love—or almost all—and it made no difference. She had begun to feel lately that there was no escape for her; that she was in the power of his inflexible will; that all of her that was tangible he would grasp and hold. She had thought of flight, but the thing was, there was no escape from consciousness of his suffering, and of the heavy, heavy debt of gratitude she owed. "Life does not leave me as quickly as I believed it would," she thought. "It can not keep in me long—but yet some years, perhaps. I am not more weak and ailing now than I was last autumn. Are there any in the world so miserable that they have no power to give some happiness to another? Is it for this that life lingers in me, that I should try and do some good to him? I have lived my life for myself; but is there any life in me that I could live for him? I do not love him; but could I serve him as if I did? He is alone, as I am; more alone than I am. There is the danger. Am I enough alone to make him feel less alone? He starves in his luxury, he says: he says that he wears his soul out with craving, so that his life is useless, and he might as well not have been born. This is not true: I hear of noble actions that he does; but the misery is that he feels it true. He never loses the consciousness, he tells me, that his heart, as he says I am, is outside in cold and desolation. If I let him take me in, to live under his roof, in his sight, will this bring him any of the ease, and rest, and happiness he thinks? I do not know—not this or any thing."

Poor Lily! She grew more and more perplexed—losing sight of the fixed immutable truth that she had recognized as truth when she only felt.

A little flicker of feverish warmth came into the ash-pale cheeks as she contemplated the sacrifice of herself, and dreamed of the possibility of making one who suffered, with that suffering of the heart which alone she was inclined to own as suffering, less unhappy.

"Be quiet," she whispered. "This is mere selfishness." That was when she was again conscious of the inner voice pleading—"But I do not love him—I do not love him."

It had long been dark outdoors, but the room was not dark; the light of the street-lamp outside fell across the floor. Lily's two hours had more than flown when the door opened, and a woman, large, handsome, and handsomely-dressed, entered, a candle in her hand. She swept up to Lily, so close that it seemed as if she meant to sweep over her, and set her candle down upon the table. Lily had risen, startled by the sudden entrance, dazzled by the sudden light; she was not reassured by the expression of that handsome face, swollen and inflamed by anger.

"I beg your pardon for not being down stairs to receive the young ladies," she began. "I did not know it was so late. I will go directly and put them to bed."

"Stop!" her mistress commanded. "No wonder you 'did not know it was so late,' so well employed as you have been! But I did not come to speak to you about those neglects of duty to which I am so accustomed from you" (that was quite untrue, Lily was scrupulous and conscientious), "but to ask you a question. Are you engaged to Mr. Elphinstone, Miss Winters?"

"Madam!"

"I intend to have an answer. Are you engaged to Mr. Elphinstone, Miss Winters?"

Lily's large, mournful eyes met the furious look fixed on them with gentle wonder.

"I am not," she answered: her sweet voice contrasted strongly with the harsh hoarse tones of the question.

"I thought it not possible, yet any thing else seemed as unlikely." Mrs. Maston glanced with insolent contempt at the little faded creature in the shabby dress, and shook out her own ample, rustling skirts. "Yet I have heard what I am forced to believe, and what obliges me to request that you leave this house immediately—to-night—within an hour! I will permit no further intercourse between you and my little girls—do not dare attempt to see them again."

Lily, perceiving that her mistress was waiting to hear if she had any thing to say, choked down some strong emotion, and murmured:

"Let me kiss Effie again, only let me kiss little Effie once more." She was a poor-spirited creature, you see. Her request was denied, and Mrs. Maston swept out. The handsome widow was almost mad with jealousy. She had played so hard, and she thought so skillfully, to win Mr. Elphinstone. She had taken Lily (whom she disliked from the time she first saw her) into her house to please him, and had never dreamed of finding a rival in "that mean-looking little creature." Something had lately aroused her suspicion, she had set one of her maids to watch, and now she knew of Mr. Elphinstone's visits to the governess, and that this evening he had been seen holding her in his arms.

Lily stood where she had been left. It was dark and late. "Where shall I go?" she asked herself. She was timid: the fact that it was dark and late moved her to a quickened sense of misery and desolation. For its being cold and wet—she heard the rain driven against the window furiously—she did not care. Within the prescribed time Lily left the place: she had remembered one possible refuge—with an old servant whose house she thought she could find—if not, where could she go? She had no money.

CHAPTER III.

It was in Sarah Green's small kitchen that Mr. Elphinstone found Lily next day. She was straining her eyes to catch the last light from the dim window, and hurting her weak hands with coarse needle-work. She had looked almost happy; feeling all day as if she breathed more freely, as if the fresher air from a new life opening before her were blown upon her bracingly. But her face changed when she heard his knock; she gave a shuddering sigh. Having admitted Mr. Elphinstone, and set a chair for him, her companion went out, leaving them together.

The shock of the evening before had roused some courage in Lily. Night had brought her counsel. Having prayed to be delivered from temptation, the way had seemed to grow clear before her. She would go away with Sarah Green—Mr. Elphinstone should not know where—oh, it pained her to pain him! but, with her cleared vision, she had seen that this was the shortest and most endurable pain she could give him—from a distance she would write to him in a way that even he should feel to be final. In the night, after she had prayed, it had been so visible to her that his will was not the will of God for either of them.

And now—she dropped her work and clasped her hands, and set her lips resolutely. If she should have to yield she would struggle first; but, admitting by that "if" the possibility of this yielding, was she not already lost? When he came in she had glanced up at him, but neither of them had spoken; he had read something of her purpose in her face and in her occupation. Now he sat and looked into the fire till Lily felt afraid of the silence and of his face.

"You heard I had left my place," she said.

"I meant to have written to you to say good-by, and to try to thank you for—" She faltered. How could she ever thank him? What was it she had to thank him for? So much, every thing. And how was she going to pay him?

"Where are you going?" he asked, turning upon her almost savagely.

"I hardly know yet. I have not quite arranged my plans." She tried to seem unmoved, but she felt her soul flinch from the expression of his face as he asked—"Is there no pity in your heart, Lily?"

Nevertheless she spoke bravely, and according to the truth, of which she still kept some hold.

"Oh yes, so much—if you only knew; so much that I will save you from yourself, from the life-long torture you propose for yourself. It is not only that" (she lowered her voice as she came to these words) "I do not love you; but I can not, can not, can not" (the words wrung out) "forget. I go on loving; he is somewhere. Sometimes I almost believe, in spite of my knowledge that it is not possible, that he is on earth still: but if not on earth he is in heaven. Love reaches heaven. Life here is only a little piece out of something that was before, and will be after. I go on loving. I love him, I love him, and I do not, can not love you."

Mr. Elphinstone sprang up. He said nothing, but he moved about the place, grating the sanded floor under his feet. Was he moved, or shaken? Lily watched him with clasped hands, parted lip, quivering nostrils. Did he feel that her last appeal was made? Would he yield? If not, what was the will of a woman against that of such a man? Presently he stood still before her. He had been shaken, but he would not yield.

"I thank you, Lily, for being wise for me," he began, and what the peculiar inflection of his voice meant she could not tell. "But I know myself better than a girl like you can know me. Life, and the world too, I know a little more really than you can do. Were there the faintest shadow of the possibility of the truth of what you suggested just now, I would leave you to wait your life out, and never urge you to do any thing but wait. You believe this?"

"Yes, oh yes!"

"But you know there is not that faintest shadow."

"Not as far as man can judge, but with God, you know, all things are possible."

"We have to do with human possibility: we are agreed there is none. Now I will tell you what your seamstress scheme means: for you, slow, sure starvation and shameful danger; for me, a most exquisitely ingenious torture. You see and feel that I am calm and dispassionate now: I have weighed every thing judicially. It is impossible that I should give you up. We are both miserable through some great mistake in life. I know that you can mitigate life for me (I plead in this way, Lily, as the only way to reach your heart), and I believe that in doing this your own misery will find its greatest possible, only possible alleviation. In living for my happiness you will most nearly approach your own. You are a woman, Lily, and not a very hard one.

I am a man, and love you with a strong man's power. I shall prevail—you shall love me! We shall yet be happy. Good Heavens! for all men there is some happiness somewhere in their lives, surely. What have I known of this yet? After what I have suffered—living with my heart hung out as a mark for the blows and scorn of the world, and not able to move a finger for its protection—will it not be happiness to hold it as a jewel inclosed?—to know you, feel you, see you, hear you under the shelter of my roof? Rest will enter my heart when you enter my doors—if you live there and hate me, I shall have more peace than if you were indifferent to me any where else in the world. But you will not hate me."

He looked down upon her, his face aglow with resolute heat. She, a pale, scared thing, looked up at him, powerless. Her will yielded, but not her heart. Her reason yielded, but not her heart; but the poor thing, her heart, was borne down, laid low, and felt the waves break over it.

"I will try and make you happy," she said, after a long silence; "I will live to serve you." Then one last cry was audibly cried by her soul. "Oh, Ralph, have you prayed? It seems to me that you are tempting me to sin—dragging us both down to an unknown depth of misery."

He smiled, laid his hand on her head soothingly, then gently pressed it over her strained eyes, which looked, in their intensity, as if the vexed soul might fly forth through them.

"Where can be your sin, my pure Lily! You sacrifice yourself to me. In the truest sense, you lay down your life for your friend—I am your friend, you know; you have always granted me that title. For the misery—we will prove it."

ART IN COMMON THINGS.

THE CARPET.

IT is very difficult to ascertain who is responsible for the lamentable want of appropriate design and legitimate treatment of both form and color so apparent in the majority of our carpets. The manufacturer blames the retailer, and the retailer imputes the fault to the public—a fault, by-the-way, of which the public appear to be utterly incognizant. A little reflection upon the real use and intention of a carpet is only necessary to discover the incongruities of which we complain.

Now a carpet is, as we all know, a warm covering for an otherwise cold floor; a thing to be trodden constantly under foot, and to meet with every kind of rough usage; to be mercilessly dirtied and mercilessly cleaned. Assuredly it should be strong, and it is; it should be sober in color and sparing in profusion of ornament, and it is not. On the contrary, pure white, delicate cream, blush rose, pale green, all the sweet and lovely and pure colors, in short, which nature reserves for her most delicate work, but denies to sterner things; these we place upon our floors, not to sit upon but to tread upon, and not always with the purest feet. Moreover, we gather together every flower, plant, and tree of Nature's making, with many others of our own invention, till our carpets glow out with a wild profusion of all possible and impossible vegetable forms. Dissatisfied still, we bring the magnifying-glass into action, and so enlarge the natural leaves we condescend to copy that it sometimes takes several breadths of one carpet to complete the gigantic fern or ivy or oak leaves we have honored with our attention. Then from the vegetable to the animal world is but a step, and so we weave tigers, and horses, and baa-lambs, and little boys and little girls, and great dogs in the best velvet pile, and place them for the admiration of mankind. But where? Still to be trodden under foot, still to be systematically dirtied, still to be ferociously cleaned; and yet with a little further advance upon our old wisdom, we advance these triumphs of art to a post of still greater danger and still more dirt, and, in the name of hearth-rugs, we carefully deposit them in front of the fire-place, where the wear and tear is as ten to one compared with any other part of the room—the place where the hot cinders come flying out, and the "maid-of-all-work" upsets the black-lead, or the oil, or any other of the requisites for grate or stove polishing. But we do more. As it is the very first requirement of a floor that it shall be perfectly level and smooth—for if there should happen to be any unevenness or projection down we should go to a certainty, catching our foot therein—we introduce shaded patterns into our carpets, in our love for the appropriate; so that if the thing were what it vainly seems to be, no one, however skillfully he might advance on tip-toe, could cross a modern parlor without his ankles being entangled by wreaths of roses or baskets of fruit, and no one could possibly advance one half-way along any dining-room without tripping up against some Maltese cross, and so falling down upon a collection of instruments of torture, compared with which a fall upon a newly Macadamized road would be a trifle.

These, then, are the principal evils of modern carpet designs: General inappropriateness of color; Undue introduction of the natural; Inappropriate forms; Shading. Of all these the last being infinitely the worst, because founded on the basest views of nature and vulgarity of taste.

From what has been already advanced it will be seen why gay coloring is wrong in any carpet. Just compare a Turkey carpet with an English or a Brussels, and contrast the perfection of coloring in the former with the crudeness and harshness of the latter; and then remember that sober as the one from Turkey is, compared with the gaudiness of the others, people sit on carpets in Turkey as much as they stand upon them, and when they stand have, as a general rule, either bare feet or wear slippers, so that there is a reason for the softness and the beauty of a Turkey carpet; while we, without any such reason, and constantly putting our carpets to a use which would horrify a Turk, make ours still softer and infinitely more gaudy. But judged with respect to its situation, the color of any carpet should be very sober, and never of such a hue as to attract the eye. Down-looking people are regarded as bad people, and we pay our friends a poor compliment by seducing them into veiling their eyes like the hypocrites.

Then let all patterns be small, for even in the largest drawing-room so many fancy tables, and so many chairs and ottomans have to be accommodated, that to see a large pattern is quite out of the question; and as one's position in a room is ever-varying, the patterns ought to be so designed that from all parts of it they shall present the same shape. Let carpets, then, be subdued in tone, small in pattern, and fixed in outline. If the carpet were the only thing in the room it might be made far brighter, perhaps as gay as you pleased; but when the walls have to be decorated, and hung with pictures and looking-glasses, when the cornice is to be colored and gilded, and the room filled with upholstery, carpets should be chosen as a means of showing them to the best advantage, and not with respect to its own magnificence. People buy carpets as if they were the only purchasable thing in the universe.

The same reasons enforce the second rule with respect to the undue introduction of the natural. All honor to Nature. We can never sufficiently admire her works, or spend our lives in tracing out her beauties; but we show neither our love nor our reverence in caricaturing her excellences, especially in caricaturing them by machine-work, which is necessarily coarse. All those magnified leaves and branches are downright ugliness. When Nature enlarges she subdivides, and never increases merely by doubling size, but multiplies quantity as well, so that the small leaf has so many fibres—enough for its sustenance—but the large one has many more. Nature enlarges with tenderness, we with coarseness and clumsiness.

The introduction of inappropriate forms arises from their being designed so that they will present the most showy appearance, instead of so that they will look the best, when in their ultimate position. Of course the manufacturer and the retailer both have their wares to dispose of, and they naturally think that the more eye-pleasing any fabric can be made the more attractive it will prove. It is for the public to correct this delusion, and for the public alone. As long as they will have tigers on their hearth-rugs, so long will the supply equal the demand; and there are other things for them to buy if they will, for all carpet design is not bad, though the worthless is by far the most general.

The last evil that we have to notice in carpet design is the introduction of shading—the last, but certainly not the least. For all others there is some excuse. The love of color is in itself so noble and so good an instinct that its possessor may perhaps be pardoned for indulging therein to excess. But the ingenious draftsman who sets himself down steadily to design a carpet, and to fix the shapes and lines which the threads, flashing through a thousand looms, shall take forever, and having portrayed in some huge cartoon the undigested fancies of his uneducated brain, and then, not content with the effect of his laborer workmanship, adds to it a profusion of dark brown or jet black shade, has with every stroke of his ill-directed brush painted down these facts—that he is an incompetent workman—a blind leader of the blind—ignorant of propriety, ignorant of art, and worse than ignorant of nature.

Let us briefly examine some few of the more manifest fallacies involved in this practice of shading.

Shadow is in all cases caused by the rays of light on any lower or more distant object being intercepted by some other higher or nearer object; and thus the first idea we gather from the presence of shadow is that of projection. But who requires projections in a carpet? And, again, supposing, for the sake of argument, that nail-heads, and crosses, and tree-boughs, and rope-ends were highly appropriate objects for carpet decoration, and that the happiest results could be obtained by pushing them out in every floor, still, then, it would be at once false and futile to attempt to gain the effect of such projections by adding shade to any set patterns, because the position of the shade must depend entirely upon the position of the windows or other openings admitting light; and were the projections real, the shape and size of every touch of shade would be varied throughout the whole length and breadth of the carpet; and, therefore, if one small bit of a shaded pattern is allowed by courtesy to be right, its very rectitude involves the falseness of the rest. And, indeed, so often are carpets that are purchased in ignorance laid down as ignorantly, that it is no common thing to see the shade in a carpet boldly marching toward the light instead of away from it, as by all natural law it is bound to do. So that, viewed in this light only, shading is an utterly futile endeavor to imitate that which is altogether unworthy of being imitated.

Again, all those who have at all studied nature must have observed how beautifully transparent her shade really is. We often hear about gloom into which no eye can penetrate, and such gloom in certain places and at certain times certainly may exist; but the ordinary shades cast by natural objects are, as an invariable rule, exquisitely transparent, and always tending to reveal form, and not obscure it. Also, shade in one place is of one color, and in some other place of another, and is always influenced by the local color of the object on which it falls. But in these wretched carpets the shade is opaque, to begin with; wherever it falls there it obscures, and is of just the same color and depth whatever pattern it falls upon. Shade is introduced into these manufactures solely for the sake of giving them a vulgar brilliancy and a tawdry glare, and whether they violate every natural law or not is a matter of the most supreme indifference to the manufacturer, so that they will but sell. But the public really have the matter entirely in their own hands; let only a very small portion of the carpet buyers shake their heads at and refuse to countenance these shaded carpets; the salesman may for a time look aghast, and redouble his assurances that the thing is "most chaste," "most neat," "most elegant," and that Mrs. Falsetaste, that acknowledged authority in all such matters, furnished her best room with the very pattern last week; if, making up your mind to conquer, you can resist the power of his eloquence, and still persist in your objections, it will soon dawn upon the carpet retailer's mind, and by his means reach the manufacturer's, that the days of shaded patterns are numbered, and that it will be well for him to produce something better with all possible speed.

The carpet is but a type of the universal dearth of design in all our "common things." Through a long, long list we may advance from the basement of our houses to their upper stories, and find little to admire, but much to condemn.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

DID you ever, gentle reader, from a quiet seat in the galleries of the House of Representatives at Washington, watch the movements of the "honorable body" below? If it is a first visit there is a certain fascination, not unmixed with amazement, in striving to comprehend the order (very like disorder it seems) of things, and to gain some idea of what is going on. Perhaps you have taken your post of observation before the business of the day has commenced. All is noise and confusion; but the House is called to order, and the Chaplain offers prayer, during which exercise the outward semblance, at least, of attention and respect is given. Then follows an indescribable scene, which to the novice is quite bewildering. Members rise and walk about, gather in little knots and chat, read the morning papers, write letters, jump up and call out "Mr. Speaker!" but, seeing no opening for them, subside again. A general din prevails, amidst which is heard distinctly the continual snapping of fingers, a signal to the light-footed pages (nice-looking, quiet little boys they are) who swiftly and silently convey documents from one part of the House to another; and above all, and through all, resounds the loud, unvarying voice of the Reading Clerk, who, in a monotonous tone, is constantly announcing the business of the day. "Mr. Speaker!" and "the gentleman from" some State—none but attentive listeners can, from the announcement, tell what State—has the floor. But nobody seems to pay any attention—the "honorable gentleman" talks away, but so does every body else, only in an under-tone—nobody appears to hear or heed. But suddenly one, and another, and another rise to their feet. "Mr. Speaker!" "Mr. Speaker!" resounds through the Hall. "Order!" cries Mr. Speaker; but who cares? down goes Mr. Speaker's hammer with a tremendous thump and a more emphatic "Order!" Probably some did hear what the "honorable gentleman" who had the floor said, after all, and object to it. But to see the House in its perfection of confusion one should be a looker-on from the galleries when some question of personal interest to all the members is introduced—as, for example, the drawing for seats. The assembled House of Representatives bears a ludicrous resemblance to a flock of excited school-boys. Every member springs to his feet—every body talks to his neighbor—every body calls out "Mr. Speaker!" A smothered rumbling pervades the atmosphere. "Thump, thump, thump," goes the hammer, and calls for "Order, or business can not proceed," become threateningly emphatic. The Speaker's voice and hammer, like a jet of cold water on a burning building, at length quench the flames, amidst much sputtering and sissing, and calm ensues.

One becomes accustomed after several visits to the business methods of the House, and they really understand something! But to strangers, and especially to ladies, who often have quite exalted ideas of Congressional gravity and decorum, the first impression is peculiar. And the Ladies' Gallery is well filled during the session of Congress; they seem to find it very entertaining amusement to watch the movements of the Representatives. (Query. Are they thinking of improvements in the future?) And when the noise and bustle of the House becomes wearisome, they go to the Senate Chamber, where business is conducted with a gravity, sobriety, and deliberation which is striking in contrast. About fifteen hundred persons can be accommodated in the galleries of the House of Representatives, and about a thousand in the galleries of the Senate Chamber. And these are usually well filled with attentive, interested, or curious spectators—fashionable ladies and gentlemen, citizens and strangers, foreigners and negroes.

A sensible girl lives in Cincinnati. It is of no use to "advertise" for her—she is already engaged to be married to one of the smartest lawyers in the State. She was left an orphan and without money. About three years ago she obtained a situation as type-setter in a printing-office. She worked faithfully a couple of years, during which time she earned besides her board about $200, and availing herself of the facilities which the printing-office afforded, acquired a good education. At present she is connected with the editorial department of a Cincinnati paper.

A Southern gentleman finds he can not wait the legitimate developments of leap-year; he is lonely, feels the need of having somebody to find fault with, and to grumble at when business matters go wrong; and being of age he has resolved to "come out," and announces that "sealed proposals will be received until 12 o'clock, M., of the 31st December, 1863." He also declares that "every applicant must possess beauty or its equivalent in currency;—she must possess a sweet and forgiving disposition, and when one cheek is kissed turn the other;—she must not wear long dresses on the streets;—nor frequent sewing circles;—nor go round begging for charitable purposes;—nor read the paper first in the morning;—nor talk when the advertiser is sleepy;—nor sleep when he is talking;—nor borrow money from his vest pockets while he sleeps;—she must not sit up for him when he happens to be detained to a late hour on his committee;—she must believe in sudden attacks of chills, and make allowances for their effects upon the nervous system;—all proposals must be accompanied with a red stamp and satisfactory evidence of the ability of the applicant to support a husband in the style to which he has been accustomed."

Some other advertisements may suit other parties, or serve as models. A Paris paper contains a paragraph which literally translated, reads as follows: "A young lady of forty-eight, having a moderate income, but possessing a patent for a new invention, wishes to marry a gentleman of sixty-five, well versed in chemistry." Also a new style of cards is in vogue in Paris, which gives a happy suggestion. The form is:

MONSIEUR JEAN JULE,

PROUD BROTHER,
Receives alms at his residence,

No. — Rue —.

The sentimental youth who feelingly remarked that "even as nature benevolently guards the rose with thorns, so does she endow women with pins," is, doubtless, the inventor of the following new form for a common question:

"My dear Miss, would you sacrifice your own convenience to my pleasure, and present the five digits and part of the extremity of your contiguous arm to the aperture formed by the crooking of my elbow against the perpendicular part of my mortal corporosity?"

A party of unfortunate, chattering ladies recently received a public reproof at a matinee in Chicago. The play of "Elizabeth" was upon the stage, and one of the most impressive scenes in progress; but, with neither appreciation nor courtesy, the occupants of one of the boxes continued talking in so loud a tone as seriously to interfere with the comfort of the audience and the convenience of the actors. Mrs. Lander endured the annoyance until patience seemed no longer a virtue. She turned to the box and said: "Ladies! It will be impossible to proceed with this play until you cease your conversation and behave yourselves." The rebuke was effectual.

While good-breeding is in general in the ascendant at places of public entertainment among us, occasionally a rude party annoy a great number, and gain an unenviable notoriety by a gross disregard of all rules of propriety. Some of the Philharmonic Rehearsals, and even the Concerts, have been thus seriously disturbed. The admirers of Mrs. Kemble have, in some instances, become indignant at the useless parade and confusion made by late comers, and at the inopportune changing of seats. True politeness leads one in public places to regard the comfort of others.

Mrs. Kemble's Readings have not only awakened the warm admiration of her former admirers, but all lovers of Shakspeare find it a rich treat to listen to her. Time has ripened and matured her powers, and mellowed her voice, which is full, strong, and clear. Shakspeare becomes a new author, an unexplored mine of treasures, to those who listen to its interpretation by such a reader.

"Norwood" will presently be given to the public in convenient book form. In his preface to the book Mr. Beecher speaks of his having first undertaken the writing of it as a relaxation from the exhausting excitement of public affairs, by turning his mind into entirely new channels of thought and interest; but that he found that plot and counterplot, the due proportion of parts, the whole machinery of a novel, seemed hopelessly outside of his studies. He however, says: "By interesting my readers, if I could, in the ordinary experiences of daily life among the common people, not so much by dramatic skill as by a subtle sympathy with nature, and by a certain largeness of moral feeling, I hoped to inspire a pleasure which, if it did not rise very high, might, on that account, perhaps, continue the longer. I had rather know that one returned again and again to parts of this most leisurely narrative than that he devoured it all in a single passionate hour, and then turned away from it sated and forgetful."

When spring opened with the severely-cold weather which the rich had not anticipated and the poor were in nowise prepared for, a lady in this city set an example worthy of imitation. She commenced giving one meal a week to the poor, promising to feed one hundred every Wednesday. She has made the necessary arrangements for carrying this plan into operation. Many private individuals, as well as organized bodies, are in like manner striving to lessen the suffering which our protracted winter weather has so fearfully increased. If such charities would only become the fashion among ladies who have abundant means, what comfort would be given, and what reflex blessing be received!

"Guild Court," Mac Donald's latest novel—all of Mac Donald's works, by-the-way, afford choice reading—contains some quaint bits of poetry. From one we quote a verse which is unique:

"Sunshine fair!	Take the death.
Of the saint	'Tis in vain
Gild the hair;	To complain,
Wake the child,	And implore
With his mirth,	Thee to glide,
Send him wild.	Thee to glow,
To the faint	In my mind:
Give new breath;	For my care
From the earth	Will nevermore
Take the death,	Rise and go."

A new novel by Shirley Brooks is said by the London critics to be remarkable for its "perfection of character painting." It is also absorbingly interesting, the style is sparkling, and the moral tone thoroughly good. "My Husband's Crime," is the name of a new American novel which will be read with interest. Just as we are hoping for spring-like days, it is pleasant to see Miss Warner's charming juvenile story, "The Three Little Spades." It breathes an atmosphere of purity and fragrance, and will be welcomed by the children, who will be incited by its perusal to engage in the pleasing and healthful occupation of cultivating flowers. A great many "little spades" will be in demand when the frost is once fairly out of the ground.

Sack with Breton Embroidery.

THIS sack is of blue cashmere, lined with silk, and thinly wadded, and is trimmed, as shown in the illustration, with a strip of white cashmere ornamented with Breton embroidery, executed with colored crochet silk. Split zephyr worsted may be used instead of silk. The jacket is cut from the same pattern as the sack with hood, No. I., Figs. 1-5.

STYRIAN JACKET.—BACK.

For pattern see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 27-31.

Styrian Jacket.

THIS is a tight jacket of an entirely new design, and made of white and blue cloth, trimmed with blue ribbon, colored silk embroidery, and blue silk tassels. The jacket can also be made more simply, and equally beautiful, of light and dark brown silk—the embroidery being in brown silk, and the trimming and tassels of the same color. Black silk and velvet, embroidered in either black or colored silk, is also a pretty arrangement. The jacket must be lined with suitable material. Cut of white cloth, with white lustring as lining, both fronts from Fig. 27; also from Figs. 28 and 29 each two pieces, from Fig. 30 the back in one piece, and from Fig. 31 the pieces for the sleeves. The back part of the skirt is to be cut out in the middle according to the pattern, along the straight line on Fig. 30, and in its place a piece of blue cloth is set on under the other. After embroidering the outside, as shown in the pattern, lay it on the lining, and sew the parts together, as shown by the numbers on the pattern. Sew in the sleeves, and finish, according to the pattern, with the trimming and tassels. Add, finally, three flaps of blue cloth, which are fastened at the neck behind; these are also trimmed with tassels. A belt of the same material is fastened by hooks and eyes. To this are added two ends of blue and three flaps of white cloth, which are joined by a rosette of blue cloth.

wide and narrow lace. Cut from the outside and lining, from Figs. 21-25, two pieces each, taking care to allow for seams, and to complete Figs. 25^a and 25^b by adding the overplus pieces according to the letters (see the shape reduced to $\frac{1}{16}$ the full size in the supplement); then cut two pieces for each sleeve from Fig. 26. Make a slit in the outside and lining of each front from 1 to 2; sew the bosom pleats from 1 to 3, and set in the gore, Fig. 22, to correspond with the figures on the pattern. Baste the outside on the lining; lay two double box-pleats in the upper part of the back, Figs. 25^a, 25^b, and two single pleats in the side from \times to \bullet ; then join it with Figs. 23 and 24. Gather the back and fronts on the side from \ast to \bullet , join them to correspond with the figures on the pattern, and cord the paletot round the edge. Sew a loop formed of a bias fold of satin, two inches wide, edged with lace an inch and a half wide, over the gathers in each side seam, and trim the paletot round the bottom with lace two inches wide. Set a cuff on the sleeves, formed of a bias fold of satin, three inches wide, edged round the hand with narrow, and on the top with broad lace. Cord the arm-holes, and sew in the sleeves, covering the same with an epaulet made of a bias fold of satin, edged with narrow lace. The belt is also made of a bias satin fold, three inches wide, edged with lace, and covered, where it closes, with a loop similar to that on the sides; this

Sack trimmed with Braid.

THIS sack is of purple cashmere, thinly wadded, and lined with black silk, trimmed with beads and narrow black and white braid, and closed in front with metal buttons. Figs. 41 and 42 give the design for the trimming. The sack is cut from the pattern of the sack with hood, No. I., Figs. 1-5.

Watteau Paletot.

THIS new and elegant paletot is made of black satin, lined with silk. It is quite long, and is looped up at the sides. The back is full, and is laid in box-pleats, under which a belt is passed, which encircles the waist. The trimming consists of bias-folds of the same material, corded, and belt is passed under the pleats through a slit in Fig. 25^a, the edges of which are corded. Finish the neck with hook and eye.

Low-Necked Waist for Evening Dress.

The original of this waist is of gray silk gauze. The trimming consists of folds of the same material, arranged in the form of a bertha, bordered with gray satin, and ornamented with gray satin bandeaux. The waist is trimmed, besides, with bows of blue satin and epaulets of gray and blue satin. The same pattern may also be used for making waists of other ma-

37, and set it into the arm-hole, so that 36 shall lie opposite 36 on the front. Fasten the epaulet in with this seam. Fig. 38 gives the pattern of a part of this. According to this, prepare a strip of blue satin, twenty-two inches long, and a similar strip of gray satin; join the two on the outer sloping border, and lay in pleats on the straight side, fastening \times on \bullet , as shown in Fig. 38, so that the length shall be reduced to ten inches, and sew it in with the sleeve, taking care that the \times shall be opposite \bullet on the front, so that the blue satin lies next the waist.

For the simulated bertha trimming, cut from Figs. 36 and 37 each two pieces. The fronts are arranged in seven folds lying upward, each one inch wide and one-third of an inch apart, so that the pleated part shall be about four inches in width, and only half this width on the shoulders. A lower fold of the same material must be added, which shall appear like a broad band. The front is ornamented with a band of blue satin an inch and a half wide. The folds for the back are similarly arranged, and are composed of six folds an inch wide; and this trimming, which is arranged like that on the front (see pattern of back and terials, such as light wash goods, silk, or other light stuffs, the trimming being chosen to suit the dress. For the waist, cut of fine muslin as lining, and the outside, two pieces each, from Figs. 32 and 33, allowing, in Fig. 32, an inch and a half for the hem on the front. Cut the back in one piece from Fig. 34. Hem the fronts, sew the hooks on the right side and the eyes on the left, and stitch up the bosom pleats. Then join the fronts and back; put small whale-bones in the bosom pleats and the seams under the arms, and cord the waist on the upper and lower edge. For the sleeve cut a muslin piece from Fig. 35, and cover it with a puffing. This consists of a bias piece six inches in width and twenty-seven in length, and is cut on the upper side from the middle, sloping toward the ends, where it should be only four inches wide. Fold this in pleats in the length of the material, according to the muslin sleeve, and finish on the under edge with a band half an inch wide. Sew up the sleeve from 36 to Slipper of Java Canvas.

MATERIALS: Light reddish-brown Java canvas, green lustring, green filoselle and twisted silk, green ribbon half an inch and an inch in width; wadding, two cork soles.

This pretty slipper is easily made of light-brown Java canvas, embroidered in point russe with green filoselle, and lined with green lustring. The lining and wadding are quilted in diamonds with green silk. The soles are of cork. The trimming is composed of quilted ribbon. For each slipper cut the top of canvas, lining, and wadding from Fig. 39, and the soles from Fig. 40. The design accompanying Fig. 39 is for the little revers, which is cut of canvas and silk. Now work the canvas in green filoselle silk, as shown in the illustration; bind the top with narrow silk ribbon, and sew the revers to the front. Trim the under edge so that the lining shall exactly fit the outside. Finish with a sole of lining and wadding, which is cut like the cork sole from Fig. 40, and is placed inside of the latter. Lastly, trim the slipper as is shown in the illustration, with a double quilting of green ribbon, an inch wide. The heel is laid inside, as shown by the dotted line on Fig. 40.

MISERY AND POVERTY.

A Flemish Legend.

OUR Lord Jesus Christ and St. Peter chanced to be journeying one day in the suburbs of Bergues St. Winoc, one of the prettiest villages in Flanders. They were dressed more simply than usual, like men whose position was sure, and who did not need to throw dust in the eyes of the vulgar. On their way the ass that they rode cast a shoe, perceiving which they stopped at the forge of Peter Lambrecht, nicknamed Misery by all the country round about, because he was so miserably poor. The blacksmith was hard at work with no other companion than his dog Poverty, that licked his hands from time to time, and fixed on him his large melancholy eyes, as if to say, "Courage, master; your life is a hard one; but your faithful friend Poverty loves you dearly."

Our Lord asked the blacksmith if he would shoe his ass.

"Come in and sit down," he answered, "and I will attend to you at once."

Christ and St. Peter seated themselves; and Misery shod the ass with a shoe of silver, while Poverty suffered the strangers to caress him—a great proof of esteem on his part.

"What do I owe you?" asked Christ, when the work was finished. "Nothing," answered the blacksmith, who thought himself dealing with those that were poorer than he.

Our Lord, who knows every thing, naturally read Misery's thoughts. "Since you are so good and generous," said he, "I give you liberty to make three wishes."

"Good!" said Misery, without manifesting the least surprise. And he began to reflect what he should ask.

"Choose Heaven," whispered St. Peter in his ear.

"I wish first," resumed Misery, "that none who sit in my arm-chair may be able to leave it without my permission."

"Granted," said Christ.

"In the second place—"

"Choose Heaven," repeated St. Peter, this time a little louder, pulling the blacksmith by his coat-sleeve.

"Let me alone," exclaimed Misery, abruptly, not liking to be disturbed in his reflections. "In the second place," he continued, "I wish that none who climb the walnut-tree in my garden may be able to come down again without my permission."

"Granted," said our Lord.

"In the third place—"

"Choose Heaven now," cried St. Peter, vehemently.

"In the third place," he went on, raising his voice, "I wish that nothing which goes in my little leather purse may be able to leave it without my permission."

"Very well; all shall be as you desire," said Christ. And, wishing Misery good-day, he set out with his apostle, St. Peter, who did not conceal his displeasure.

A few months after our Lord's visit hard times came on, and the blacksmith fell into such wretchedness that his name was better suited to him than ever. He had used up his last bit of iron, and given his last crust to Poverty.

Darkness came on, to add to the gloom of the extinct forge. He laid his hammer in a corner and seated himself on his anvil, bitterly regretting that he had not asked for a little money instead of making those three wishes, which had been of no use to him. While he was plunged in reverie some one knocked at the door.

"Come in!" he cried, without stirring.

The latch was raised, and a little man, bent with age, entered.

"Misery, you look sad," said he.

"Yes," answered the blacksmith, "and I have good cause for it. Once I was rich, and now I am poor."

"Is that all? That misfortune can be remedied; I can easily make you as rich as the sea is deep."

"If you could do this I should look on you as the greatest among men."

"I will do it, but on one condition, namely, that in ten years you will give me your soul."

"What am I to do?"

"Sign your name in your blood to this parchment."

"Gladly," cried the blacksmith. "Better sell my soul to the devil than grovel all my life in want!" And, dashing his hand against the anvil, he signed his name with the drops of blood that spirted forth. The little old man seized the parchment and went off chuckling.

Misery now had as much money as he desired. Every morning he filled his pockets, ate, drank, and sung all day long, and commenced over again the next morning. But his happiness was too complete to last; the ten years passed quickly, and the devil returned to the forge in the form of a little old man to carry off Misery's soul.

"Sit down in my arm-chair," said the blacksmith, when he had admitted Satan; "you must be tired from your long journey. You will not be the worse for a little refreshment; I have a fine ham and some strong beer in my cellar."

The devil seated himself, stretched out his lame leg, and felt a sense of comfort steal through his frame. While he was dozing in the arm-chair, and dreaming of the savory ham and foaming beer, Misery took from his forge an iron bar, with which he entered, whistling a popular air.

"Before eating our ham," said he, "we have some other little affairs to discuss."

And he began to cudgel Satan with such violence that he soon was black and blue. The poor devil gnashed his teeth with rage, and tried to rise and seize Misery; but it was impossible—he was glued fast to the arm-chair.

"Let me go!" he howled.

The blacksmith continued his blows.

"Let me go! Pardon!"

The blacksmith struck harder than ever.

"Let me go, and I will give you a respite!"

"That's talking reason. I will stop beating you; but before you leave this arm-chair you must promise me ten years longer, and as much money as I have had since your first gracious visit."

"I promise!" cried the lame man.

"Very well; go along, old fellow," said Misery, and the devil limped off, rubbing his sides.

Misery's life again became one long season of rejoicing; feasts followed feasts, songs songs, and bottles bottles; but alas! ten years pass quickly when we are happy. One day when he least expected it the blacksmith saw entering his house, not the old devil, who was afraid of him, but a goodly number of sturdy imps, adorned with a pair of huge horns and an immense tail.

"My friends," said Misery, in apparent good-humor, "we are just in the midst of nutting time, and a succulent nut is a feast unknown in the land you come from. While I am putting a few touches to my dress, so as to be fit to travel in your honorable company, if you have a fancy to climb my walnut-tree do so without ceremony."

The demons did not wait for a second invitation, but in less than a minute scrambled pell-mell up the tree. Misery hastened to his forge, kindled his fire which had not been lighted for twenty years, heated the rod red-hot with which he had beaten his former adversary, and, armed with this weapon, punched his new guests till they shrieked Fire and Murder! in agony; nor did he cease tormenting them till they promised to let him live ten years longer, and to give him as much money as in the past. As soon as the bargain was concluded the imps limped off, only too glad to be gone.

Misery gayly passed his new ten years, which fled like a happy dream. This time, however, all the able-bodied demons in the infernal regions came for him, with Lucifer himself at the head of the army.

When the blacksmith saw this formidable band he trembled for a moment, but soon calmed himself on reflecting that vanity was the vice that had destroyed the demon.

"I have been assured," said he to Lucifer, who advanced, frowning, "that if it were your good pleasure you could make yourself so small that this purse would hold both you and your worthy company. If this were true it would be a very convenient way of traveling. I myself could carry you a bit of the way."

Lucifer somewhat distrusted the blacksmith, but he could not divine his ruse. On the other hand, he was proud to show that he was capable of accomplishing impossibilities. In the twinkling of an eye the whole army was in the purse, which Misery shut quickly.

"Ah, you horned tribe! you are in my power now," he cried, "and I will be revenged on you." And rushing to his shop he placed the purse on the anvil, and raising his huge hammer with a vigorous arm, let its whole weight fall on the unhappy demons, who were soon as flat as a dollar. The wretches uttered shrieks that made the earth tremble.

"Cry, howl," said the blacksmith; "it is music to my ears!"

"Pardon! Spare us!"

"No," said the blacksmith. "I have a little money left; I shall live some time longer, and when I die a natural death I shall take you with me, and hinder you from doing harm to my fellow-men." And he put the purse into his pocket.

The very next day the strangest things began to be seen every where. One of Misery's friends returned him a hundred dollars of which he had cheated him at play, and the inn-keeper served him wine made of grapes; but as there are two sides to every picture, the inn-keeper's wife no longer smiled on him when her husband's back was turned. Nephews no longer desired their uncle's death; usurers no longer lent money at over six per cent.; as men no longer spent their nights in dissipation, and consequently no longer suffered from broken constitutions; and as they only ate to live, and were no longer sick of indigestion or any other disease the physicians were ruined. As they no longer fought there were no more promotions in the army. Women were no longer either coquettes, or gossips, or mercenary, or unfaithful, or deceitful, and became unbearable to every one, especially to their husbands. Life was horribly monotonous.

No one could understand whence came this chronic virtue, more deplorable than the most deplorable calamities, whose causes are generally known, and whose end can be foreseen. Commissions were appointed, which, like all commissions, past or to come, ended in smoke; all verified the evil, but none could find the remedy. Prizes were offered whoever should discover a vice, no matter how small. Volumes were written against virtue, as formerly against vice, full of letters, words, and phrases, but the ideas wherein had been forgotten.

The Count of Flanders, who was reigning when these strange events took place, followed the example of the celebrated caliph in the "Thousand and One Nights," and traversed his kingdom in disguise. On reaching the house of Misery, a frightful noise attracted his notice.

"What is the matter here?" he exclaimed.

Misery showed the purse, and related every thing to his sovereign, who told him, to his great astonishment, what evil he had done in endeavoring to do good. The blacksmith was deeply grieved; nevertheless, he did not forget to ask for his parchment and his money before delivering Lucifer and his band. The promise made he untied the purse, and the whole host flew away, as if St. Michael were after them. The vices flowed back as if by enchantment, and every one was happy.

The blacksmith lived anew like a prince, and Poverty like the dog of a bishop. The one drank from a Bohemian glass goblet, and the other ate from a silver porringer and wore a furred blanket in winter, as if he had been a human being. But one tires of every thing, even of happiness. Misery wished to die. Feeling himself a little indisposed, he called in the best physician in the country. The practitioner, who never was wanting in his duty to a patient, promptly signed his passports for another world.

The blacksmith once dead, he went composedly, with his faithful dog, who had insisted on following him, to knock at the gates of Paradise. Unluckily the Apostle that carries the keys has a long memory; when he saw the man who had despised his counsels, he said, grumblingly,

"You might have chosen heaven, you obstinate old blockhead, but you would not listen to me. You shall not come in here, I tell you, once for all." And without further ceremony he shut the door in his face.

Misery was not very well pleased with this beginning, but, obliged to submit, he went to purgatory.

"You have no petty sins on your conscience," a voice cried to him before he reached the door; "this is no place for you."

"Well, there is nothing left for me but the infernal regions," murmured Misery, smiling.

On reaching the palace of Satan he pulled the bell. A poor shriveled-up demon, who acted as door-keeper, opened a wicket, and peeping through, recognized the terrible blacksmith who had beaten him to a jelly; upon which he rushed back, shouting to his comrades not to open the door, for Misery was there. Nobody dared to set one foot before the other, and the unfortunate blacksmith, after waiting a long time, was obliged to go away with his dog.

And therefore it is that Misery and Poverty are doomed forever to infest the earth.

FOR GENTLEMEN ONLY.

IN ordinary, smooth-sailing weather a passenger on board ship should hold his tongue. But if the passenger discovers a leak, I suppose he is bound to call out as lustily as though he were the captain himself. On this principle I, plain Pleiades Lumpkin, venture to call the attention of gentlemen to the remarkable report of the mate of the ship Nile.

This vessel, we are told, sailed along the coast of a new continent in the Polar seas, and approached within fifteen miles of the land. We hear, also, that the lower part of the land was covered with vegetation, and that ranges of mountains were seen stretching away in the distance; and we are left to infer that, unable to get nearer, the Nile then sailed away.

This, however, was not the case. A boat's crew, under the command of Mr. Hardy the mate, effected a landing; and the men spent several days among the inhabitants of this remarkable country, of which a record is presented in the report above-mentioned. For reasons which will become evident, this report was at once suppressed; but copies of it have circulated privately from hand to hand, and one is now in my possession. On reading it it seemed to me desirable to suppress it, and still more desirable to publish it. I therefore present it with as much privacy as can be insured by the title and in my own language, the original report being too lengthy.

Wrongelis, as the new continent was named by Captain Long, is not a desert of rocks, thinly covered with stunted Arctic growths. It is traversed by noble highways, and covered with fine buildings. It has also many railways, which are said by the inhabitants to connect the earth with the moon and other planets. Their time-tables are made out in this manner:

MOONVILLE AND SUN R.R.
FROM MOONVILLE. FOOT OF GALAXY STREET.

Leave	A.M.	P.M.
Moonville	6.30	7.00
Moon	6.43	7.12
Mercury	7.16
Staropolis	7.18
Mars	7.30	..

Mr. Hardy says that the day they left there was advertised a picnic for Saturn; and "that such things and such time-tables gave him an odd sensation." I should think that they might.

The inhabitants of Moonville, to call their continent by the name that they themselves have given it, are of the Saxon race; and are tall, handsome, intelligent, and hospitable. All their theories of science differ from ours. They were scarcely able to believe that we supposed the earth to be round; and even their politeness could not restrain their laughter when they learned our notions of gravitation, of the earth's revolving motion, and the distance at which we place the moon. Hardy states that the facts as given by him were published in all the papers, and that he saw them afterward in the Disc (a paper published every afternoon in the moon), copied, under the heading of "best joke of the season."

Their social system closely resembles ours, its chief point of difference being the character and manner of education of the women. An old maid is scarcely to be found. An extravagant woman is unknown. An unreasonable woman or a silly woman is avoided like a pestilence, while delicate and ugly women are rare exceptions to the general rule. These facts they claim as results of their system of education, which is regulated by law. No woman is allowed to waste time in a study for which she shows no fitness. The teaching of smatterings and odds and ends of knowledge is prohibited under heavy penalties. No woman's education is pronounced complete till she has received a diploma for housekeeping and seamstressing.

No woman's education is pronounced complete till she has given some attention to the ordinary methods of transacting business, and has mastered a trade or profession.

No woman is competent to marry till the Committee of Public Examiners pronounce her education complete.

Every woman is expected to follow her trade or profession till she marries, when she formally renounces it for household duties, unless compelled by misfortune or the death of her husband to resume it.

Every woman is required to devote certain hours of the day to out-of-door exercise!

All these regulations are rigidly enforced, and once a year, on the awarding of diplomas of "complete education," as they term it, the history of this system is read aloud. It is equally curious with the regulations.

Till the year 1800 no distinct system of education had been adopted. Women were taught and married at hap-hazard. There were good women and wise women; but if the journals of that date are to be believed, worthless, vain, and silly women were vastly in the majority. It grew to be the fashion to attribute most of the evils of which the community complained directly or indirectly to women. The prevailing extravagance was credited to them. The almost sordid devotion to trade was forced on fathers and husbands, it was said, by their continual demands for money. The growing reluctance among young men to marry was alleged to be due partly to the impossibility of maintaining such expensive loveliness on an ordinary income, and partly to the general dislike of their folly. The national ill-health was only to be expected in the sons of mothers who seldom drew a breath of pure air, spent their days on a sofa and their nights in a ball-room, and lived on sweets; and the domestic unhappiness, divorces, and scandals that filled the newspapers were another result of the want of domesticity and brainless vanity of wives and mothers.

These dreadful accusations were not lumped together, but appeared in dribbles, here to sharpen a paragraph, and there to pad an article, and were softened and dulled by the stock compliments about the angelic tendencies of the sex.

But the inhabitants of Moonville have an officer who is called the Mirror. It is his duty to collect from the leading journals, day by day, the articles bearing on public interests, and to classify them. At the end of every three years these are presented to the public in a book, arranged in their order. Very naturally, when under the head of "Women" these deplorable assertions were given in a mass, intense excitement ensued. The women protested. The men appointed a committee to collect statistics, with a view of ascertaining the truth; for it was argued that such wives and mothers endangered the existence of a nation. The committee, in spite of the efforts made to bribe or frighten them, reported unfavorably to the general female character. The excitement grew. Rewards were offered for a remedy, and for the best essays on the existing evil.

Finally it was decided to open a court of social misdemeanors and domestic mismanagement.

The first complaint was preferred by a husband against a wife. Charge, Reckless Extravagance. One of the best lawyers from the Moon was engaged to defend the lady, and the court was crowded with anxious listeners.

The husband simply presented the court with a list of his wife's expenses and his own debts, alleging that all attempts to make her comprehend his embarrassed position had failed in producing any thing except a storm of tears or a fit of pouting.

The lawyer in reply admitted the charges, but pleaded extenuating circumstances in the lady's education. He said that you could not justly accuse a man of extravagance who had never heard of or seen gold if, stumbling on a gold-mine, he threw lumps of gold about like pebbles, and in one sense you might say that this lady knew nothing of money. Before her marriage she ordered whatever she fancied, and her father paid for it without question, or refused without explanation. In the one case she thought that he simply did what was his duty; in the other, she simply called him stingy; and at no time was she ever taught to reason on the subject by a fixed income which she could handle herself. As for her husband's "reasonings," if you told an Englishman in the Choctaw language that the house was on fire, would you expect him to budge? What did she know of embarrassments? Business was to her a gold-mine, and her father or husband the somewhat rusty and unwilling machinery, needing a certain amount of teasing to set in motion, but always bringing out the gold at last. As a man he deplored the facts, but what else, in the name of justice, could you expect from such an education?

The judges noted the fact, and reserved their decision.

A father preferred the next charge against his daughter.

She was, he said, the puzzle and despair of his life. How any creature's brains could so run on sashes, feathers, bonnets, and gowns, passed his comprehension. You might suppose that she was some Alexander, trying to conquer a mantua-making world, by the vim with which she followed up new modes and devised new toilettes; while her life resembled that of a whirlingig or a humming-top: for when she was not asleep she was driving or making visits, and when she was not doing that she was dancing the galop. A reasonable or a serious thought never entered her head.

The lawyer replied as before, that there were extenuating circumstances. He said that on inquiry he found this to be a lively-spirited girl, with plenty of animal spirits, and much ambition. Being a girl she had but one outlet for this ambition, with which Divine Providence had somewhat unnecessarily supplied her, and that was in the feminine world of fashion. It was simply the desire for distinction, which would urge the young man on to success in business or his studies, that inspired her with this mantua-making fury. As for the galop, he considered it a life-preserver for a generation of girls with bodies full of muscles, which the proprieties forbade them to exercise except in a slow walk.

A young man here took exception, and suggested that such young ladies might employ their suffering muscles in house-work.

But the advocate brought twelve refined and handsome young ladies, compelled by poverty to such labor, who deposed that in consequence they lost caste, not only with ladies but with gentlemen; and said that gentlemen left them in corners for plain girls, who could afford to be idle all day and to wear fine clothes.

The lawyer then observed that work, simply as work, without any prospect of reward, was repugnant to all classes. That a woman's labor brought her no prospect of advancing her fortunes and endangered her social position. That while this state of things continued, and girls were endowed with an ambition for which there was no legitimate object, he would recommend the learned judges to suspend their decision, which they did.

A mother next appeared with a daughter, who, like Mr. Sparkle, had a monomaniacal tendency for falling in love with undesirable young persons. She declared that her daughter laughed and jeered at worthy men because they wore large boots, or made an awkward bow, while she was with difficulty restrained from marrying one worthless fop after another, because he possessed a fine mustache and a power for small talk.

The advocate observed, in reply, that such a statement was unluckily true of many thousands of young ladies, but that the cause was not far to seek. It requires education to teach a baby that the candle will burn, while the dull India rubber ring is its best friend. It requires even more training to teach the same lesson in morals to children of a larger growth. Experience tells the mother that certain lines in the face and looks in the eye betoken the fool or the knave. The girl has no such experience; and for training, when any thing serious is discussed, she is sent out of the room. She naturally admires what is handsome, easy, and graceful, and, like the baby, concludes that it must be good. An unfortunate conclusion, producing unfortunate marriages, but what are you to do about it?

The learned judges, not knowing what to do just yet, suspended this decision also; and a wife was introduced, who complained that her husband, from a fond lover, had grown cold and neglectful.

The lawyer replied, that here was a serious accusation; that undoubtedly it was a man's duty always to love his wife; but that this was not always possible. Where a man married a woman for her pink cheeks and bright eyes he undoubtedly began the evil by committing an error in judgment. But look how dearly he must pay for this error! To say nothing of the fading of the pink cheeks, he at least became accustomed to them. He was also only too apt to discover that his wife was silly or unreasonable. Women had such a very small hold on the serious interests of this life that what could you expect? They were like children; taught religion and expected to let their thinking be done for them by their masculine relatives. It was done for them. They seldom handled or considered any broader topic than a shade in worsted. Hence it followed that though they were kind-hearted, loving, and in some ways generous, they were narrow-minded, undisciplined, timid, ignorant, and unreasoning. There is nothing more mulish than unreasoning ignorance; and however duty might insist that a man should love and respect a wife who continually vexed him and was incapable of understanding an argument, it was not easy to avoid falling into neglect and indifference.

Next, there was brought up a woman who had insisted on casting a vote. The advocate stared at her aghast, whereupon the lady spoke for herself.

She said that she had no desire for the vote in itself. But that she had heard for a long time that it was unwomanly even to wish for such a thing. That she thought that a vote was an opinion, expressed by a printed ticket. That she, like other women, had already an opinion on most political topics. That as for dropping a ticket in a box she had often done it at railway ferries. That she was curious to see, then, where or in what consisted the enormity of the transaction. That she was not at all affected, mentally or morally, and that she believed that if women could vote if they chose they would interest themselves in matters outside of the milliners' shops.

The court here adjourned for consideration of the notes already taken, and after much debate it was decided that the evidence in all the cases pointed direct at a radical defect in the system of female education; and after various experiments the system quoted above was adopted. But now occurred an unexpected result to which I would ask your particular attention.

These healthy, well-balanced, thoroughly-educated young women, having each a profession, were independent of marriage as a resource. They all desired and intended to be married; but the constant want of a home, pretty gowns, or a position, was not there to spin them headlong and blindly into matrimony. All these things they could earn. Their business training had also somewhat matured their judgment and sharpened their powers of observation; and these young women demanded a change in the men. A man no longer stood a chance with them on the strength of his tailor's fit or his well-bred composure alone. They had acquired that faculty which we so often heedlessly wish them when we see a sweet girl wasting her affection on a man whom every other man knows on the instant for a third-rate man, if not a scoundrel. Very fine in the abstract; but how should we like it applied to ourselves—we who are not heroes, but very mediocre individuals? Here is what your reforms and agitations on the woman question must end in. The women will raise their standard, and the men must come up to it. Fancy the throes, the convulsions, that must have agitated the society of Moonville before its men and women were properly educated in the science of living! And what do you suppose became of that generation of men like me, too old to learn and not old enough to die?

Hitherto, entrenched behind the precedent of six thousand years, and seeing Mrs. Lumpkin and every body whom I have the honor to know, still tranquilly puddling in spite of the advocates of female suffrage, I have been indifferent to the woman question. But with such a report, though it did come from a Polar continent, how shall I—how shall any thinking man—know tranquillity again?

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

PARIS, February 19, 1868.

AMONG the places which have amused me as I have wandered about the city, with a juvenile companion who often joins my walks, is a Bazar or open store of toys and fancy articles, which we passed the other day in the Rue de Rivoli, near the Hotel de Ville. This part of the Rue de Rivoli is a sort of Chatham Street, as a New Yorker would say. It might be called one of the boulevards of the poorer classes.

At the store to which I refer all the articles not exceeding a franc in price are displayed upon broad, low, sloping counters or tables, with shallow compartments which keep each kind of goods by themselves. There is one very large table upon which all the things are one sous each. Behind the table stands a watchful young man in a cotton blouse. He wears his cap, because the doors are all open and the rooms are not warmed. The tables are too broad for him to receive and give change by hand, and he is therefore provided with a long rod, upon the end of which is a shallow tin dish for passing money back and forth.

The public who crowd the passages of the bazar lean over the table, and each one helps himself. Here is a pile of rattles, there a lot of rosaries for dolls each with a little gilt crucifix complete, there are papers of needles, there are jumping frogs made of wood with a concealed spring. Here are glass whistles to imitate canaries, here balls of cotton, there cakes of mouth glue, there little tin dishes for baby houses, here little bottles of sugar-plums, here dolls' snuff-boxes, there children's paints, and next to them paint-brushes, and so on.

If the salesman sees that any one is selecting a number of articles he hands out a basket, in which they may be placed by the purchaser as fast as they are chosen. When any one has completed his or her selection of articles the salesman holds out his rod, and receives in his dish the same number of sous. If the articles are numerous he produces a pasteboard box and packs them up.

There is a sort of charm about this free way of doing business which is very attractive to children. Some grown people, too, take a pleasure in the mere transaction of making a purchase, apart from the want of the article or the cheapness of the price. Here is a capital place to enjoy that sort of satisfaction. The liberty of examining every article, helping yourself to what you want, and making twenty different purchases, all of them either pretty, useful, or odd, is well worth twenty sous.

Walking through the gardens of the Tuileries on our roundabout way home from church on Sunday, we found them filled, as is usual upon these beautiful afternoons, with the Parisian populace, enjoying the sun and air, many of them watching the children's games, or the birds which feed from any one's hand, or the ground which the gardeners are now preparing for the flower-beds.

Those who are familiar with the place will recollect that the reserved gardens immediately in front of the palace are separated from the public grounds by a screen of evergreens and a stone balustrade, between which is a concealed ditch or fosse. Along this balustrade and the light railing that closes the main avenue was gathered a crowd of at least a thousand persons, peering over each other's shoulders between the shrubbery to catch glimpses of half a dozen boys who were playing tag, follow your leader, or hide and seek in the reserved gardens. One of the youngest of these lads was the Prince Imperial.

Probably there is no other boy in the world who is the subject of so much attention as this one. The Emperor, doubtless, has great faith that a brilliant future is before his son. It is reported that in a game of questions and answers in which the Imperial household were engaged the Emperor was asked, "Whom would you best like to be?" and he replied, "My little son." It would not be strange if the little fellow were now much the happier of the two.

While we stood watching the crowd, among whom were many gamins stretching their little necks to see, and many fathers holding aloft little children to give their plebeian eyes a view of their expected ruler, one of the boys dashed through the shrubbery and down the terrace into the ditch, followed by the others in hot pursuit. They ran along directly beneath where we were standing, giving us a capital view of the Prince, who, like a good general, brought up the rear.

Children are said to learn very useful lessons in their sports; and if in these games the Prince learns how to lead his people, or how to run away from them and hide, he will know more than some of the sovereigns of France have known, to whose power he is expected to succeed.

I have been taking a rainy day ramble to-day. Paris has a number of miles of covered ways, arcades, and passages, where one may promenade among the shops in wet weather, and as the day was rainy I have spent the afternoon in some of these. I commenced this sheltered walk in the Rue de Rivoli, on the Place de la Concorde, near the Madeleine. Along this street is a broad sidewalk having a southern exposure, and covered like the arcades of the Palais Royal by the upper stories of the buildings, which are sustained by massive pillars, from the arches of which hang the gas-lamps that illumine the way in the evening. I followed these arches up the Rue Castiglione a little way, passing under the windows of the Ministry of Finance, where the great French debt is kept, the most flourishing thing in France at the present time; and crossing, came down the other side of the street to the Rue de Rivoli again, along which I continued, passing the Hotel Meurice, Galignani's reading-rooms, the numerous photograph shops, and the gaudy Algerian stores. Opposite the Tuileries the Passage Delorme afforded a branch in my walk, and thence returning to the Rue de Rivoli again, I soon found myself opposite the Palais Royal. Passing up the arcades of the Palais on one side of the garden I left it at the north end, where I entered on a series of passages that run in a sort of chain for nearly a mile—the Passage des deux Pavillons, the Passage Vivienne, then half a dozen blocks in the open air which brought me to the Passage des Panoramas, then those of Jouffroy and Verdeau. Returning through the same passages or branches of them I continued my walk, still under cover, in the Rue de Rivoli, as far as to the Louvre. I had thus sauntered for two hours and a half among lively Parisian scenes, a distance altogether of nearly three miles, without more than eight or ten blocks of wet sidewalk, and if I had not been so late I might have entered the Louvre and walked another hour in making the circuit of its art galleries.

One never need be at a loss for rainy day exercise here. As I passed the Palais Royal I saw nurses arriving in cabs with children, some in arms and some old enough to go alone, to give them their daily airing in the passages and arcades there, instead of in the gardens to which they resort in pleasant weather. SALAD MAKING.

THE Spanish proverb says four persons are wanted to make a good salad: a spendthrift for oil, a miser for vinegar, a counselor for salt, and a madman to stir all up. Salad should be "morning-gathered," and being washed, it should be covered up in a table-cloth, to exclude the air and keep it fresh until dried. The following are excellent salad ingredients: Essence of anchovies, soy, sugar, truffles, flavored vinegars; black pepper is much used by the French. Walnut oil may be used in salads. In preparing a salad it is a common mistake to wash lettuces; they ought never to be wetted; they thus lose their crispness, and are pro tanto destroyed. If you can get nothing but wet lettuces, you had certainly better dry them; but if you wish for a good salad, cut the lettuce fresh from the garden, take off the outside leaves, cut or rather break it into a salad bowl, and mix.

CORD AND CREESE;

OR,

THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE "PROMETHEUS."

It took some time for Langhetti to make his preparations in London. September came before he had completed them. To his surprise these arrangements were much easier than he had supposed. People came to him of their own accord before he thought it possible that they could have heard of his project. What most surprised him was a call from the manager of Covent Garden Theatre, who offered to put it into his hands for a price so low as to surprise Langhetti more than any thing else that had occurred. Of course he accepted the offer gratefully and eagerly. The manager said that the building was on his hands, and he did not wish to use it for the present, for which reason he would be glad to turn it over to him. He remarked also that there was very much stock in the theatre that could be made use of, for which he would charge nothing whatever. Langhetti went to see it, and found a large number of magnificently painted scenes, which could be used in his piece. On asking the manager how scenes of this sort came to be there, he learned that some one had been representing the "Midsummer Night's Dream," or something of that sort.

Langhetti's means were very limited, and as he had risked every thing on this experiment he was rejoiced to find events so very greatly in his favor.

Another circumstance which was equally in his favor, if not more so, was the kind consideration of the London papers. They announced his forthcoming work over and over again. Some of their writers came to see him so as to get the particulars, and what little he told them they described in the most attractive and effective manner.

A large number of people presented themselves to form his company, and he also received applications by letter from many whose eminence and fortunes placed them above the need of any such thing. It was simply incomprehensible to Langhetti, who thoroughly understood the ways of the musical world; yet since they offered he was only too happy to accept. On having interviews with these persons he was amazed to find that they were one and all totally indifferent about terms; they all assured him that they were ready to take any part whatever, and merely wished to assist in the representation of a piece so new and so original as his was said to be. They all named a price which was excessively low, and assured him that they did so only for form's sake; positively refusing to accept any thing more, and leaving it to Langhetti either to take them on their own terms or to reject them. He, of course, could not reject aid so powerful and so unexpected.

At length he had his rehearsal. After various trials he invited representatives of the London Press to be present at the last. They all came, and all without exception wrote the most glowing accounts for their respective journals.

"I don't know how it is," said he to Beatrice. "Every thing has come into my hands. I don't understand it. It seems to me exactly as if there was some powerful, unseen hand assisting me: some one who secretly put every thing in my way, who paid these artists first and then sent them to me, and influenced all the journals in my favor. I should be sure of this if it were not a more incredible thing than the actual result itself. As it is I am simply perplexed and bewildered. It is a thing that is without parallel. I have a company such as no one has ever before gathered together on one stage. I have eminent prima donnas who are quite willing to sing second and third parts without caring what I pay them, or whether I pay them or not. I know the musical world. All I can say is that the thing is unexampled, and I can not comprehend it. I have tried to find out from some of them what it all means, but they give me no satisfaction. At any rate, my Bicina, you will make your début under the most favorable circumstances. You saw how they admired your voice at the rehearsal. The world shall admire it still more at your first performance."

Langhetti was puzzled, and, as he said, bewildered, but he did not slacken a single effort to make his Opera successful. His exertions were as unremitting as though he were still struggling against difficulties. After all that had been done for him he knew very well that he was sure of a good house, yet he worked as hard as though his audience was very uncertain.

At length the appointed evening came. Langhetti had certainly expected a good house from those happy accidents which had given him the co-operation of the entire musical world and of the press. Yet when he looked out and saw the house that waited for the rising of the curtain he was overwhelmed.

When he thus looked out it was long before the time. A great murmur had attracted his attention. He saw the house crammed in every part. All the boxes were filled. In the pit was a vast congregation of gentlemen and ladies, the very galleries were thronged.

The wonder that had all along filled him was now greater than ever. He well knew upon what circumstances even an ordinarily good house is collected together. There must either be undoubted fame in the prima donna, or else the most wide-spread and comprehensive efforts on the part of a skillful impresario. His efforts had been great, but not such as to insure any thing like this. To account for the prodigious crowd which filled every part of the large edifice was simply impossible.

He did not attempt to account for it. He accepted the situation, and prepared for the performance.

What sort of an idea that audience may have had of the "Prometheus" of Langhetti need hardly be conjectured. They had heard of it as a novelty. They had heard that the company was the best ever collected at one time, and that the prima donna was a prodigy of genius. That was enough for them. They waited in a state of expectation which was so high-pitched that it would have proved disastrous in the extreme to any piece, or any singer who should have proved to be in the slightest degree inferior. Consummate excellence alone in every part could now save the piece from ruin. This Langhetti felt; but he was calm, for he had confidence in his work and in his company. Most of all, he had confidence in Beatrice.

At last the curtain rose. The scene was such a one as had never before been represented. A blaze of dazzling light filled the stage, and before it stood seven forms, representing the seven archangels. They began one of the sublimest strains ever heard. Each of these singers had in some way won eminence. They had thrown themselves into this work. The music which had been given to them had produced an exalted effect upon their own hearts, and now they rendered forth that grand "Chorus of Angels" which those who heard the "Prometheus" have never forgotten. The words resembled, in some measure, the opening song in Goethe's "Faust," but the music was Langhetti's.

The effect of this magnificent opening was wonderful. The audience sat spell-bound—hushed into stillness by those transcendent harmonies which seemed like the very song of the angels themselves; like that "new song" which is spoken of in Revelation. The grandeur of Handel's stupendous chords was renewed, and every one present felt its power.

Then came the second scene. Prometheus lay suffering. The ocean nymphs were around him, sympathizing with his woes. The sufferer lay chained to a bleak rock in the summit of frosty Caucasus. Far and wide extended an expanse of ice. In the distance arose a vast world of snow-covered peaks. In front was a mer de glace, which extended all along the stage.

Prometheus addressed all nature—"the divine ether, the swift-winged winds, Earth the All-mother, and the infinite laughter of the ocean waves." The thoughts were those of Æschylus, expressed by the music of Langhetti.

The ocean nymphs bewailed him in a song of mournful sweetness, whose indescribable pathos touched every heart. It was the intensity of sympathy—sympathy so profound that it became anguish, for the heart that felt it had identified itself with the heart of the sufferer.

Then followed an extraordinary strain. It was the Voice of Universal Nature, animate and inanimate, mourning over the agony of the God of Love. In that strain was heard the voice of man, the sighing of the winds, the moaning of the sea, the murmur of the trees, the wail of bird and beast, all blending in extraordinary unison, and all speaking of woe.

And now a third scene opened. It was Athene. Athene represented Wisdom or Human Understanding, by which the God of Vengeance is dethroned, and gives place to the eternal rule of the God of Love. To but few of those present could this idea of Langhetti's be intelligible. The most of them merely regarded the fable and its music, without looking for any meaning beneath the surface.

To these, and to all, the appearance of Beatrice was like a new revelation. She came forward and stood in the costume which the Greek has given to Athene, but in her hand she held the olive—her emblem—instead of the spear. From beneath her helmet her dark locks flowed down and were wreathed in thick waves that clustered heavily about her head.

Here, as Athene, the pure classical contour of Beatrice's features appeared in marvelous beauty—faultless in their perfect Grecian mould. Her large, dark eyes looked with a certain solemn meaning out upon the vast audience. Her whole face was refined and sublimed by the thought that was within her. In her artistic nature she had appropriated this character to herself so thoroughly, that, as she stood there, she felt herself to be in reality all that she represented. The spectators caught the same feeling from her. Yet so marvelous was her beauty, so astonishing was the perfection of her form and feature, so accurate was the living representation of the ideal goddess that the whole vast audience after one glance burst forth into pealing thunders of spontaneous and irresistible applause.

Beatrice had opened her mouth to begin, but as that thunder of admiration arose she fell back a pace. Was it the applause that had overawed her?

Her eyes were fixed on one spot at the extreme right of the pit. A face was there which en-chaired her. A face, pale, sad, mournful, with dark eyes fixed on hers in steadfast despair.

Beatrice faltered and fell back, but it was not at the roar of applause. It was that face—the one face among three thousand before her, the one, the only one that she saw. Ah, how in that moment all the past came rushing before her—the Indian Ocean, the Malay pirate, where that face first appeared, the Atlantic, the shipwreck, the long sail over the seas in the boat, the African isle!

She stood so long in silence that the spectators wondered.

Suddenly the face which had so transfixed her sank down. He was gone, or he had hid himself. Was it because he knew that he was the cause of her silence?

The face disappeared, and the spell was broken. Langhetti stood at the side-scenes, watching with deep agitation the silence of Beatrice. He was on the point of taking the desperate step of going forward when he saw that she had regained her composure.

She regained it, and moved a step forward with such calm serenity that no one could have suspected her of having lost it. She began to sing. In an opera words are nothing—music is all in all. It is sufficient if the words express, even in a feeble and general way, the ideas which breathe and burn in the music. Thus it was with the words in the opening song of Beatrice.

But the music! What language can describe it?

Upon this all the richest stores of Langhetti's genius had been lavished. Into this all the soul of Beatrice was thrown with sublime self-forgetfulness. She ceased to be herself. Before the audience she was Athene.

Her voice, always marvelously rich and full, was now grander and more capacious than ever. It poured forth a full stream of matchless harmony that carried all the audience captive. Strong, soaring, penetrating, it rose easily to the highest notes, and flung them forth with a lavish, and at the same time far-reaching power that penetrated every heart, and thrilled all who heard it. Roused to the highest enthusiasm by the sight of that vast assemblage, Beatrice gave herself up to the intoxication of the hour. She threw herself into the spirit of the piece; she took deep into her heart the thought of Langhetti, and uttered it forth to the listeners with harmonies that were almost divine—such harmonies as they had never before heard.

There was the silence of death as she sang. Her voice stilled all other sounds. Each listener seemed almost afraid to breathe. Some looked at one another in amazement, but most of them sat motionless, with their heads stretched forward, unconscious of any thing except that one voice.

At last it ceased. For a moment there was a pause. Then there arose a deep, low thunder of applause that deepened and intensified itself every moment till at last it rose on high in one sublime outburst, a frenzy of acclamation, such as is heard but seldom, but, once heard, is never forgotten.

Beatrice was called out. She came, and retired. Again and again she was called. Flowers were showered down in heaps at her feet. The acclamations went on, and only ceased through the consciousness that more was yet to come. The piece went on. It was one long triumph. At last it ended. Beatrice had been loaded with honors. Langhetti was called out and welcomed with almost equal enthusiasm. His eyes filled with tears of joy as he received this well-merited tribute to his genius. He and Beatrice stood on the stage at the same time. Flowers were flung at him. He took them and laid them at the feet of Beatrice.

At this a louder roar of acclamation arose. It

tude of a sibyl; she uttered inspirations; she herself was inspired.

As she stood with her grand Grecian beauty, her pure classic features, she looked as beautiful as a statue, and as ideal and passionless. In one sense she could never be a popular favorite. She had no archness or coquetry like some, no voluptuousness like others, no arts to win applause like others. Still she stood up and sang as one who believed that this was the highest mission of humanity, to utter divine truth to human ears. She sang loftily, thrillingly, as an angel might sing, and those who saw her revered her while they listened.

And thus it was that the fame of this new singer went quickly through England, and foreign journals spoke of it half-wonderingly, half-cynically, as usual; for Continentals never have any faith in English art, or in the power which any Englishman may have to interpret art. The leading French journals conjectured that the "Prometheus" was of a religious character, and therefore Puritanical; and consequently for that reason was popular. They amused themselves with the idea of a Puritanical opera, declared that the English wished to Protestantize music, and suggested "Calvin" or "The Sabbath" as good subjects for this new and entirely English class of operas.

But soon the correspondents of some of the Continental papers began to write glowing ac-increased and deepened, and the two who stood there felt overwhelmed by the tremendous applause.

"THE APPEARANCE OF BEATRICE WAS LIKE A NEW REVELATION."

So ended the first representation of the "Prometheus!"

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE SECRET.

THE triumph of Beatrice continued. The daily papers were filled with accounts of the new singer. She had come suddenly before them, and had at one bound reached the highest eminence. She had eclipsed all the popular favorites. Her sublime strains, her glorious enthusiasm, her marvelous voice, her perfect beauty, all kindled the popular heart. The people forgave her for not having an Italian name, since she had one which was so aristocratic. Her whole appearance showed that she was something very different from the common order of actresses, as different, in fact, as the "Prometheus" was from the common order of operas. For here in the "Prometheus" there were no endless iterations of the one theme of love, no perpetual repetitions of the same rhyme of amore and cuore, or amor and cuor; but rather the effort of the soul after sublimer mysteries. The "Prometheus" sought to solve the problem of life and of human suffering. Its divine sentiments brought hope and consolation. The great singer rose to the alti-counts of the piece, and to put Langhetti in the same class with Handel. He was an Italian, they said, but in this case he united Italian grace and versatility with German solemnity and melancholy. They declared that he was the greatest of living composers, and promised for him a great reputation.

Night after night the representation of the "Prometheus" went on with undiminished success; and with a larger and profounder appreciation of its meaning among the better class of minds. Langhetti began to show a stronger and fuller confidence in the success of his piece than he had yet dared to evince. Yet now its success seemed assured. What more could he wish?

September came on, and every succeeding night only made the success more marked. One day Langhetti was with Beatrice at the theatre, and they were talking of many things. There seemed to be something on his mind, for he spoke in an abstracted manner. Beatrice noticed this at last, and mentioned it.

He was at first very mysterious. "It must be that secret of yours which you will not tell me," said she. "You said once before that it was connected with me, and that you would tell it to me when the time came. Has not the time come yet?"

"Not yet," answered Langhetti.

"When will it come?"

"I don't know."

"And will you keep it secret always?"

"Perhaps not."

"You speak undecidedly."

"I am undecided."

"Why not decide now to tell it?" pleaded Beatrice. "Why should I not know it? Surely I have gone through enough suffering to bear this, even if it bring something additional."

Langhetti looked at her long and doubtfully.

"You hesitate," said she.

"Yes."

"Why?"

"It is of too much importance."

"That is all the more reason why I should know it. Would it crush me if I knew it?"

"I don't know. It might."

"Then let me be crushed."

Langhetti sighed.

"Is it something that you know for certain, or is it only conjecture?"

"Neither," said he, "but half-way between the two."

Beatrice looked earnestly at him for some time. Then she put her head nearer to his and spoke in a solemn whisper.

"It is about my mother!"

Langhetti looked at her with a startled expression.

"Is it not?"

He bowed his head.

"It is—it is. And if so, I implore—I conjure you to tell me. Look—I am calm. Think—I am strong. I am not one who can be cast down merely by bad news."

"I may tell you soon."

"Say you will."

"I will," said Langhetti, after a struggle.

"When?"

"Soon."

"Why not to-morrow?"

"That is too soon; you are impatient."

"Of course I am," said Beatrice. "Ought I not to be so? Have you not said that this concerns me? and is not all my imagination aroused in the endeavor to form a conjecture as to what it may be?"

She spoke so earnestly that Langhetti was moved, and looked still more undecided.

"When will you tell me?"

"Soon, perhaps," he replied, with some hesitation.

"Why not now?"

"Oh no, I must assure myself first about some things."

"To-morrow, then."

He hesitated.

"Yes," said she; "it must be to-morrow. If you do not, I shall think that you have little or no confidence in me. I shall expect it to-morrow."

Langhetti was silent.

"I shall expect it to-morrow," repeated Beatrice.

Langhetti still continued silent.

"Oh, very well; silence gives consent!" said she, in a lively tone.

"I have not consented."

"Yes you have, by your silence."

"I was deliberating."

"I asked you twice, and you did not refuse; surely that means consent."

"I do not say so," said Langhetti, earnestly.

"But you will do so."

"Do not be so certain."

"Yes, I will be certain; and if you do not tell me you will very deeply disappoint me."

"In telling you I could only give you sorrow."

"Sorrow or joy, whatever it is, I can bear it so long as I know this. You will not suppose that I am actuated by simple feminine curiosity. You know me better. This secret is one which subjects me to the tortures of suspense, and I am anxious to have them removed."

"The removal will be worse than the suspense."

"That is impossible."

"You would not say so if you knew what it was."

"Tell me, then."

"That is what I fear to do."

"Do you fear for me, or for some other person?"

"Only for you."

"Do not fear for me, then, I beseech you; for it is not only my desire, but my prayer, that I may know this."

Langhetti seemed to be in deep perplexity. Whatever this secret was with which he was so troubled he seemed afraid to tell it to Beatrice, either from fear that it might not be any thing in itself or result in any thing, or, as seemed more probable, lest it might too greatly affect her. This last was the motive which appeared to influence him most strongly. In either case, the secret of which he spoke must have been one of a highly important character, affecting most deeply the life and fortunes of Beatrice herself. She had formed her own ideas and her own expectations about it, and this made her all the more urgent, and even peremptory, in her demand. In fact, things had come to such a point that Langhetti found himself no longer able to refuse, and now only sought how to postpone his divulgence of his secret.

Yet even this Beatrice combated, and would listen to no later postponement than the morrow. At length, after long resistance to her demand, Langhetti assented, and promised on the morrow to tell her what it was that he had meant by his secret.

For, as she gathered from his conversation, it was something that he had first discovered in Hong Kong, and had never since forgotten, but had tried to make it certain. His efforts had thus far been useless, and he did not wish to tell her till he could bring proof. That proof, unfortunately, he was not able to find, and he could only tell his conjectures.

It was for these, then, that Beatrice waited in anxious expectation.

RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

THE RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

XI.

WHAT IS LEFT OF ME?—The task of the chronicler of crinoline draws rapidly to a close. The fashion which has alternately flourished and languished through so many centuries is now once more waning. It goes down to the tomb of things forgotten, not, however, without a sure hope of one day again reviving, to give laws to the world of dress.

And how have the votaries of crinoline borne this somewhat sudden deprivation of their cherished ornament? Men can not place themselves at all in their position, and therefore can form no idea of their feelings under the trying circumstances. A young lady, however, bewailed her fate in the following remarks, which describe pretty fairly the sentiments of a large number of her sex: "When I became obliged, owing to the change of fashion, to give up my crinoline entirely, I felt a kind of degradation. I was belittled. It was as if I had lost part of my body; for, as I am only seventeen years of age, I was almost born to and brought up in crinoline. I can think of no better word than degradation; for it is no trifling matter for a young person of an ambitious turn of mind to melt away before every body's eyes like a heap of snow in the sun. I pass over the various advantages of crinoline, as, for instance, when one has to pass a custom-house, as at Niagara, with a few—" Here the unfortunate young lady fairly broke down, and the smelling-bottle came into requisition. It is certain that this abolition has not come into effect without causing a very severe struggle, and leaving sad wounds in the female breast. If, therefore, we rejoice that the entreaties of husbands, fathers, and brothers have been granted, let us at least respect the feelings of the bereaved.

CHUNDUN RAJAH.

A HINDOO FAIRY LEGEND.

ONCE upon a time a Rajah* and a Raneet† died, leaving seven sons and one daughter. All these seven sons were married, and the wives of the six eldest used to be very unkind to their poor little sister-in-law; but the wife of the seventh brother loved her dearly, and always took her part against the others. She would say, "Poor little thing, her life is sad. Her mother wished so long for a daughter, and then the girl was born and the mother died, and never saw her poor child, or was able to ask any one to take care of her." At which the wives of the six elder brothers would answer, "You only take such notice of the girl in order to vex us." Then, while their husbands were away, they made up wicked stories against their sister-in-law, which they told them on their return home; and their husbands believed them rather than her, and were very angry with her, and ordered her to be turned out of the house. But the wife of the seventh brother did not believe what the six others said, and was very kind to the little Princess, and sent her secretly as much food as she could spare from her own dinner. But as they drove her from their door the six wives of the elder brothers cried out, "Go away, wicked girl, go away, and never let us see your face again until you marry Chundun Rajah!*" When you invite us to the wedding, and give us six eldest six common wooden stools to sit on, but the seventh sister (who always takes your part) a fine emerald chair, we will believe you innocent of all the evil deeds of which you are accused, but not till then!" This they said scornfully, railing at her; for Chundun Rajah, of whom they spoke (who was the great Rajah of a neighboring country), had been dead many months.

So, sad at heart, the Princess wandered forth into the jungle; and when she had gone through it she came upon another still denser than the first. The trees grew so thickly overhead that she could scarcely see the sky, and there was no village nor house of living creature near. The food her youngest sister-in-law had given her was nearly exhausted, and she did not know where to get more. At last, however, after journeying on for many days, she came upon a large tank, beside which was a fine house that belonged to a Rakshas.† Being very tired she sat down on the edge of the tank to eat some of the parched rice that remained of her store of provisions; and as she did so she thought: "This house belongs doubtless to a Rakshas, who perhaps will see me and kill and eat me; but since no one cares for me, and I have neither home nor friends, I hold life cheap enough." It happened, however, that the Rakshas was then out, and there was no one in his house but a little cat and dog, who were his servants.

The dog's duty was to take care of the saffron with which the Rakshas colored his face on high days and holidays, and the cat had charge of the antimony with which he blackened his eyelids. Before the Princess had been long by the tank the little cat spied her out, and running to her said, "Oh, sister, sister, I am so hungry, pray give me some of your dinner!" The Princess answered, "I have very little rice left; when it is all gone I shall starve. If I give you some, what have you to give me in exchange?" The cat said, "I have charge of the antimony with which my Rakshas blackens his eyelids. I will give you some of it;" and running to the house she fetched a nice little pot full of antimony, which she gave to the Princess in exchange for the rice. When the little dog saw this he also ran down to the tank, and said, "Lady, Lady, give me some rice, I pray you; for I, too, am very hungry!" But she answered, "I have very little rice left, and when it is all gone I shall starve. If I give you some of my dinner, what will you give me in exchange?" The dog said, "I have charge of my Rakshas's saffron, with which he colors his face. I will give you some of it." So he ran to the house and fetched a quantity of saffron and gave it to the Princess, and she gave him also some of the rice. Then, tying the antimony and saffron up in her saree,* she said good-by to the dog and cat and went on her way.

Three or four days after this she found she had nearly reached the other side of the jungle. The wood was not so thick, and in the distance she saw a large building that looked like a great tomb. The Princess determined to go and see what it was, and whether she could find any one there to give her any food; for she had eaten all the rice and felt very hungry, and it was getting toward night.

Now the place toward which the Princess went was the tomb of the Chundun Rajah, but this she did not know.

Chundun Rajah had died many months before, and his father and mother and sisters, who loved him very dearly, could not bear the idea of his being buried under the cold ground; so they had built a beautiful tomb, and inside it they had placed the body on a bed under a canopy, and it had never decayed, but continued as fair and perfect as when first put there. Every day Chundun Rajah's mother and sisters would come to the place to weep and lament from sunrise to sunset; but each evening they returned to their own homes. Hard by was a shrine and small hut where a Brahmin lived, who had charge of the place; and from far and near people used to come to visit the tomb of their lost Rajah, and see the great miracle, how the body of him who had been dead so many months remained perfect and undecayed; but none knew why this was. When the Princess got near the place a violent storm came on. The rain beat upon her and wetted her, and it grew so dark she could hardly see where she was going. She would have been afraid to go into the tomb had she known about Chundun Rajah; but as it was, the storm being so violent and night approaching, she ran in there for shelter as fast as she could, and sat down shivering in one corner. By the light of an oil lamp that burnt dimly in a niche in the wall she saw in front of her the body of the Rajah lying under the canopy, with the heavy jeweled coverlet over him, and the rich hangings all round. He looked as if he were only asleep, and she did not feel frightened. But at twelve o'clock, to her great surprise, as she was watching and waiting, the Rajah came to life; and when he saw her sitting shivering in the corner, he fetched a light and came toward her and said: "Who are you?"

She answered: "I am a poor lonely girl. I only came here for shelter from the storm. I am dying of cold and hunger." And then she told him all her story—how that her sisters-in-law had falsely accused her, and driven her from among them into the jungle, bidding her see their faces no more until she married the Chundun Rajah, who had been dead so many months; and how the youngest had been kind to her and sent her food, which had prevented her from starving by the way.

The Rajah listened to the Princess's words, and was certain that they were true, and she no common beggar from the jungles. For, for all her ragged clothes, she looked a royal lady, and shone like a star in the darkness. Moreover, her eyelids were darkened with antimony and her beautiful face painted with saffron, like the face of a Princess. Then he felt a great pity for her, and said, "Lady, have no fear, for I will take care of you;" and dragging the rich coverlet off his bed he threw it over her to keep her warm, and going to the Brahmin's house, which was close by, fetched some rice, which he gave her to eat. Then he said, "I am the Chundun Rajah of whom you have heard. I die every day, but every night I come to life for a little while." She cried, "Do none of your family know of this? and if so, why do you stay here in a dismal tomb?" He answered, "None know it but the Brahmin who has charge of this place. Since my life is thus maimed, what would it avail to tell my family? It would but grieve them more than to think me dead. Therefore I have forbidden him to let them know; and since my parents only come here by day they have never found it out. Maybe I shall some time wholly recover, and till then I will be silent about my existence." Then he called the Brahmin who had charge of the tomb and the shrine (and who daily placed an offering of food upon it for the Rajah to eat when he came to life) and said to him, "Henceforth place a double quantity of food upon the shrine, and take care of this lady. If I ever recover she shall be my Raneet." And having said these words he died again. Then the Brahmin took the Princess to his little hut, and bade his wife see that she wanted for nothing; and all the next day she rested in that place. Very early in the morning Chundun Rajah's mother and sisters came to visit the tomb, but they did not see the Princess; and in the evening when the sun was setting they went away. That night when the Chundun Rajah came to life he called the Brahmin, and said to him, "Is the Princess still here?" "Yes," he answered; "for she is weary with her journey, and she has no home to go to." The Rajah said, "Since she has neither home nor friends, if she be willing you shall marry me to her, and she shall wander no further in search of shelter." So the Brahmin fetched his shashtra* and called all his family as witnesses, and married the Rajah to the little Princess, reading prayers over them and scattering rice and flowers upon their heads. And there the Chundun Raneer lived for some time. She was very happy; she wanted nothing; and the Brahmin and his wife took as much care of her as if she had been their daughter. Every day she would wait outside the tomb; but at sunset she always returned to it, and watched for her husband to come to life. One night she said to him, "Husband, I am happier to be your wife, and hold your hand and talk to you for two or three hours every evening, than if I were married to some great living Rajah for a hundred years. But oh! what joy it would be if you could come wholly to life again. Do you know what is the cause of your daily death? and what it is that brings you to life every night at twelve o'clock?"

"Yes," he said; "it is because I have lost my Chundun Har,† the sacred necklace that held my soul. A Peri stole it. I was in the palace garden one day, when many of those winged ladies flew over my head, and one of them when she saw me, loved me, and asked me to marry her. But I said No, I would not; and at that she was angry, and tore the Chundun Har off my neck, and flew away with it. That instant I fell down dead, and my father and mother caused me to be placed in this tomb; but every night the Peri comes here and takes my necklace off her neck, and when she takes it off I come to life again, and she asks me to come away with her, and marry her, and she does not put on the necklace again for two or three hours, waiting to see if I will consent. During that time I live. But when she finds I will not, she puts on the necklace again and flies away, and as soon as she puts it on I die." "Can not the Peri be caught?" asked the Chundun Raneer; but her husband answered, "No, I have often tried to seize back my necklace—for if I could regain it I should come wholly to life again—but the Peri can at will render herself invisible, and fly away with it, so that it is impossible for any mortal man to get it." At this news the Chundun Raneer was sad at heart, for she saw no hope of the Rajah's being restored to life; and grieving over this she became so ill and unhappy that even when she had a little baby boy born it did not much cheer her, for she did nothing but think, "This poor child will grow up in this desolate place and have no kind father day by day to teach him and help him as other children have, but only see him for a little while by night; and we are all at the mercy of the Peri, who may any day fly quite away with the necklace and not return." The Brahmin, seeing how ill she was, said to the Chundun Rajah, "The Raneer will die unless she can be somewhere where much care will be taken of her, for in my poor home my wife and I can do but little for her comfort. Your mother and sisters are good and charitable; let her go to the palace, where they will only need to see she is ill to take care of her." Now it happened that in the palace court-yard there was a great slab of white marble, on which the Chundun Rajah would often rest on the hot summer days; and because he used to be so fond of it, when he died his father and mother ordered that it should be taken great care of, and no one was allowed to so much as touch it. Knowing this, Chundun Rajah said to his wife, "You are ill, I should like you to go to the palace, where my mother and sisters will take care of you. Do this, therefore—take our child and sit down upon the great slab of marble in the palace court-yard. I used to be very fond of it; and so now for my sake it is kept with the greatest care, and no one is allowed to so much as touch it. They will most likely see you there and order you to go away; but if you will then tell them you are ill they will, I know, have pity on you and befriend you." The Chundun Raneer did as her husband told her; placing her little boy on the great slab of white marble in the palace court-yard, and sitting down beside him. Chundun Rajah's sister, who was looking out of the window, saw her and cried, "Mother, there are a woman and her child resting on my brother's marble slab; let us tell them to go away." So she ran down to the place; but when she saw Chundun Raneer and the little boy she was quite astonished; the Chundun Raneer was so fair and lovable-looking, and the baby was the image of her dead brother. Then returning to her mother she said, "Mother, she who sits upon the marble stone is the prettiest little lady I ever saw; and do not let us blame the poor thing; she says she is ill and weary; and the baby (I know not if it is fancy, or the seeing him on that stone) seems to me the image of my lost brother."

At this the old Raneer and the rest of the family went out, and when they saw the Chundun Raneer they all took such a fancy to her and to the child that they brought her into the palace, and were very kind to her, and took great care of her; so that in a while she got well and strong again, and much less unhappy; and they all made a great pet of the little boy, for they were struck with his strange likeness to the dead Rajah; and after a time they gave his mother a small house to live in, close to the palace, where they often used to go and visit her. There also the Chundun Rajah would go each night, when he came to life, to laugh and talk with his wife, and play with his boy, although he still refused to tell his father and mother of his existence. One day it happened, however, that the little child told one of the Princesses (Chundun Rajah's sister) how every evening some one who came to the house used to laugh and talk with his mother and play with him, and then go away. The Princess also heard the sound of voices in the Chundun Raneer's house, and saw lights flickering about there when they were supposed to be fast asleep. Of this she told her mother, saying, "Let us go down to-morrow night and see what this means; perhaps the woman we thought so poor, and befriending thus, is nothing but a cheat, and entertains all her friends at night at our expense."

So the next evening they went down softly, softly to the place, when they saw, not the strangers they had expected, but their long-lost Chundun Rajah. Then, since he could not escape, he told them all; how that every night for an hour or two he came to life, but was dead all day. And they rejoiced greatly to see him again, and reproached him for not letting them know he ever lived, though for so short a time. He then told them how he had married the Chundun Raneer, and thanked them for all their loving care of her.

After this he used to come every night and sit and talk with them; but still each day, to their great sorrow, he died; nor could they divine any means for getting back his Chundun Har, which the Peri wore round her neck.

At last one evening, when they were all laughing and chatting together, seven Peris flew into the room, unobserved by them, and one of the seven was the very Peri who had stolen Chundun Rajah's necklace, and she held it in her hand.

All the young Peris were very fond of the Chundun Rajah and Chundun Raneer's boy, and used often to come and play with him, for he was the image of his father's and mother's loveliness, and as fair as the morning; and he used to laugh and clap his little hands when he saw them coming; for though men and women can not see Peris, little children can.

Chundun Rajah was tossing the child up in the air when the Peris flew into the room, and the little boy was laughing merrily. The winged ladies fluttered round the Rajah and the child, and she that had the necklace hovered over his head. Then the boy, seeing the glittering necklace which the Peri held, stretched out his little arms and caught hold of it; and as he seized it the string broke, and all the beads fell upon the floor. At this the seven Peris were frightened and flew away, and the Chundun Raneer collected the beads, strung them, and hung them round the Rajah's neck; and there was great joy among those that loved him, because he had recovered the sacred necklace, and that the spell which doomed him to death was broken.

The glad news was soon known throughout the kingdom, and all the people were happy and proud to hear it, crying, "We have lost our young Rajah for such a long, long time, and now one little child has brought him back to life." And the old Rajah and Raneer (Chundun Rajah's father and mother) determined that he should be married again to the Chundun Raneer with great pomp and splendor, and they sent letters into all the kingdoms of the world, saying, "Our son the Chundun Rajah has come to life again, and we pray you come to his wedding."

Then among those who accepted the invitation were the Chundun Raneer's seven brothers and their seven wives; and for her six sisters-in-law who had been so cruel to her, and caused her to be driven out into the jungle, the Chundun Raneer prepared six common wooden stools; but for the seventh, who had been kind to her, she made ready an emerald throne, and a foot-stool adorned with emeralds.

When all the Raneers were taken to their places, the six eldest complained, saying, "How is this? Six of us are given only common wooden stools to sit upon, but the seventh has an emerald chair?" Then the Chundun Raneer stood up, and before the assembled guests told them her story, reminding her six elder sisters-in-law of their former taunts, and how they had forbidden her to see them again until the day of her marriage with the Chundun Rajah, and she explained how unjustly they had accused her to her brothers. When the Raneers heard this they were struck dumb with fear and shame, and were unable to answer a word; and all their husbands, being much enraged to learn how they had conspired to kill their sister-in-law, commanded that these wicked women should be instantly hanged, which was accordingly done. Then, on the same day that the Chundun Rajah remarried their sister, the six elder brothers were married to six beautiful ladies of the court, amidst great and unheard-of rejoicings, and from that day they all lived together in perfect peace and harmony unto their lives' end.

GEORGE ELIOT'S WORKS.

From the London Review.

It was once said of a very charming and high-minded woman that to know her was in itself a liberal education; and we are inclined to set an almost equally high value on an acquaintance with the writings of "George Eliot." For those who read them aright they possess the faculty of educating in its highest sense, of invigorating the intellect, giving a healthy tone to the taste, appealing to the nobler feelings of the heart, training its impulses aright, and awakening or developing in every mind the consciousness of a craving for something higher than the pleasures and rewards of that life which only the senses realize, the belief in a destiny of a nobler nature than can be grasped by experience or demonstrated by argument. In reading them we seem to be raised above the low grounds where the atmosphere is heavy and tainted, and the sunlight has to struggle through blinding veils of mist, and to be set upon the higher ranges where the air is fresh and bracing, where the sky is bright and clear, and where earth seems of less account than before, and heaven more near at hand. And as, by those who really feel the grandeur of mountain solitudes, a voice is heard speaking to the heart, which hushes the whispers in which vanity, and meanness, and self-interest are wont to make their petty suggestions; and as for them the paltry purposes of a brief and fitful life lose their significance in the presence of the mighty types of steadfastness and eternity by which they are surrounded; so, on those readers who are able to appreciate a lofty independence of thought, a rare nobility of feeling, and an exquisite sympathy with the joys and sorrows of human nature, George Eliot's writings can not fail to exert an invigorating and purifying influence, the good effects of which leave behind it a lasting impression.

KINGLAKE'S CRIMEAN WAR.

THE INVASION OF THE CRIMEA: Its Origin, and an Account of its Progress down to the Death of Lord Raglan. By ALEXANDER WILLIAM KINGLAKE. With Maps and Plans. Two Volumes. Vol. I. now ready. Vol. II. will be published shortly. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

We have here a work worthy of the author's reputation, and worthy of the labor, the years of labor, which he has expended upon it. Like the writings of Foster, of Hallam, of Macaulay, there is in every sentence the trace of care—for love for the art of composition, as well as for the subject treated. The reader's judgment may sometimes clash with that of the author; but this does not interfere with his admiration for a true work of art.—London Quarterly Review.

Readers will linger with devotion over the fascinating pages of this history. His clear analysis of the causes of this war, his picture of the campaign, the dramatic force which he throws into the story of the battle-field, the triumphant defense of Lord Raglan from the foul calumnies which were heaped upon him—the whole tempered by the calm dignity of a philosophical judgment—are all grand; but if these are the magnetic attractions of the work, the dissection of the character of Napoleon III. is absolutely electrical.—New York Evening Post.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

HARPER'S CATALOGUE.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE OF HARPER & BROTHERS' PUBLICATIONS, arranged alphabetically, is ready for distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter enclosing Five Cents.

The attention of gentlemen in town or country, desiring to form Libraries or enrich their Literary Collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—comprehending over THREE THOUSAND VOLUMES—which are offered, in most instances, at less than one half the cost of similar productions in England.

To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, &c., who may not have access to a reliable guide in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable for reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, whenever books can not be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will receive prompt attention.

THE MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW. Preceded by a History of the Religious Wars in the Reign of Charles IX. By HENRY WHITE, M.A. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $1 75.

Mr. White has performed his task well. His arguments are every where conclusive, ably supported by the results of deep researches into the contemporary histories of the times of which he treats. His language is always forcible, and frequently rises to eloquence. His account of the state of France in the middle of the sixteenth century is admirable and exhaustive. The same praise may be allowed to his descriptions of the characters of the chief personages of the bloody drama which he recounts. We heartily commend the book for the tolerant spirit in which it is written. Remembering how hard it is even to think of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew without a thrill of indignation, we can not sufficiently praise this conspicuous merit of the volume.—London Review.

Of the state of France from the commencement of the century to the terrible day of St. Bartholomew Mr. White gives a masterly account. From numerous contemporary memoirs and state documents he has collected the details of a picture at once broad in its general effect and minute in its accessories—a picture full of life, color, character, and force. The labor of collecting so many materials from such scattered places, some very obscure and not easily searched out, is only equalled by the power of combining them in a striking manner; and of the capacity to do both Mr. White has given abundant proof. The massacre of Paris is of course the chief feature in the work. It is admirably described, without any pretense of pictorial writing, yet in such a way that the whole hideous tragedy passes vividly before our eyes, and we behold the grim old Paris of the sixteenth century in its spasm of blood and terror. Mr. White has produced a work which has some of the best characteristics of history: a book full of research, conceived in the most conscientious and painstaking spirit, and written in a nervous and vigorous style, proper to the gravity of the events which it narrates and the principles which it affirms.—London Daily News.

Mr. White has exhibited great skill, great research, and considerable candor in executing his work, and readers of his clear narrative will readily bear testimony to the interest with which the story is kept up down to the awfully tragic close.—Glasgow Daily Herald.

BARNES'S HISTORY OF THE 39TH CONGRESS.

HISTORY OF THE THIRTY-NINTH CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES. By WILLIAM H. BARNES. Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

A volume of 636 royal octavo pages, and 18 portraits on steel by the best engravers in the country. The book contains an accurate history of the great measures of the most important Congress that ever assembled, and biographical sketches of all its members, together with characteristic and pertinent extracts from their speeches. The narrative portion of the work is written in clear and concise style, while the extracts, though generally brief, are directly to the point, and present the views of our wisest statesmen on the great subjects of recent legislation.

The book should be read by every VOTER who wishes to keep up with the times and form a correct estimate of public men. It forms a useful Manual for the STATESMAN and the POLITICIAN, since it gives them in a form convenient for reference all the important facts relating to the great questions which now occupy the public mind. Being supplied with a copious index, the work forms a convenient Political Text-book, or Cyclopaedia.

THE COMING SEASON.

THOUGH ever the same human feeling and passion,
Yet changed is the law of all feminine fashion:
The love of fresh toilettes their fancies possessing Since EVE led the way with the simplest of dressing,
There isn't a notion the beautiful creatures
Disdain, to set off their fair figures and features.

Oh, cold as the snakes that capriciously gird her
Is charming GLAUCILLA: she doesn't mean murder.
A snake is bewitching, though scarcely endearing;
But what of the dragon-fly, hung as an ear-ring?
Let us drink her sweet eyes in a serpentine flagon,
And hope a SAINT GEORGE may be found for her dragon.

Vivacious and volatile—that's my opinion
Of the girl with a squirrel surmounting her chignon.
I guess, in the country, when foliage flutters,
She merrily dances to songs that she utters:
And in town, whatsoever demureness she puts on her,
I, like the squirrels, am certainly nuts on her.

An exquisite daughter of fertile DEMETERA'S
Is she with the pheasant, and fieldfares, and wheat-eat:
If I could catch her as her beauties have caught 'em.
Egad, there'd be honey-moon somewhere in autumn!
That bird-haunted darling's an absolute idyl,
And the larks shall sing high on the morn of her bridal.

FACETIÆ.

A LUMINOUS QUERY.—Is a lantern-jawed man invariably light-headed?

A MARRIAGE FOR MONEY.

A few rhymes to the ceremony which is—

Impiety;
First, society—
Then, satiety—
Next, anxiety—
Insobriety.
Impropiety.

Last, the Divorce Court,
Which means Notoriety!

HARD TO BEAR, INDEED.—To a certain extent the character of a man may undoubtedly be told by his handwriting. You may be sure that no one of a humane disposition would bear hard—even on his pen.

QUESTIONS IN NATURAL HISTORY.

If a redbreast comes into your garden, does he come there a robbin'?

Are some horses said to resemble pigs' feet on account of their being trotters?

Are horses wounded in battle considered "hors de combat?"

Is it imagined that the polar bear considers his habitat an ice place?

Is it the lynx only that can be found along the chain of the Pyrenees?

Is it true that a very little will "keep the wolf from the door?"

How many Arctic foxes did Noah take with him?

How does the elk a-moose itself?

Is it on account of its size that the mole can not see?

Is the crane addicted to (h)oysters?

Do our domestic poultry enjoy foul weather?

There is a certain lady of rank and fashion in Paris who constantly believes herself to be dying. To her husband, who is absent on a political mission, she recently sent the following telegram: "Return instantly. I am very ill—dying." To which M. de — replied, "Pressing business. Wait a fortnight." Madame de — has waited.

THE PAPER CONTAINING MANY FINE POINTS—Paper of needles.

PYROTECHNICAL REMEDY FOR CRYING INFANTS—Rock-et.

A dry-goods clerk relates that a very pretty and stylish young lady called in the store the other day and requested to see some lavender kid gloves, whereupon she was shown several different shades of that color. Being a little overcome with so great a variety, she asked, "Which of those pairs are the lavenderest?"

CASTLES IN THE AIR—Chignons.

In what case is it absolutely impossible to be slow and sure?—In the case of a watch.

An old lady inquired at one of the railway stations what time the 7.45 train would start, and was told at quarter to eight. "Bless me!" she exclaimed, "you are always changing the time on this line."

"Madam, a good many persons were disturbed at the concert last night by the crying of your baby." "Well, I do wonder that such people will go to concerts."

TRANSPORTED FOR LIFE—A man who marries happily.

"Bob, you say you believe most diseases are contagious. How long have you entertained such notions?" "Ever since I sat alongside of a blue-eyed girl and caught the palpitation of the heart."

HOW TO MAKE RICH JAM—Crowd twenty fashionably-dressed ladies into one omnibus.

In a grave-yard near Paris there is this inscription upon a monument: "Here repose in peace, after sixty years of married life, Mr. and Mrs. —."

"I never complained of my condition but once," said an old man, "when my feet were bare and I had no shoes; but I met a man without feet, and became contented."

A humorous apothecary in Boston exposes a case of soap in his show-window with the pertinent inscription, "Cheaper than dirt."

DORA.

Kiss, oh Sleep, the eyes of Dora!
Gently shed your mandragora,
Slumbrous poppy-dew distill!
Open wide the gates of dreaming,
Hide the real in the seeming:
She is weary—she is ill.

Pale blue eyes are sick with weeping,
Pallor o'er her cheeks is creeping,
There's a canker in the rose;
There's no hope in her To-morrow:
She has drained the cup of sorrow,
And her life seems near its close.

From the threshold of his palace
Love held out its sparkling chalice,
Beaded o'er with happy dreams;
Purely, tenderly she lilt it:
Gladly, lovingly she sipt it,
For it shed prophetic beams—

Promise of a faith beneath it,
And a name—she dared not breathe it—
Name to wrap her love secure;
These, the flagon's deep containing,
Were held to her for her draining,
And she knew the draught was pure.

Time brought round her bridal morning,
And the wreaths for her adorning
They had twined about her head,
When through every fibre crashing,
Suddenly the news came flashing,
She is widowed—he is dead.

Kiss, oh Sleep, the eyes of Dora!
Gently drop your mandragora,
Slumbrous poppy-dew distill,
Ope the emerald gates of dreaming,
Hide the real in the seeming,
For her soul is very ill.

THE EAR.

THE human ear in its more perfect forms is certainly a beautiful object; but there is no feature which is so frequently unattractive. This may be owing to its neglect in childhood and youth. Being round the corner, as it were, of the face, it is apt to be left uncared for, while the front is more diligently tended. The shape of the ear is generally deformed in infancy and childhood by the carelessness of mother or nurse. In adjusting the cap, hat, or bonnet, while every effort is made to give it as jaunty a setting as possible upon the head, with the due rakishness of inclination to the right or left, the ears are allowed to shift as they may for themselves. They thus are either crumpled up and pressed down irregularly under the tight rim of the covering of the head, or squeezed out from their natural resting-places and forced into a stuck-out position which is by no means graceful. The careful mother will take the precaution each time that she puts on the cap, hat, or bonnet, as it may be, to smooth down with her gentle hands the ears of her child and see that they are held with a slight pressure, in their proper position, at the sides of the head, where they ought to snugly nestle. She will thus probably secure for her offspring a pair of small, transparent, delicately-colored and thin, shell-shaped ears such as nature intended, and escape those monstrous productions we so often see, which have been likened, with more or less justness of comparison, to swollen, overripe purple figs, gigantic oysters, and asinine excrescences. We have already recorded our protest against the barbarity of boring the ears and hanging baubles to them. We repeat our denunciation of this sin against nature and good taste. We would entreat our dames and damsels, for their own sake as well as ours, to modify the present style of dressing the hair, which, violently drawn away from the ears, leaves them exposed in all their ugly nakedness. In the ancient Greek statue of female beauty the ear is always partially hidden by the hair. It, in its ideal grace, it modestly half retires from the sight, it certainly, in its modern matter-of-fact ugliness, should conceal itself altogether. We might possibly be persuaded to make an exception in favor of a beautiful ear; but we can not be prevailed upon to accept the exposure of the auricular monstrosities to be beheld every where. Do with them what you please, but keep them out of sight, or at any rate do not force their ugliness upon our notice by jingling or glistening gewgaws.

The ear is a most complicated and delicate apparatus; but fortunately it is so shut up within the casement of the skull that it can hardly be disarranged by our negligence or interference. It has over the openings of its outer to the innermost of its series of winding passages membranes tightly stretched, like the parchment of a drum, and these vibrate to every sound, which is conveyed from one to the other by a chain of little bones. These in turn transmit the vibration to threads of nerves, which communicate the sensation to the brain and enable the mysterious power of this organ to form a perception of sound. As in the case of the military drum the membranes of the ear, which in fact are called drums, require for their proper vibration the presence of air on both sides. This, in case of the ear, is provided for not only by its external opening, but by an internal communication with the mouth and nose. Hence any cause which closes these inlets to the atmosphere is sure to affect the hearing. Thus an ordinary cold in the head, which swells the membrane of the nostrils, augments their natural discharge and stuffs them up, as it were, always produces a certain degree of deafness. The outer opening to the ear secretes for its protection, and to keep the passage smooth for the conveyance of sound, a natural wax. This is apt to accumulate in undue quantity, become hardened, and produce deafness and a disagreeable ringing sound. A little warm water squeezed into the ear from a sponge and a drop or two of sweet oil let fall into it afterward will generally remove the accumulation. If not, recourse should be had to the surgeon, who with a syringe and a blunt instrument will soon get rid of the uncomfortable deposit. It is a dangerous practice for persons to be fumbling about their ears with the ordinary little steel spoon at the end of the tweezers found in most dressing-cases. If thrust too far and forcibly into the ear, it may penetrate or tear its external drum and seriously damage the hearing. Most of the cases of prolonged deafness arise from permanent destruction of the internal apparatus or from paralysis of the nerves of the ear, and are unfortunately beyond the reach of art. These are the incurable cases upon which the quack speculates with such pecuniary success. His impudent and lying assertion of power never fails to find a credulous ear among those who have turned away in despair from the honest confession of impotency of the man of science.

THE PENCIL.

WE are beginning in this country to affect a taste for the fine arts, and have already sculptors, painters, and draughtsmen of whom there is reason to be proud. There is, however, as yet but little indication among our people of any serious affection for pictures and statues. The rich occasionally buy them, as they do superfine upholstery, to adorn their great houses, and esteem them according to the sums they cost.

The culture essential to an appreciation of art is very rare in the United States. There is undoubtedly a wide diffusion of knowledge among our people, and an increasing disposition to seek for enjoyment in refined pleasures, but the obvious means of educating the taste have been hitherto strangely neglected. How rarely is it that any one in this country learns drawing? and yet without some knowledge of this elementary branch it is impossible to have the least comprehension of a work of art. When matron or miss, after having made the grand European tour, comes back and prattles about the Madonna at Dresden, the Assumption at Venice, and the Apollo at Rome, it is safe to infer, if she has never put pencil to paper, that she knows nothing more about these master-pieces than what she has learned in the Guide-Book.

While in Europe almost every young girl has her drawing-pencil, in the United States you would as soon expect to see a pickaxe or a crowbar in her hands. No doubt these feminine sketchers often attempt impossibilities, and make such havoc with nature and art that chaos seems to have come again, tumbling the world into confusion and darkness.

"I once saw," wrote Thackeray, "a moon riding in the sky, serenely attended by her sparkling maids of honor, and a little lady said, with an air of great satisfaction, 'I must sketch it.' Ah! my dear lady, if with an H. B., a Bristol-board, and a bit of India rubber, you can sketch the starry firmament on high, and the moon in her glory, I make you my compliments!" Certainly this "little lady" had too exalted an idea of the art of which she was so ambitious a student, but she evidently somewhat appreciated the scene, for she thought it worthy of her aspiring pencil. This is one of the greatest advantages of a knowledge of drawing, that it directs the attention to and evokes a love for the beauties of nature and of art which without it would pass unheeded. So that every person the least practiced in the use of the pencil has a source of pleasure and refinement denied to those who are not.

Drawing should be made a compulsory branch of all education. In artistic, architectural, and engineering pursuits it is absolutely necessary, and in manufacturing and mechanical obviously useful; while it is in itself not only an enjoyment but the only means of introduction to that beautiful domain of art created by the genius of ages.

To women of leisure, more especially, drawing supplies a graceful occupation and a ready means, if diligently cultivated, of support in case of need. The great increase of illustrated books and magazines has opened in this country a new and ever-extending sphere to which female labor seems particularly appropriate, and if adapted by a skill easily acquired it would doubtless be applied.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to a Young Minister's Wife.

MY DEAR MADAME,—Our personal acquaintance may seem to you so slight as not to authorize me to address you a letter. But, although I have not the pleasure of knowing you intimately as an individual, I do know you but too well and too sympathizingly as one of a class, and I claim the right of a common humanity to send you a few words of regard, and, if you will permit, of counsel. If I should say that there are few women whom I pity more than you, you might feel offended; and yet, dear Madame, although I see how bravely you live, and how thoroughly you have schooled yourself to reticence and endurance, I know how your honest human heart indignantly protests against the necessity of heroism, and I take the liberty of honoring you as a heroine.

It is not very long since I had occasion to write to a young clergyman, who, if I correctly remember, was not your husband, but who might very easily have been so, and I begged him, above all things, to tread down Mrs. Grundy under his feet. But if that were necessary advice to him, what must it be to you? I do not recall the portrait of Mrs. Grundy among the devils who tormented St. Anthony, but the temptations and the horrors he endured and surmounted would have been slight compared to her persecutions, had she appeared in his desert. And when I turn over a port-folio or a grave old volume, and come upon a print of the poor Saint, I seem to myself to be contemplating the portrait of half the young ministers I know, and my heart aches accordingly. Yet St. Anthony suffered and endured for himself only. But your husband, Madame, undergoes the trial not only of and for himself, but for you.

Tell me now, if you please, and tell me truly, when you first saw the Reverend Eugene in the pulpit, and heard the sweet and earnest voice in which he proclaimed the glad tidings; when you saw, and saw truly, in his face the signs of his generous soul; when you felt that with him life would be a much less perplexing mystery than without his companionship; and when at last the words were spoken which are with most of you married people, as I am told, the most memorable words you ever speak or hear, would you have answered otherwise than you did could you have known what you now know? Would you have resigned yourself with such undoubting happiness to that tender entreaty and manly confession if you had heard in his words what he himself could not hear—what he would have remained silent forever rather than have spoken—and yet which were really in them? Let us look a moment, you and I, with our greater knowledge after these few years—with a knowledge which might indeed have enabled me to interpret those mysterious words to you even at that time—let us look, I say, and consider what he was really saying to you and offering to you, yet himself as innocent of the knowledge as a child.

"Dearest Agatha," he really said, under the form of the words you will always remember, "will you agree to put yourself under the most tyrannical supervision of Mrs. Grundy, from the collars you wear and the manner in which you dress your hair, to the food upon your table and the amusements in which you indulge, to the books you read, and to all your social and religious conduct? Will you agree to dress respectably enough for the dear pastor's wife, yet not gayly enough for a woman of the world; never to wear a red ribbon, and to see in a bright trimming the edge of the cloven foot; to smile just enough and in the most serious way, so that Mrs. Grundy shall be satisfied; to keep your children always neat and presentable; to take personal care of all the poor in the parish; to have your house a common resort for the sick and the abandoned, but to keep it in apple-pie order; to have a bed for the wandering minister and his wife who may happen in; to do all this upon a pittance which a boy would earn as a clerk, and to do it cheerfully and sweetly always, and as if you were the most favored of mortals? Will you, my angelic and beloved Agatha, become the butt of sharp censure and of old maids' criticism, of the judgment of deacons and the insolence of their wives, and consent that your most private tastes and habits and affairs shall become the scandal of an ignorant and meddlesome and impertinent little village?" If you had heard these words, dear Madame, in that soft June twilight when a low murmur was all that you perceived, and rather with your heart than with your ears, what would you have answered? Would you have leaned so long out of your window when you went to your chamber that night, conscious of the moonlight, of the sweetness of the roses, of the hushed gurgle of the brook under the trees, but with a heart so full of joy that you wondered any human being could be so happy?

Dear Madame, perhaps you are not prepared to answer. Then I answer for you that these are really the words which every Reverend young Eugene whispers to his angelic Agatha when he asks her to become the mistress of his household and of his rural parish or of his city parish. He beseeches her to become the prey of foolish and bitter tongues, to expose herself to every kind of misconception—in a word, to undertake the hopeless task of pleasing Mrs. Grundy. Do you think that I exaggerate, that I am slandering the average parish, and that it is unfair to represent the life of a young minister's wife as so peculiarly subject to censorious remark? Well, Madame, if you say so, I make bold to reply that I do not believe you think so. If you have ever been caught by Mrs. Deacon, coming in to call on a winter's evening, playing backgammon with Eugene, or still worse, playing everlasting or old maid at cards with the children, I think you feel that I speak merely the words of truth and soberness. If you have been found by Mrs. Verjuice some pleasant morning reading, and having laid the book upon the table, have seen the face of Mrs. Verjuice when she looked at the book and found it to be "Adam Bede," or "The Newcomes," I do not believe that you will accuse me of exaggeration. No, dear Madame, there is no person whose life is a more constant martyrdom than that of a young minister's wife with a large family and a small salary. For martyrdom is not always of the imposing type. It is not always the burning at the stake before the eyes of the world and history; nor the grim combat with wild beasts in the arena; martyrdom may be, and in the great multitude of cases is, a slow pricking to death with the points of pins. It may endure for years; the blood may not discolor a handkerchief; the victim may go smiling dreadingly about in the daily routine of life, but tell me, hundreds and thousands of Agathas and Eugenes, am I wrong in saying that the long martyrdom if more exquisitely painful is not less sure, and that no bad spirit in the next world can be a more torturing tyrant than Mrs. Grundy in this?

Dear Madame, my counsel is brief and simple, and, believe me, I know how hard it is to follow. When you see me come into church some rainy Sunday morning in this bitter month of March, and sit comfortably in my corner of the pew, and when the good Eugene gives out his text, spread my handkerchief over my head to avoid the ill-consequences of the chilly draught, when you see me do this, and further observe how cordially I mark my approval of every head of Eugene's discourse by emphatically nodding my own, you look over at me and you say in your heart: "How easy for a man and a bachelor, without responsibilities or care, with a good income and a natural contempt of Mrs. Grundy, to advise me and other Mrs. Eugenes to tread down that old hag under our feet! Does he know her real power as well as that which he supposes to be imaginary?" And at this point you turn away your eyes, dear Madame, because you are aware that Mrs. Deacon is looking at you, and saying in her heart: "What is that giddy young woman looking so hard for at Mr. Bachelor? It is a pretty state of things in the very church, too, when the minister's wife can't control her own eyes, but stares at other men in the midst of his sermon."

True, Madame, I can only give you advice fortified by experience. But if you would only let me be the friend I wish to be, I really think that I could help you. I should endeavor to persuade you that for every inch of independence that you surrender you will have to pay by an all of conformity. The condition of your liberty and of your happiness is breaking the first link of the chain. Whatever Mrs. Grundy calls it, however she conceals it, whether she blandly smile that it is only a nice regard for public opinion or a generous sacrifice of your own preferences, it is precisely the same thing—it is subjugation to her authority. Therefore carry the war into her own camp. If she blames your red ribbon, denounce her black one. If she upbraids you with "John Halifax," reproach her with her eternal "Saint's Rest," and general warfare upon music, sunshine, and flowers. Take the offensive. If she makes the parish hot for you, make it hiss and bubble around her. Let Eugene make friends with the young men by showing that religion is a blithe and inspiring faith, not a gloomy cynicism; and do you make sure of the young women by insisting that gayety is not the enemy of grace. Find Eugene a text from which he can excoriate backbiters and impertinent meddlers, and let him not hesitate to draw his illustrations from Mrs. Grundy and her sayings and doings. She will call you too young for your husband; she will declare that ministers' wives must not curl their hair; she will lift her hands in horror at your jockey-hat and feather; she will sniff that the pastor's wife could be more fitly employed in visiting the sick than in galloping off on horseback; she will rail at whatever you do, and sneer at whatever you leave undone. I am merely an old bachelor, with a handkerchief on my head to keep off the draught, but I warn you that more terrible than any rheumatism which I might catch is the slavery to which Mrs. Grundy would subject you; and your sole hope of escape lies in your own stout heart, in the sympathy of Eugene, and in the good sense of your parish, to which I appeal, and to whose keeping I commend you.

Your pitying friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE handsomest and most novel fabric for suits brought out this season is called silk serge. It has diagonal reps, is all silk, soft and pliant, will not rumple easily, and is seven-eighths of a yard wide. It is in great demand. $2 50 a yard is the price asked for it. It is in quiet colors; some of them very quaint, indeed. There are dark browns and grays, and the dismal yellow frog greens, distinguished by the fanciful French as "living frog" and "dying frog." Another shade is called "pie-crust." Thirteen yards makes the skirt and redingote, or a basquine.

During the summer it will be found a comfortable plan to dispense with the regular corsage of the dress, and wear white waists under blouse wrappings. Let the skirt of the dress, however, be ample and perfect. It is poor economy and bad taste to scant the material of the dress in order that there may be a greater abundance of trimming. No matter how plain the skirt, let it be complete; then there is a comfortable sense of security in case of accident. There is a tendency toward superfluous ornament. Let economy begin with the trimming, and ladies will not so often be surprised to find their mantua-maker's bill exceed the amount paid for the dress. We deprecate the idea adopted by some of sewing a band of the same goods as the redingote around an old skirt, or one made of cambric. At every breath of wind that moves the redingote the wearer fears that the sham will be discovered, and she convicted of an effort at display that she will not care to acknowledge. Short dresses with gored widths require so little material that it is best not to abridge the real garment, but rather to dispense with all elaborate ornament.

There is but little variety of pattern in the goods used for suits. Solid colors, chenés, and mottled grounds cover the whole range. Stripes are not well adapted to short dresses. Black seems to be in greater favor than ever here, and foreign journals say that the fickle Parisiennes do not weary of it. Black, green, and a very light shade of tan, with gray chenés and pongees will be most worn.

Poplin alpaca, a fabric with thick, coarse threads, is stylish and serviceable for ordinary street dresses. It will not retain the dust, nor does it lose its gloss and shrink when wet. A good article may be bought for ninety cents a yard, double fold. The pongee poplins are not new, but are much sought after. They are very desirable for traveling dresses, and it is almost impossible to wrinkle them. The fabric is silk and linen; black or brown mixed with white are the usual colors. There are pretty chenés, and white grounds with a colored dash on them that look nearly as handsome as an all silk poplin. They vary in price from $1 25 to $1 75 a yard. Besides these, there is a variety of other goods, such as mohair, chalcé, pine-apple cloth, and goat's hair, all suitable for spring wear. The prices range from fifty cents to a dollar a yard. Sixty-five cents buys a nice quality of mohair, which is exceedingly pretty when made with narrow frills on the skirt, redingote, and fichu.

IMPORTED WALKING SUITS.

Some spring suits just received from Paris are made with seven breadths in the skirt, all of which are gored. The front width is but slightly sloped. Two gored breadths form a bias seam in the back. These dresses are all in light neutral tints, trimmed with a more decided color in contrast, or a darker shade of its own. The most expensive suit, marked $200, is a repped chameleon silk, a delicate tan color, that seen in one light has a bright pink tinge. The skirt cut in the manner just described is untrimmed save by a thick silk cord around the edge, and measures three and a half yards at its greatest circumference. The over-garment is a tight-fitting basquine, with side-bodies and a seam down the middle of the back. The front and back are longer than the sides, and are square instead of sloping. Two cross-cut bands of silk, with a satin cord on either side, surround the basquine and sleeves. Heavy bullion fringe finishes the garment. Material for waist and sleeves is furnished.

A second suit is of black corded silk. The skirt is trimmed with three bias folds. A redingote or long blouse is worn over this and similarly trimmed, with the addition of a row of wide chenille fringe. A cap surrounds the coat-sleeves, falling very low under the arm, and lapping shorter on top. A belt confines the blouse at the waist. Long sash behind with wide fringed ends. Price $125.

Another of light tan color, lighter than the shade called cuir, is of poplinette, a lustrous silk and woolen fabric resembling chalcé. This has two skirts, the lower one of which has, besides the three folds that are seen on all garments, a ruffle of silk, pinked on one edge and sewn on at the other in box-pleats. The upper skirt has a rounded apron front. The back widths are made much longer, and are gathered in a band beside the front seam. A rosette festoons the back, and a sash depends from it. A short tight-fitting basque forms the only corsage necessary. This is open to the waist behind, rounded and lapped over, and discloses the rosette and sash on the skirt beneath it. Folds and a quilled ruffle trim the basque and upper skirt. A wide collar is simulated with folds. Instead of the epaulets so much worn of late above the arm-hole, folds crossing each other like a lattice are sewn around the sleeve, reaching down almost to the elbow. Large silk buttons.

A suit of goat's hair is pearl-colored. Three bias ruffles on the skirt are hemmed instead of bound. A narrow green satin galloon conceals the seam by which the frills are gathered. The basquine has but one ruffle, and is quite short in front. A small Marie Antoinette fichu bordered with a narrow frill is worn over the basquine. The long ends of the fichu form sashes. The belt is trimmed with galloon. Price $80.

A lavender suit is of a new material, all wool, but thin and light, and with a wide twill-like serge. A flounce six inches wide is quilled around the skirt, and headed by a ruche of purple and white silk pinked at the edges. The long basquine is bordered by this trimming. A cape, square in front, and falling down to the elbows, is open in the back, with long pelerine ends that are loosely tied together. A ruche and purple fringe surrounds the cape and tabs. Belt of the same with a ruche in the centre.

A summer traveling dress of buff linen, consisting of redingote and skirt, was marked $40. Small squares of linen were folded flat to form points, and sewn on the gored skirt in rows, with a heading above each row of black and white linen braid a half inch wide. The belt and sash ends and redingote were trimmed in the same way. Deep, square cuffs were simulated on the coat-sleeve, and large pockets were under the arms. A corsage of the same, or a white waist, may be worn with the skirt. Another linen suit was trimmed with brown military braid, one wide row and two narrower ones.

DINNER AND BREAKFAST DRESSES.

A dinner dress of Mentana red, gros grain, is among the late importations. It is made with a demi train, the back widths of which are sloped, making a bias seam down the back. One each of the three side-widths is placed a sash trimming formed of straps of satin of the same shade of red, ending in a loop, and gradually narrowing toward the waist. A larger fold of satin descends from the waist around the bars, is pointed at the ends, and trimmed with corded fringe. The sash is fringed and sewn on under the side-seams in the manner spoken of in the last Bazar, and caught together near the ends with a large satin ring. The narrow coat-sleeves have bands of satin laid on horizontally from wrist to arm-hole. The corsage is round, and made with a revers faced with satin. Price $250.

A visiting dress of green taffetas is trimmed with brown satin tabs. Green and brown promise to be a favorite combination. A collar of brown satin, pointed behind, is laid on the corsage. The belt is also of brown satin, and above it, sewn on the back of the corsage, are three rounded tabs, the longest in the centre. Three long sashes, instead of two, fall from beneath the belt, and are edged with guipure.

A morning dress of white percale with a black stripe is made a long, loose sacque, cut off at the knee, and finished out to the proper length with a broad ruffle. Large pearl buttons down the front. A white linen cord and tassel confine it at the waist. Coat-sleeves and Shakspeare collar. Price, ready-made, $15. Another breakfast dress of white cambric has a gored sacque with tucked front and a fluted puff going up over the shoulders and down the seams of the side-bodies. A row of Cluny insertion is on each side of the puff. The long, trained skirt has a puff and insertion above the hem. Coat-sleeves with a puff on the outside seam. Bands of blue chambray are sewn under the insertion, a better plan than to use ribbon, as it does not have to be removed when washed.

PARASOLS.

The handles of parasols this season are in the rustic styles, broad and flat. Some of them are inlaid with woods of different shades, others have medallions of gilt with a profile on them or a beetle or fly, while small mirrors are inserted in the handles of others. Massive sticks of yellow ivory are displayed ready to be mounted with silk and lace covers. The jet embroidery so profusely used last summer is entirely out of style. Rosettes of lace, small butterfly bows of silk or satin, pinked ruffles, marabout feathers, leaves of gilt, and bullion fringes are the fashionable ornaments. On very light, delicate colors clusters of flowers are painted, a different group on each division of the parasol. A stuffed humming-bird with outspread wings is poised on one, while butterflies and mother-of-pearl flowers are found on others. Black satin is lined with crimson and mazarin blue. A novelty is a black satin speckled with yellow as if powdered with gold. Black silk without lustre is used for mourning, surrounded with deep bands of crape. The useful pongees are lined with delicate and becoming colors. Prices are very moderate this season.

LACE COLLARS, FICHUS, ETC.

Short barbes of real point lace and point appliqué are brought out for collars. These are preferred to round collars, as they can be adjusted by a brooch to fit neatly. The Shakspeare points are not so long as formerly, and are rounded. A newer shape has the points diverging from the brooch. The five sharp points worn last season have now two tabs hanging down behind. A pretty fashion in thread lace is a narrow standing collar with points turned over at the throat, like those worn by gentlemen. Linen collars are made with deep points on the shoulders, or are plain bands hem-stitched, or trimmed with Cluny insertion and edge.

The Empress has revived the old-fashioned velvet band, or dog's collar, worn smooth over the throat and fastened by a small brooch. Our American empresses can not all afford to stud these bands with emeralds and diamonds as her Majesty does, but they have already adopted this pretty little device of the great leader of fashion to make a white throat look fairer still. With the Pompadour and revers waists this black velvet collar is preferred to the heavy Indian necklaces, long strings of gilt filigree beads, that fall sometimes almost to the belt.

White organdy fichus are inexpensive and graceful additions to home toilettes, and can easily be made at home. The fichu and sash ends should be cut lengthwise of the muslin without a seam in the whole affair. The prettiest trimming is a fluted ruffle three inches wide, with a narrow hem and two tucks on one edge, and merely hemmed on the other. A fine cord gathers it to leave a narrow frill at the top. Another easily made is of illusion puffs covering the whole foundation. A narrow box-pleated ruffle of the same surrounds it.

CRINOLINE.

Crinoline remains very small; but it is rumored that the immense paniers, large at the sides and flat behind, worn lately in French saloons with trained dress, are to be slightly modified and worn with short suits. This is another feature of the Marie Antoinette styles; and those of our readers who have seen Ristori's representations of the court of that queen, will agree with us that it is the one disagreeable feature of the costume.

PERSONAL.

THE H. K. BROWN $15,000 statue of LINCOLN, for Brooklyn, has arrived, and will at once be placed in the grand plaza in front of the principal entrance to Prospect Park. This is the same BROWN who did the equestrian statue of G. W. in Union Square.

—MR. A. T. STEWART gloves New York at the rate of $200,000 per annum, retail. His artist in kids is a gentleman named WHEELER, who invents designs which are carried to a practical consummation in beautiful Paris. Mr. STEWART may say to his lady customers what OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES did to a New England father:

"Be a parent: don't neglect your kids."

—SCULPTOR POWERS comes home this summer to spend some months with relatives at Cincinnati, where he commenced his sculptural career by making wax-figures for Dorfenil's Museum. The first person he chiseled was DRAKE, a popular comedian in that region thirty-five years ago.

—BRIGHAM YOUNG has just taken for his thirty-first wife Miss MERVINE VAN COTT. The nuptial festival was also distinguished by the marriage of his fourth daughter to Elder HIRAM B. CLAWSON, whose first wife is Mr. YOUNG's oldest daughter, ALICE. What a lot!

—The finest-looking woman in England is said to be Lady ERZ MAURICE.

—The Bazar learns from a gentleman just from Mobile that Ex-District-Attorney MARTIN, who attempted to assassinate Judge BUSTEED, will be tried by a military commission instead of by the Criminal Court of Mobile. Judge BUSTEED is spending a short time with his friend JACOB STANWOOD, Esq. (of Boston), who owns a large plantation near Montgomery, which he is working with entire success. On Judge B.'s arrival at Montgomery, from Mobile, he was called upon by many of the old and prominent residents of the place, who expressed their abhorrence of the attempt that had been made upon his life, and their respect for the manner in which he had deported himself, officially and personally, during his residence in Alabama. Judge B. expects to return North in May next.

—DEAN ALFORD (Dean of Canterbury) is out in the Contemporary Review in favor of Christian Union. He denounces High-Church exclusiveness as unscriptural and of evil effect; argues well that New Testament bishops "have hardly any thing in common with the Church officers which have since borne that name;" insists that the Church "has no right to enforce Episcopal government as the one essentially requisite," declares that to call Dissenters schismatic "is the height of folly and pedantry;" asserts that in piety and learning they rival if they do not surpass "Churchmen," confesses that in doctrine he is divided from them by "the thinnest possible partition;" suggests that, as a token of unity, Christians of all denominations be invited to special celebrations of the Lord's Supper, "the only words heard being the Scripture narrative of its institution, and the bread and wine being administered in silence;" and admits that the "legitimate corollary" of all this is a free exchange of pulpits. This will do for a high dignitary of the Established Church of England, and shows that the world does move after all, and that even ritual tendencies toward Rome are balanced by evangelical tendencies toward the communion of all true believers.

—MR. GOUGH has delivered, mainly on temperance, 5400 lectures, to audiences averaging 1000 persons. Recently he was the victim of a practical joke at Chicago. NASBY and the Fat Contributor called on him at his rooms in the Tremont House, having previously ordered "drinks for three" to be sent up there every five minutes. GOUGH stood it until four trays, properly laden, had arrived from the bar-room, when the cold-water champion suspected the joke that was being played upon him, and insisted, with admirable good-nature, that his guests should leave his room, "For if you don't," said he, "my reputation as a temperance man would be ruined before another half hour, if it is not now." They went.

—MRS. KATE WARR, a female detective, of Chicago, has just died at the age of 35. At the time of the passage of Mr. LINCOLN and suite from Harrisburg to Washington, when rumors of assassination were rife at Baltimore, an unknown lady suddenly appeared and arranged the time of departure, the procuring of a sleeping-car berth, and such other precautionary steps as her knowledge of the plot and ready judgment suggested. The "unknown lady" was Mrs. WARR. She was subsequently placed at the head of the female detectives at Washington, and later at New Orleans.

—MRS. CADY STANTON and Miss ANTHONY may take heart and comfort from a paragraph in a recent letter from Europe, which comes gallantly to the rescue on the woman question. It says, "One of the most interesting pictures in Bologna is the work of a young woman who was the friend and favorite of GUIDO, and a successful student of his style, who was poisoned from jealousy by a deformed artist, a vain rival of her powers. Her genius and her fate are remembered even in the modern art of Bologna, and one of the best works in the modern collection is a picture of her death-bed with GUIDO at her side. Woman's genius has always been specially marked in Bologna. NOVELLA D'ANDREA and LAURI BASSI were honored with degrees in the university, and even lectured in Bologna to learned ladies from France and Germany. MADONNA MANZOLINA was Professor of Anatomy; and MATILDA TAMBRONI, filled the Greek chair just before MAZZORANTI, a native of Bologna. It was pleasant, and seemed a sort of evidence of the perpetuation of the influence of feminine genius in Bologna, to notice last evening a woman playing the harp in the orchestra of the Opera. Nobody seemed to find any thing very noticeable in a fact so unusual or impossible in England or America—the boasted home of women's rights."

—The ladies of England have set themselves to work "like men" to found a true college for women, where the young women shall be resident during the whole of the academical (half of the actual) year. Mrs. BODICHON leads the subscription with £1000, followed by many subscriptions of £100. The resident authorities will be women, but the classes will be taught by either men or women, as may be found expedient. The building with accommodation for 100 students is to cost £30,000, and it is intended that the college course, including board and lodging, shall not cost more than £80 a year for each student. The council includes the Bishop of St. David's, Lady CHURCHILL, the Dean of Ely, Lady EASTLAKE, Mr. LLEWELLYN DAVIES, Dr. GULL, Mr. GORST, M.P., Mr. RUSSELL GURNEY, M.P. (the Recorder of London), Mr. PAGET, Miss SWANWICK, Miss DORA GREENWELL, Miss EMILY TAYLOR, and other eminent persons. Each student is to have a separate room.

—Since the death of CANNING, in 1827, DISRAELI is the first Commoner who has been Prime Minister of England. Only three Commoners have held the post. Sir ROBERT PEEL, who was Premier thirty years ago, was the second of his family enjoying the title. Mr. PITT was too nearly related to the peerage to be considered as of the people.

—Some envious and malignant person in Chicago has been speaking of the presiding officer of the House of Representatives as "Mr. Speaker COLDFACTS," the American Gradgrind. Fact!

—MR. BARNUM is said to have determined to abandon the Museum business. Too much conflagration. He has money enough, has married off all his daughters, and can afford now to enjoy his "opium cum digitalis," as the druggist observed.

—MR. HAIGHT receives for rent of the St. Nicholas Hotel and stores $150,000 per annum. The hotel is said to have made a profit of $200,000 in 1867.

—A recent and characteristic observation of HENRY WARD BEECHER is: "Among God's kindest gifts to me, I esteem it the best, that I am permitted to work among so many Christians of different name and organization. Truth, in its universal relations to the wants of the soul, is truer than truth specialized for the structural exigencies of a system. Systematizing is a process of exclusion. It is like a wall, good for all that are within it, but bad for all outside of it."

—LOUIS NAPOLEON can be as jocular as any of us when he chooses. A Paris correspondent gives a funny series of answers by the Emperor and Empress, in playing at questions and answers a few days since at the Tuileries. They were as follows, the first answer to each question being that of the Emperor: "What quality do you prefer?"—"Gratitude," and "Devotion." "What are your favorite occupations?"—"Seeking the solution of insoluble questions," and "Doing good." "What should you like to be?"—"My grandson," and "What I am." "What historical personages do you most hate?"—"The Constable de Bourbon," and "Lopez." "What faults do you most easily pardon?"—"Those by which I profit," and "Those which passion excuses."

—MADAME RATAZZI, the sprightly wife of the ex-Premier of Italy, doesn't at all mind saying exactly what she thinks of the throned women of Europe. For instance, she says that "Queen ISABELLA, of Spain, wishes to make people believe that she is a paragon of benevolence. Her charities are distributed in so ostentatious a manner that they lose much of their value. Ex-Queen MARY, of Naples, who, under different circumstances, would have become a very excellent lady, smokes cigarettes, likes to wear top-boots and male attire, generally swears (Coryo di Bacco), boxes the ears of her servants, etc. The Empress EUGENIE wishes us to believe that extreme vanity and extravagance far surpassing that of the poor JOSEPHINE are not incompatible with a piety so showy that few people will believe in its sincerity. Shopping is her favorite occupation—that is, inspecting dry-goods brought for her inspection to the Tuileries. The Empress of Austria is rather a dull woman, but a good wife and a good mother. The Empress of Russia is an invalid, spending most of her time on a chaise longue, painting water-color sketches. The Queen of Prussia thinks she is very clever, and perhaps she is. She delights in talking with eminent poets and scholars. The Queen of Denmark is a good housewife, who has brought up her children creditably. The Queen of Belgium is the first equestrienne of her little kingdom, and talks 'horse' better than any habitué of the turf; and the Queen of Holland is a blue-stocking, priding herself on her extraordinary familiarity with a number of modern languages."

Guipure Net Book-Mark worked with Gold Thread.

THE accompanying illustration shows part of a book-mark, which is netted in fine thread and worked in point de feston, point d'esprit, and point de toile, the former of which is described on page 361, and the two latter in Harper's Bazar, No. 19. The figures marked in point de toile are worked in gold thread, which adds greatly to the effect of the whole. Prepare the netted foundation in the same manner as for a square; that is, begin with two foundation stitches over a mesh of requisite size, then add one stitch at the end of every round till the stripe has reached the width desired (25 stitches in the pattern); then net one round without adding any stitches. After this, continue by adding one stitch at the end of the next round, and by taking off one (that is, netting two stitches in one) at the end of the return round. Proceed in this manner, the rounds alternating, till the work has reached the desired length; then net again a round without widening or narrowing, and after this take off one stitch at the end of each round till the stitches are all cast off. Work the foundation, as shown in the pattern, in thread of medium fineness and gold thread. This book-mark can be made of any length desired. The other end may be worked in the same design, or it may be worked in point d'esprit, and finished by a plain edge in point de toile like the borders.

Ribbon Book-Mark embroidered in Point Russe.

THE pattern given is of white ribbon. The design is worked with fine black silk in point russe. The ribbon is cross stitched along the edges to a white silk lining. On the upper end both the ribbon and lining are raveled out; on the other end both thicknesses are joined by means of white silk tassels.

BOOK-MARK EMBROIDERED IN POINT RusSE.

Embroidered Cover for Bible, Prayer-Book, etc.

THIS design can be worked on a foundation of black velvet, reps, or watered silk. The original is of black velvet, embroidered with silver thread in satin and over-stitch; black crochet silk can also be used.

Border for the Cover of Pulpit or Reading-Desk.

THIS border is worked in gold and silver embroidery on white silk reps, and is set on a foundation of black satin, cloth, or reps. In the pattern, the darkest application figures are of black satin, and the two others, which are designated by the darker and lighter shading, of gold and silver brocade. The work is in raised embroidery, of gold and silver cord, thread and braid of the same material. The border may also be worked on the foundation of the cover in case the latter does not require a border in contrasted colors. The design may be worked in silk. The border can, of course, be made of any length desired; the third figure in the darkest shade forms the middle of the design.

Needle Threader.

See illustration, page 357.

THE advantages of a machine which threads a needle quickly and easily are very apparent. Fig. 1 shows such a one of the full size. The tube shown in Fig. 1 contains a fine steel rod (the threader), which stands out somewhat, and is fastened to a spiral spring (see illustration), so that it is movable in the tube.

The process of threading is as follows: Put a needle, with the head downward, above in the tube; lay a thread, one end of which should be shorter than the other, according to Fig. 2, over the groove at the end of the threader; take the tube in the left hand, hold the thread between the thumb and forefinger of the right hand—without drawing it tight—and with the thumb of the left hand press against the spring, by which the threader pushes the thread through the eye of the needle and out through the opening. Then take the thread between the thumb and forefinger of the right hand (Fig. 4), draw out the short end, and take the threaded needle out of the machine (Fig. 5).

Needle-Book in the Form of a Port-folio.

See illustration, page 357.

MATERIALS: Perforated card-board, green split wool, green twisted silk, black sewing silk, white flannel.

For making this needle-book take, first, two pieces of perforated card-board, each three inches in length by two in width; these form the sides of the port-folio. Each of these pieces is worked on one side (as shown in the accompanying illustration) with green split wool and green silk crossing it. Where the silk threads cross they are fastened each with a cross stitch of the same silk. Join to one of these pieces a band of the perforated card-board, which is worked in cross stitch with green wool, and sewed around the edge with black silk. The part that lies over in front can be prepared by reference to the pattern, working it in split wool and silk, corresponding to the back and front. Then prepare a piece of green silk three inches in width by six in length. On one end of this sew the worked side to which the band was fastened, and on the other, which must be cut correspondingly sloping, the part which lies over the front.

Between this and the front side, and at the same distance from both, sew the worked card-board which was designed for the back. For the needles take a strip of white flannel seventeen inches long by two and a half inches wide, work the edge in button-hole stitch with black silk, and lay it together, as shown in the illustration, so that each fold shall be two inches from the next one. Work the outer edge of each fold in cross stitch with black silk, and on each separate part thus formed work in black silk, as shown in the pattern, the number of the needles which are to be put in that part. The strip of flannel must be fastened inside the port-folio at the under side of the back. Two narrow straps of double silk are fastened to the back in the form of handles.

Crochet Under-Shirt for Infant.

THIS little shirt is worked in coarse white knitting cotton over a laying-in of white cord. Begin on the back with a foundation of forty-six stitches. On this foundation crochet backward and forward nine rounds in single crochet, always drawing the needle through both the upper threads of the stitch. In the third round make the eyelet-holes by working between every five single crochet three stitches over the cord alone, passing over three stitches of the last round. In the fourth and eighth round widen in each one stitch; also, crochet without the cord the last and first two stitches on the side which is to be the upper edge. The side on which the cord becomes visible by this means is the wrong side of the work. After having completed the ninth round, make on the under part of the shirt the first gore, which consists of two short inserted rounds (each round numbers sixteen stitches). These two inserted rounds are worked like the others, backward and forward, on the last sixteen stitches of the last round. Then follows a round on the entire number of stitches, and, after this, a gore (twelve stitches long) on the upper border. Crochet again nine rounds over the entire row of stitches. In the following round—the 20th from the beginning of the work—begin the arm-hole by leaving, without working, the last eight stitches on the upper border. In the 22d and 24th rounds, leave in each two additional stitches without working. (The last and first six stitches on the arm-hole are always worked without cord.) Now work five rounds with the same number of stitches, then on the under border a gore (eighteen stitches long), and again nine rounds over the entire row of stitches, widening on the under edge one stitch after each three rounds. Next, in order to obtain the requisite number of stitches for the front, and to correspond with those passed over on the other side, make at the end of the 34th and 36th rounds each two, and at the end of the 38th round ten new stitches. Now follow eight rounds over the entire row of stitches; a gore on the under border, nineteen stitches long; three rounds over the entire row of stitches; a gore like the last (on the upper border); eight rounds over the entire row of stitches. From the beginning of the second gore, on the upper border, to the 60th round, counting from the beginning of the work, which forms the middle of the front of the shirt, three stitches must be missed at regular distances. With the 60th round the shirt is half finished. Work the other half by reversing the instructions given; and last, finish the upper edge by a row of single crochet without the cord.

Coiffure for Young Girl.

THIS mode of dressing the hair requires a frisette for the front, and another frisette and an extra strand of hair for the chignon. Separate the middle part of the front hair from the rest, comb it backward over a frisette, and arrange it from the crown of the head forward in a plait which is fastened to the back hair, which last is combed downward and fastened as shown in the accompanying illustration. The end of the plait is fastened in a knot, and the extra strand of hair is at the same time added, and left for the present without further attention. The back hair is divided into two strands, each of which is rolled loosely and laid just behind the ear, extending to the upper part of the plait, where it is fastened. Now divide the front hair remaining at each side of the middle portion into two strands on each side. Comb backward the two strands next the middle, and lay them back crosswise over the plait, as shown in the illustration. Fasten a frisette to the plait and cover it with the three strands of hair which in the illustration are seen hanging loosely, the middle one of these being brought upward and fastened on the plait by means of a comb. Lastly, roll loosely the remaining strands of the front hair, lay it above, and fasten to the chignon as shown in the illustration.

THE art of transferring engravings to the surface of white wood was fashionable in the days of our grandmothers, and many beautiful specimens are to be found among the relics and keepsakes of the past. Since then, however, a new branch of this art has been introduced, by which engravings and fine-

With paper it will be best to use the unsized kinds, or if this is inconvenient the whole sheet may be sponged and stretched by pasting on a wooden frame. COIFFURE FOR YOUNG GIRL.—BACK.

colored prints may be transferred to other materials, and especially to the surface of porcelain or ground glass vases, shades, etc., causing them to resemble very closely the expensive painted articles of French manufacture.

Take a vase of pure white porcelain, bisque, or Parian ware, or one of plain ground glass (white is best); select your picture, which may be either a small landscape, a bouquet, group of birds, or some simpler subject, such as a flag in colors. (The colored pictures look best for this purpose.) Lay it flat upon a board or table, right side up, and with a fine camel's-hair brush and transfer varnish go over the whole picture without touching the margin, and leave it about five minutes to dry. When just dry enough to be sticky lay it in proper position upon the surface to be ornamented, face down, and do not move it after it is once laid on, as it might spoil the effect; for this reason it is important to fix it right and straight at first. Now press slightly on the back of the picture until every part adheres tightly. When this is done wet it until well saturated with water, and let it soak for a few moments, when the paper may be removed by a little very careful rubbing. If the picture becomes dry before all the paper is removed, it must be moistened again, and finally washed carefully with a camel's-hair paint-brush until nothing remains but the picture itself transferred to the surface.

When perfectly dry, which will not be perhaps before the next day, it may be varnished with a thin coat of white varnish—either antique, Grecian, or outside varnish will answer, though the last is best. They may all be had of any dealer in artists' materials, together with suitable pictures for the purpose.

This outside varnish must be put on with a camel's-hair brush, and with great care that nothing be touched but the actual surface of the picture, as a daub on the porcelain or ground glass would not look well. Set it out of the way of dust until quite dry.

Vases prepared thus can be washed like ordinary china ones, only soaking in soap-suds must be avoided.

For experimenting a white china cup, saucer, or plate will answer very well, and a very pretty card-receiver is produced by thus ornamenting a simple china tea-plate.

This kind of transfer work may be applied to many other materials, such as ivory, papier-maché, earthenware, japanned tinware, waiters, dark wood, fans, leather bags, boxes, etc. In order, however, to proceed with these different objects, a little change in the rules will be necessary.

With all dark-colored materials, before applying the transfer varnish the face of the picture must be coated with white lead mixed well in turpentine; and when this is thoroughly dry put on the transfer varnish over it; then lay it in its place and proceed as before directed. This coat of white paint will furnish a light back-ground for the picture, and have a better effect than if applied at once to the dark surface.

Silk banners, badges, sashes, coverings for pin-cushions, etc., and paper articles, can be ornamented also in this way. With silk the only change necessary is to omit the washing of the back with a brush, substituting a sponge instead, and using the greatest care that no moisture may touch the silk.

With paper it will be best to use the unsized kinds, or if this is inconvenient the whole sheet may be sponged and stretched by pasting on a wooden frame. When dry it will be perfectly tight and smooth; this is necessary as the sizing in the paper would prevent the perfect transfer of the picture. The picture itself, having been cut out, may be varnished as directed and allowed to dry entirely, when a second coat should be applied; this being nearly dry, place it on the paper and press gently until it adheres. Then with a brush moisten the back, and leave it to soak for about ten minutes before rubbing; this last process must be very carefully done or the paper will tear.

In case it is desired to remove any of these pictures after being thus transferred, it will only be necessary to saturate it well with turpentine and then rub with a rag.

This mode of proceeding will be an excellent way to imitate papier-maché if applied to wooden articles which have been first coated with black Japan varnish, the little tendrils, gilding, etc., being put on afterward with a brush.

This valuable art has been introduced into this country from Russia, where it is very much in vogue. There the wax-candles used on special occasions are ornamented with various designs, and present quite a showy appearance when placed upon a mantle-piece or in hanging candelabra.

TOO LATE!

"Too late?"—Can you mean to prepare me a sermon because I'm too late for the "Polka" or "German?" And frown at me so that I fear there's no use of trying to frame a sufficient excuse. For an absence that troubles me scarcely at all, since I only escaped the fatigues of the ball? I am glad that the worst of the evening is through: "Then why did I come?"—why, I came to see you!

I heard from young Spinner—that terrible swell!—The moment I entered, that you were the belle: He said it was something to find at a ball A girl with "no nonsense about her" at all. I saw, what he meant I should see, at a glance, You'd been very gracious to him in the dance; If you've crowned him with fortune and left me to fate, Then, Minnie, I'll grieve that I entered so late.

'Twere hard if my sentence to-night you determine Because I neglected the "Polka" or "German;" And gave that poor Spinner, and others, a chance To clasp this dear hand once again in the dance. My presence so late in the evening I planned, My darling, that I might solicit your hand; Your hand and your heart—I shall cavi at less; You're smiling!—you hear me!—dear Minnie, say "Yes!"

Say "Yes," and I'll willingly list to a sermon, Though you fancy to make it as long as the "German." Oh, let not my hopes like these flowers have a blight, And leave me with nothing to say but—good-night!—There's Grafulla beating the final tattoo, And cavaliers bidding their partners adieu! The evening is over that settled my fate, And Minnie confessed that I was not too late!

"I DO NOT LOVE YOU."

IN SIX CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER IV.

ON a June day in the following year little Mrs. Elphinstone was sunning herself on the terrace outside the window of her sitting-room. Her hand was full of roses, below her was her rose-garden, beyond that the sunny slopes of the park stretched away to the beech-woods, shining in early summer sun-steeped green.

A very fair scene, and she looked a fair little woman; her bright clustering hair glistened in the sunshine; her cheeks were rounder than they used to be, and had a tinge of color, and her morning dress was graceful and pretty. There was certainly just then more appearance of physical well-being about Mrs. Elphinstone than there had been for long years about Lily Winters; but for the rest—

What did her husband think? Unknown to her he was watching her now. He called her; she started at his voice, and came toward him hurriedly.

"You want me?"

"It is nothing important; there is no reason you should look frightened." He stood in the window blocking it up so that she could not immediately go in. He put his hand on her head as she stood in the sunshine, and, bending it back, perused her face.

"What is it?" she asked.

"I am trying to discover—I have been trying great part of the morning. Lily, I wish you would cure yourself of some things—"

"Tell me what things, Ralph." She stooped forward to put her roses inside the room and to withdraw her head from the pressure of his hand.

"Among others of staring when I call you, and of that strange trick you have of widening your eyes and lifting your brows when I speak to you, in a way that makes you look like some poor wild creature that has been caught and caged, but never tamed. These things are very painful to me—that expression especially."

"It is very painful to me to be so watched! I wish, Ralph, you would not do it; you make me so nervous that I am almost afraid to move, and then I do all the more the things I try not to do. You can not think how hard I try to please you." She had spoken pettishly—a thing she did very seldom—now she paused, looked up into his face, then covered her own, and burst into tears. He had rarely known her to do this—in general her misery was dry eyes.

Some long untouched chords of her being had been made to vibrate that morning. As she looked upon the early summer beauty of the world, a feeling had come over her that life was worth having while there could be moments in which the outward beauty of the universe made unmarred music in the soul. This feeling had come over her while she was spell-bound—held by a sort of dream, during which she lived back in that time when want and loss and emptiness had made up her existence, and her misery had been negative. Her husband's voice sounded a sudden awakening, and sent a jarring vibration through her. Less on her guard, less under her own control than usual, feeling the chains that bound her more, because for a time she had forgotten them, she burst into tears and cried, "Oh, I am miserable! for I know now that I was right—that I make you more and more miserable."

"Hush!" he whispered, and he drew her hands away from her face, and drew her into the room. "No tears now; I came to tell you of a visitor, before whom, if you see her at all, you must make a show of happiness. Mrs. Maston is here. Acting with her usual assurance, she has dared come to see you. Do you choose to receive her? One of the children is with her. Why, one would think you had loved the woman to see your face now!"

"Not her, but little Effie. Is it little Effie who is with her? I did love little Effie, and she loved me."

"I think it is Effie who is with her. You will find them in the drawing-room."

Lily was hurrying from the room, when, looking in the mirror to see that her face told no tale of tears, she caught the expression of Mr. Elphinstone's. Her aspect changed directly. She calmed herself, went and stood before him, demure and quiet. For a moment there had shone from her face something of the girlish radiance he remembered to have seen upon it long, long years ago; now, as she stood before him, she was wholly Mrs. Elphinstone, restrained and cautious, studiously considerate of his will.

"You would rather I did not see Mrs. Maston?" she said. "Effie is nothing to me if you do not wish me to see her."

"Nothing is any thing to you, I know," he answered, bitterly. "I know that you are all duty and submission; but I am not quite such a tyrant as you make me out. I do not want your life to be nothing but a series of small sacrifices supplementing the great one." He tried to speak lightly after the first outburst. "Come, we will go together," he said, smiled, and drew her hand through his arm.

Lily was not deceived. She had no pleasure in the wild caresses of the child, who bounded toward her when she opened the door, and, in spite of all her mother's previous schooling, hung upon her neck. Her husband was not watching them, he studiously avoided doing so: he was talking graciously to the handsome widow; but she knew, by past experience, that he heard and saw and felt all she did and said; and this knowledge made her kiss the pretty child stealthily, as if to do so were a crime. But Effie was not to be repulsed or kept in check. When Mrs. Elphinstone was seated she sprang upon her lap, and, to her mother's admonition not to be so troublesome, answered:

"This is not being troublesome; Miss Winters used to like to have me here. She loved me and nobody else in the world. She told me so one day—one day when I was naughty, and she was trying to make me good." Effie was old enough, and enough spoiled by hearing too much of her worldly mother's conversation with like-minded friends, to have a dash of mischievous wickedness mingling with her childish simplicity; and now she pushed her face close up to Lily's, and whispered:

"Why did you leave me, and go to him, when you loved me and didn't love him?" with a nod toward Mr. Elphinstone. "Was it because this was so much nicer than our school-room?"

"No, no, child—no. You must not say such things. You are talking of what you can not understand."

As Lily answered thus her heart beat with great bounds against the clinging child, and her arm tightened round her convulsively. She looked at her husband, dreading to see signs that he had heard. Then she joined in the conversation about places in Italy and the south of France, where she and Mr. Elphinstone had wintered.

Mrs. Maston had not thought that it would prove pleasant or convenient to be on hostile terms with the Elphinstones; so, before Lily returned, she addressed to her a long letter of explanation, congratulation, and self-justification. Bringing Effie with her to-day had been her final attempt to secure for herself a good reception.

"What was the matter with you, Lily?" her husband asked, when Mrs. Maston and Effie had left. "I am not obliged to you if you think me such a jealous fool that I can not bear to see you fondle a child; but you behaved as if you did think so."

Lily's eyes wandered about the room, with the restless imploring look of one seeking help, and finding none. Was she seeking a way out of the labyrinth of misery? Then she came and stood before her husband, in that shrinking, helpless attitude, to see which especially pained and annoyed him.

"I do not know what to do, where to turn for advice," she said. "You are my husband, can you be my friend, too? What are we to do? Things grow worse, and I am afraid—afraid of what lies before us. I study to serve you, to satisfy you. I have not a thought which has any thing to do with this present world that is not yours. Yet I know, I see, I feel, that I pain you, wound you, torture you. Ralph, what shall we do? It is so miserable. What shall we do? What shall I do?"

He bent his face down to hers, and said: "What you must do is soon told. You talk of duty, and omit the one thing needful. You talk of submission, and keep an obstinate heart. What you must do is soon told—love me!"

She lifted her eyes to his. The truth flew forth from them against him. It was no new truth to him, yet it bruised him afresh, and made him recoil. As if the eyes had not spoken plainly enough, her lips parted, and the words, "I do not love you—I do not love you; I can not—can not—can not love you," rushed from between them.

When they were spoken she caught in her breath, as if trying to recapture the escaped sounds, and wrung her hands, and cried: "It was not I. It was some demon in me spoke. Forgive me, Ralph—oh, Ralph, forgive me!"

She ran from the room, down the garden, and through the park, and into the copse, near the wood; there she sank down in the ferns, and lay hidden. He followed her and found her; and, by-and-by, as the first dinner-bell rang, the servants saw their master and mistress saunter up the garden arm in arm. He had been in an agony lest, by one of the gardeners or any one about the place, his wife's wild flight had been observed; but it happened to be the workmen's dinner-hour, and the grounds were deserted. Perhaps one of the most stinging of the perpetual irritations which made things worse and worse for both of them, as time went on, was that caused by the ceaseless effort to keep up appearances. Mr. Elphinstone was a proud man; he would not have his misery suspected could it have been lessened by half through being known; and Lily after that day was aware of this. After that day she literally strained and warped her candid nature—accepting it as part of her "duty" to act what she did not feel; trying, each day, to act well through that day the lie of her life—to act the part of a wife who loved her husband. Of course there were times when nature reacted from this great strain: in future, she tried at such times to shut herself up away from every body—most of all away from her husband, lest she should be impelled to tell him not only that she did not love, but that she hated him—which she did not (it was not in her nature to hate), save when she was almost mad that she could not love him; but that she should soon do so was one of the dreads of her life.

After the outbreak of that June day every thing went on as before; no new truth had been heard or told. Perhaps, for a time, things were a little better than before. Lily, torn by remorse and full of self-reproach, redoubled her efforts at self-control—her efforts by no word or deed or look to pain him.

CHAPTER V.

THE second winter of their married life Mr. and Mrs. Elphinstone did not go abroad. In the following spring, very early, it was before the snow-drops were out of bloom, for the grave was for many days strewn with them, there was a small new mound in the church-yard—the pretty quiet church-yard, one gate of which opened from the park.

Poor Lily's life seemed to be a deepening pool of darkening anguish. In her husband's presence she gasped back all the tears that should have lost their bitterest of bitterness being shed upon his breast, and which, repressed, settled round her heart, to grow stagnant and poisonous.

He had not rejoiced with her in her half-delirious brief joy, and had not grieved with her in her grief, she thought. Shuddering and sighing, she said to herself: "I shall hate him by-and-by. I am going down that road, and I do not know how to stop."

Why could not Lily learn to love her husband? He was a man most men admired; a man more than one woman had loved for himself; not as Mrs. Maston had done, for his position. Why could not Lily learn to love him? Do you think she did not ask herself that question with self-torturing persistence—trying to wring the reason out of her soul? Do you think she did not set her poor little will, all of herself she had power over, toward her "duty"? Poor soul! striving to learn love through duty, instead of knowing duty through love! Life's alphabet may not, I think, be learned backward in that fashion. At least Lily could not so learn it, and she had no theories to stand in her way; she tried simply and sincerely.

In Lily Winters, though she had not recognized this formerly, the spring of inner delight had never quite dried up; through the dreariest and saddest years of her life, "time to remember" had been the luxury and poetry of dull days. This "remembering" meant for her no vague and pale representation, but a vivid re-forming and living again of some scenes of her early and brief happiness. For Lily Elphinstone such "remembering" was agony, because she believed it to be sin.

Ah! Lily was far more miserable than formerly. All she suffered she suffered doubly now; for herself and for her husband. The misery of her misery, without which she thought all would be as nothing, was the consciousness of how she was a daily torture, than which nothing could be more exquisite to him. Whether or no there was morbid exaggeration of the truth in his consciousness, there it was; and over the dreary life she had lived in poverty and desolation there seemed to her, when she now looked back upon it, to hover an atmosphere of peace and holiness.

Are there any to whom the daily companionship, the forced nearness of an inharmonious nature, an unloved being, will at length induce harmony—create love? If so, let them tell how Lily might have learned to love her husband. And what was the truth regarding him? Was it only in the mirror of Lily's mind that his misery was to be read? Was he learning to be content with the lot he had chosen, with a wife who did not love him?

As yet it seemed as if the knowledge that the reality of the thing he craved was not his made him the more greedy of the semblance. He had become morose, jealous, exacting—hardly suffering her out of his sight. He was doubly thwarted. Not only his heart was wounded but his will was resisted; and to have his will resisted by a creature so frail-seeming that sometimes he felt as if a breath of his might blow out its life—by a creature so near that in no way could he disentangle it from his heart-strings—to be mocked, as he called it, by the shadow of what he asked for—to have duty, submission, obedience freely given, and only love denied—to ask for bread and be given a stone—from all this, which he felt to be intolerable, he yet found no escape.

Lily's eyes—the eyes he watched so ceaselessly—were learning to have but two expressions for him. The one defied him, saying no more "I do not," but "I will not love you." The other was such a look as you may see in the eyes of a gentle, intelligent, and high-bred dog, suddenly subjected to a course of unwonted and unmerited harsh usage—an exquisitely painful look to see even in the eyes of a dog.

Not that Lily's husband ever lifted his hand against her. Good Heavens, no! But had not his eyes and his tongue scourged her, lacerated her, cowed her?

After the great trial of the birth and loss of her baby, Lily never got up her strength. After that she never had the slightest look of even physical well-being. The mind told upon the body, the body upon the mind—a constant and fatal reaction.

All the summer she was ailing: when the autumn came the doctor advised that she should winter in the South. Then Lily showed an obstinacy of self-will that perplexed her husband. She would not go. It was the first dereliction from outward wifely duty and submission, and it amazed him. He had to yield. He brooded over this till the real reason suggested itself to him. Lily clung to the neighborhood of her buried darling. He watched her, and found there was no evening, rain, or snow, or hail, dusk or dark, on which she did not go to bid her baby good-night. Generally she sat a while, quiet and tearless, by the little mound, her mind evidently not resting in or on that grave, but following her "little one" to the place her religion and her imagination combined gave it, among God's "little ones." Now and then, however, she would be mastered by a heart-bursting passion of anguish, and would throw herself upon the mound, her breast pressed against the turf, her arms beating the ground on either side, crying, with half-stifled cries, "Oh, baby, make room for me; make room for me. Let me get through to you—let me get through!" Having once stood by, unseen and unsuspected, when it was thus with her, her husband had felt that to do so again, to live through such another half hour, was as much as his reason was worth.

And Lily thought he did not suffer with her! that he had not rejoiced with her or grieved with her; and when forced to name the child at all she would jealously call it not "ours," but "mine!"

Poor Lily! this present misery of hers, which she felt to be self-incurred—for had she not done evil that good might come?—was teaching her to be ungentle and unjust.

CHAPTER VI.

ONE night—it was early spring again, but the weather was bleak and bitter, a black March—Lily came back from the church-yard whiter than ever, and quivering in every nerve; while in her eyes was a wild, visionary look. She did every thing in the usual order, however, stealing up stairs with her usual quietness to put her hood and cloak away. Then going into the drawing-room she rang for the urn, made the tea, and sat waiting for her husband, whom when she went out she had left in the dining-room, sitting over his wine—sitting with the wine before him, rather; it was little he ever drank.

Lily was one of those women who can pay a sort of mechanical attention to the smallest things when the greatest ones occupy them. Sometimes her husband taunted her with the care she took of his physical comforts, while she starved and tormented his soul. Finding that Mr. Elphinstone did not join her, and fearing the tea would be cold, she went to look for him.

She found him in her own morning-room, seated at her writing-table, a manuscript book open before him. There was nothing strange in his being there; he often chose to write his letters at her desk.

"Nothing in that is new," she said, hurriedly, going up to him, when she saw what it was that occupied him. "I found it accidentally to-day. Indeed, I did not know that I had kept it. There is nothing written there that is so much of the truth as you know. Why should you pain yourself needlessly?" She put her hand on the book to take it from him, but he pushed her hand away.

"When you found it why did you not directly burn it?" he asked, sternly. "Let me remind you of its contents; then you shall judge if it should be in Mrs. Elphinstone's possession."

"Spare me," Lily said, putting her hands to her head. "To-night, of all nights, spare me! To-night, of all nights, I can not bear to be reminded of what those poor lines stood for!"

He thrust the book into his breast-pocket, but without having looked at his wife, or he must have been struck by the expression of her face. Putting his hand upon her shoulder, he said, affecting to yawn as he spoke: "Come and give me my tea. I am tired, and you are shaking—with cold, is it? Come!"

She took his arm as she was expected to do. He felt her feebleness in the way she clung to him. Suddenly he stopped and turned her to the light. There was a strange concentration of intense and conflicting feeling in his face and tone as he said:

"Poor bird! There are no prison-bars will hold you in and back much longer, I fancy."

All that evening Lily continued to shiver and tremble perceptibly; often she furtively glanced round the room; once, at some slight, unexpected noise, she started up and screamed.

She answered to her husband's questions: "I have no control at all over myself to-night; I feel as if I had escaped from my own hold. Perhaps I shall be better in the morning, if I can sleep. But there is something I must tell you now, to-night." She paused, and gasped.

"I am listening to you, Lily," he said, in such a tone of tender pity as she had not heard from him for very long.

"Do not speak like that—speak harshly, as you have often done of late." She used a sharp intonation of entreaty. "No wonder—the wonder is how you have been so good to me. Oh, Ralph, if I could spare you this! If I had been a stronger woman I might have spared you so much. But I can not keep this in; if I try, my heart or my brain will burst to let it through."

"Do not try—speak, poor child; tell me this new trouble; then go to rest." He could now have found it in his heart to pray that her rest might not again, in this world, be broken.

"After all," Lily resumed, "I do not see that it makes any difference. It is better you should know, and better you should know from me; but I do not see that it makes any difference. 'He is not dead.' She sunk her voice to a whisper. "I have seen him to-night. Do not look like that! Why should you mind? It makes no difference—not even to him. If he had been dead he would have known all the same. To you it can make no difference; all you ever had of me you will have still while I am alive. You knew quite well that I did not love you, and that I went on loving him; so you see it makes no difference; but it was my duty to tell you—was it not? I try to do my duty, Ralph; indeed I do; I often fail miserably, especially since—since my baby died; but I have tried, and I will try. Of course I was shocked and startled, and could not, at first, so plainly see that it made no difference—but I shall be better in the morning."

Was it truth, or the fancy of a sick brain? What could it matter to the miserable man? But he tried to discover; it seemed to him that it mattered much.

"You have seen him to-night, you say, Lily; is that all? Did he speak? Did you speak?"

"No. I was in the church-yard, sitting by baby's grave. I always go to bid her good-night. You did not know it, but I always do. I tried for you not to know it—for fear—"

"For fear of what?"

"That you should forbid me, and I should be driven to the wickedness of disobeying you."

"You were sitting by our baby's grave—go on."

"I was sitting by my baby's grave when he passed outside in the lane. I felt him before I saw him. As he passed he looked over the wall, and I saw his face through the branches of the yew-tree. The wall is low, and he is tall, you remember. His face looked white through the dark branches; but it was his face—no mere spirit. But do not mind, Ralph; you see it makes no difference—at least—she paused, and put her hand upon her heart, then added, speaking with difficulty—"at least, I think it does not; but to-morrow, when I have had some rest, I shall know better. I think I shall know a great deal more to-morrow. Good-night, Ralph."

It was strange. Mr. Elphinstone had not believed this could be possible; yet now, with no proof, he believed it true. It was not till later, when he had reflected, that doubt arose. A groan from her husband—a sound of unutterable anguish—brought Lily back to him as she was leaving the room—not to touch him, or with any caressing words try to comfort him, as a wife who had learned to love him might have done, but just to stand before him, leaning heavily for support on the thing nearest her, and wait.

"What is it, Ralph?" she asked, after a time. "To you, at least, it makes no difference, and I—I can not suffer more."

"To me it makes the difference between heaven and hell," he groaned. "I did not think my lot too blessed before; but now—Oh, woman, whom I dare not call wife, forgive me! You have felt little of my love but its cruelty; have known nothing of my suffering but its savageness. I took your life into my keeping, and I have bruised it and maimed it. You said—I don't know when; the time seems long since—that I did not know of your nightly visit to the child's grave; I have followed you and watched over you till I felt my heart being torn fibre from fibre, and my reason plucked up by the roots through witnessing your anguish—your irreparable anguish."

"Oh, Ralph!"

She knelt before him now, clinging to his knees.

"Suffered! what have I not suffered? I have suffered, as I have sinned, for us both. I was passive, for I saw no help. No help?—I see help now—I will seize it for you—you shall be free."

"Yes, Ralph," she said, faintly; "very soon. I feel that I shall soon be free." She was too weak and faint, too wearily senseless to grasp the meaning of his words.

"Go and rest now till the morning," he said, lifting her up. "Rest till the morning—see what that brings you."

She kissed his hand with a cold and timid kiss, and murmured—

"May God have pity upon us! I think He will, for we have pity upon one another."

Then she left him. Sunk in thought, he did not see with what weak and wavering steps she crossed the room.

He remained just in the attitude in which she left him for perhaps an hour, then suddenly he sprang up.

"I must know first," he said; "not leave her doubly desolate with a legacy of horror."

He ordered his horse, inventing, for the benefit of his servants, some specious pretext for riding at once, late as it was, to the town. At midnight he returned; the house was then closed, and the servants went to bed. He shut himself into his study; there he remained some hours, writing and looking over papers. When he had finished, he inclosed his private keys in a sealed packet, which he addressed to his wife. This packet, with some letters, one of which was also to her, he placed conspicuously on the centre-table. All this done, he fumbled for something in a drawer, found it, and hid it in his breast. Doing that, he felt the little book still hidden there. He drew it forth, and looked toward the fire, but that had been out for hours. He thought a moment.

"It is his," he said. "It should go with her." Of this, too, he then made a sealed packet, which he addressed as one of the letters was addressed.

Afterward he looked round the room with a long, comprehending look. Then he bared and bent his head. "God have mercy upon my soul, and make her happy!" is what he would have said. Perhaps he did say it, but he could not pray it. What did he care for his miserable self, soul or body? He went to the window and opened it, letting in the chill and ghastly dawn. He had one foot on the terrace outside, one still within the room: one hand clasped that thing hidden in his breast, while the other held back the shuttered window, when he felt something pass before his face. It was with him as with one of old—fear and trembling came upon him, the hair on his head lifted itself up, and the blood about his heart stood still. He saw nothing, heard nothing with his outward ears—he only felt. Was it a chill breath blown from the dawn? Nothing near him had been stirred. Great awe was upon him. He stepped back into the room; he was now impelled to see her once again before—Afterward? He did not know—the resolute will had suddenly melted within him; he felt weak and feeble as a child.

"Once again—yes; I will see her once again."

He stole up the stairs and along the gallery to the door of his wife's room. As he opened it an icy cold wind blew on his face; the lattices of one window were pushed open wide. The gust blew out the flaring candles, which till then had been burning on the table.

The gray light of dawn fell full on Lily's face. She lay on the bed, dressed as when she left him, her attitude that in which one flings one's self down in intense weariness; she had not moved since she threw herself down there, the bed showed no signs of any tossing or struggling. He bent over her, lower, lower; presently his cheek touched hers; his hand left its hiding-place—something clashed down upon the ground; he heeded that no more than she did—no more than the dead did. He raised himself to look at her again. After a long gaze he said, aloud, "Free—at rest—thank God!" The sound of his own voice stirred him; he knelt beside her, and wept like a child or a woman: yet no, no whit like either, but like a strong man, whose will is broken; and his heart melted within him.

There are lives that wear out the hearts that live them with their weariness, till, for very tiredness, the sufferer goes to the grave as happier human creatures to their night's rest. Lily had been subject to long and deadly swoonings; this was the longest and deadliest, and the last.

When he had laid his wife to her rest Mr. Elphinstone recognized that he had parted with her eternally. What, in any other state of being, had he to do with a woman whose eyes, lips, and life had voluntarily, and involuntarily, said, "I do not love you?"

PARIS GOSSIP.

LADIES who wish to wear ear-rings, and do not wish to submit to the operation of having their ears pierced, can have the ornaments hung upon a little wire which clasps the back of the ear, and will generally escape detection if carefully put on. These devices are worn by well-dressed ladies in London and Paris.

The other day, in Paris, a gentleman descended from his cab to make a call, and placed a fine London cigar which he had been smoking behind the coach-box. The lady of the house being absent he immediately returned to the cab, and found that the coachman who had already dismounted was smoking his cigar. Perceiving his approach, however, the coachman quietly put it back in the place where his employer had left it.

"Oh, go on, my brave fellow!" said the gentleman.

"Ah, citizen," responded the driver, not in the least disconcerted, "I was only afraid it would go out."

A pretty style of hat for evening wear is now made of feathers. One of the fashionable windows in Rue de la Paix, Paris, has several of these tastefully displayed. One is made of small white feathers lapped one over the other, each dotted with a small black bead; another of violet feathers and another of the dark spotted feathers of the pheasant. Several also are made entirely of flowers. Thus there is one of violets, with lace of the same shade of color to fall over the waterfall, and also to form the strings, which are fastened together by a few violets; another of tiny white flowers, with white lace for strings. These are all of the form which has been so long worn, that is, without a crown, and convenient to the present style of dressing the hair.

To the list of "grotesque jewelry" published in the Bazar of February 1 might be added the following devices for ear-rings, which appear in the fashionable windows of the Rue de la Paix.

A horse's bit made of steel, with reins of gold buckled into each end and coiled in a knot.

A pair of water-buckets of gold, hooped with silver, hung by a gold chain which runs over a pulley.

A fly of steel, or coral, climbing a ladder.

A big spider, ugly as life, hanging on a fly.

A mouse-trap, with mouse caught and looking out through the golden wires.

A bird-cage, with bird seated upon a perch.

A mouse hung by its tail.

Venetian blinds.

A butterfly, with wings of gold lattice set with brilliants.

A dog's head, with heavy ring hanging in its mouth.

A wasp, colored to the life, with a gold pin thrust through his body, which he is grasping with his six legs as if endeavoring to extricate himself; the pin is hung by its head to the ear.

A grasshopper of gold, life size, hung by his nose.

An altar-lamp in the form used to hang before the shrine of the Virgin.

A naked doll an inch and a half long, wrought in metal, in ludicrously exact imitation of the cheap wooden-jointed dolls sold in the toy shops. Attitudes sometimes very ridiculous.

A massive gilded sleigh-bell, full size, or a gold strap with a score of little bells on it, in the form of the string of bells worn by horses.

Among those which certainly are more pleasing to the eye, as well as more ornamental for the fair sex, are—

A golden basket containing eggs of pearl, hung by a golden ribbon.

A pink enameled rose-leaf, with a drop of water upon it.

A shell with one pearl in its centre, and a variety of flowers in colored enamel.

The street dresses of young ladies are universally made short, reaching the ankle. Ladies of middle age mostly wear long dresses looped up; and a long sweeping skirt is rarely seen in the street.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

AT this writing the streets of New York are in a fearful condition. True there has been a heavy rain, but that seems to have made the mud only more capable of bespattering one's clothes. It is quite impossible for a lady to walk through Broadway, or any one of our thoroughfares, without ruining a nice dress, or making a common one look as if it never could be put on again. True, the matter of cleaning the streets is being investigated! And it is delightful to know that some people think that the streets have been well taken care of, and the crossings made comfortably passable during the past season! We only wonder where those persons live, and should be glad to purchase a "first-class brown stone house" in their immediate vicinity. Meanwhile, since nobody else takes the matter in hand, it will afford some satisfaction to those who object to wading in the mud, if the little crossing-sweepers will ply their brooms. To be sure they sometimes make the mud fly in the wrong direction; but after ruining a few suits of clothes one does like to see somebody doing something. Fretting and scolding about the matter is common enough; but what is really done by those in authority?

It is announced that a project is entertained by some of the wealthy ladies of Boston to build a club-house for their own convenience, and that of ladies in their social circle, in a central part of the city. By this means a pleasant place will be secured where a meal or rest can be obtained without the protection of gentlemen. Indeed, gentlemen are to be rigidly excluded—that is, unless all the members of the club consent to have them admitted.

"The times are changed, and we are changed with them," as a few reminiscences of "good old times" prove. These reminiscences come from Illinois, and date back to 1838. In that year, one man, when he was married, bought chairs at fifty cents apiece, and paid for them in No. 1 fall wheat, at 25 cents per bushel. Corn was then from 6 to 10 cents per bushel, and no market for potatoes at all. Another early settler says his father sold 2000 bushels of corn, and hauled it two miles, for 5 cents a bushel, and took one-half in whisky! Another took a two-horse wagon-load of pork twenty miles, and sold it for $1.25 in cash, five pounds of coffee, and calico enough to make a dress for his wife.

In this age of inventions any thing that lightens the burdens of housekeepers claims the attention of all. A new apparatus, called the "Fulton Steamer," has been introduced to public notice, by which every kind of food is cooked at one time, with a moderate fire, and in one vessel. Moreover, all the volatile nutritious properties, ordinarily escaping, are precipitated into a lower vessel, making a rich soup. Notwithstanding an endless variety of dishes can be cooked together, there is no interchanging of flavors, nor do any odors escape. That all kinds of meats, with cabbage, turnips, and onions, can be cooked with custard, tapioca, farina, or Indian puddings, without the flavor of those vegetables intruding where not desired, is a surprising fact, which is due to the peculiar properties of steam at a high temperature.

"Mother," said a little girl, who with great perplexity had occasionally noticed her parent's equanimity to give way in trying circumstances, "mother, does God ever fret and scold?"

The query was so abrupt and startling that it arrested the mother's attention almost with a shock.

"Why, Lizzie, what makes you ask that question?"

"Why, God is good; you know you used to call him the 'Good Man' when I was little, and I should like to know if he ever scolds."

"No, child, no."

"Well, I'm glad he don't; for scolding always makes me feel so bad, even if it is not I in fault. I don't think I could love God much if he scolded."

Rich and finely-wrought laces are always a tasteful and attractive addition to a lady's toilette. These delicate fabrics are so much admired—both by those who can afford to purchase them and by those who can not—that they are always in great demand. This probably accounts for the strange fact that, although many other branches of industry have languished in the great commercial towns of Flanders, lace-making is now carried on with as much vigor as ever. It is pursued exclusively by females, and in some instances a woman works in the same house and street where her great-grandmother patiently wrought at the same vocation. The word "point" signifies stitch, and sometimes also designates the pattern, or the ground of the lace; but the term "point lace," both in England and America, is applied in a general way to rich and costly-wrought laces. All these laces are made of the finest thread, woven by hand. Every thread is carefully examined, and placed upon a piece of dark-blue paper to test its quality. If there be the slightest unevenness the wheel is stopped and the thread removed. This is carefully laid aside and used again. No machines can ever supersede the work of these fine spinners. The bobbins, wheels, and pillows used in the fabrication of this article are carried from place to place; and frequently a work-woman may be seen at her labors in the public squares, or at her own door. There are also different classes of these work-women, each having a distinct branch of the trade; some make the ground, others the pattern. At Brussels the ornaments and flowers are made separately, and afterward worked into the lace ground. Elsewhere the ground and patterns are always worked conjointly. All these patterns are ancient—at least three centuries old. Frequent attempts have been made to alter the design, but to no purpose. As real connoisseurs prefer the misshapen Chinese figures and monstrous trees of antique porcelain, so lovers of old lace select the curious arabesque patterns which have been in vogue for so many hundred years.

The plantation which Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe has recently purchased in Mandarin, Florida, is said to have no great intrinsic value, except for its orange groves. The buildings are not what would be called "first-class" at the North. But of what special use are well-built houses in a country where one can sit in mid-winter under the shade of an orange-tree, enjoying its fruit? Mrs. Stowe bought the place for a winter home, and will doubtless find it pleasant to pick fruit from her own trees and saunter in the fragrant groves, when Northern people are wrapped in furs, and wading through snow-drifts.

A masked lady at the recent Bal de l'Opera in Paris proved so attractive to a gentleman present that he was induced to accompany her home in her carriage, she making the condition that he should allow her to blindfold him. After a long ride they entered a house, and when the bandage was removed the foolish dupe found himself in the presence of three armed men, who demanded his money or his life. Of course there was no alternative; he yielded his purse, but was safely released next morning. The police vainly attempted to trace the affair. But soon afterward a little light was thrown upon the matter in this wise: A young woman suddenly sprained her ankle—apparently—in the streets of Paris, under such circumstances that humanity impelled a gentleman to assist her home. Her sufferings were so great that she could not ascend the stairs without his aid; but the instant her door was opened the gentleman was seized by three men, who enacted precisely the scene of the Bal de l'Opera robbery, with the slight difference that they obligingly informed their victim that they belonged to a society scattered over Paris, therefore, if he betrayed them to the police, his life would not be safe in any quarter. The police already have twelve of the gang in safe-keeping.

A young man writing home to his mother, from Sitka, says: "The wife of the Russian Governor here is a princess, and is a very nice, pleasant, lively, little lady. She gave us a party and then joined with the officers' wives in getting up little hops, surprise parties, etc. Four of our officers have their wives here; and there are some very nice Russian people, and two or three pretty young ladies who speak a little English. So you see we have considerable society. We are to have a grand masked-ball at the General's to-morrow night. The Surgeon and all the company officers are quartered in one large building that used to be a club-house. We have a large ball-room, and last week we decorated it beautifully with flags, bayonets, etc., and gave a grand military ball. It was the finest thing of the kind that ever took place here, and the princess and all the Russians were delighted. I wish you had some of the venison that we are living on here—I am getting tired of it. A good-sized deer can be bought for four dollars. For fear you may think we are freezing to death, I will inform you that the thermometer has averaged 30° throughout December, and the coldest day we have had it was only down to 11°." To-day it is raining hard and not cold at all."

Professor Blot says: "There is no more gratifying sight to a cultivated eye than a beautifully-arranged and well-ordered dinner-table. Nothing can reflect more credit on the taste of mistress of a house." Very true indeed. And there are other sights quite as gratifying, though they are usually seen only by the husband's eyes, or by some chance visitor—and that before dinner. There are thousands of women in our land—those, too, we are glad to say, who are worth their thousands—who carefully look after the internal arrangements of their households, who perform with their own hands various delicate and difficult details of domestic economy, and think it honorable so to do. They are not ashamed to be found in the kitchen. But one thing is worth remembering—no woman, even in her busiest hours, should be without a neat and suitable dress, with a plain white collar at the throat, and her hair tidily arranged. A tumbled handkerchief tied about the neck—as we have sometimes chanced to see—and a torn, soiled dress, are not to be tolerated by a well-bred woman.

What good ever results from contradiction about trivial matters? And yet the harmony of many a family is broken by a spirit of opposition which leads one to contradict the statement of another, when it is not of the slightest moment. Suppose Mrs. Brown remarks at the dinner-table, that it was raining yesterday at five o'clock, and Mr. B. says, "No, my dear, you are mistaken, for the clock struck just as I got inside the door, and that was at least five minutes before the drops began to fall," what is the use of Mrs. B.'s contesting the matter? And yet, by just such trivial disagreements, thousands of domestic quarrels have commenced, ending in unhappiness and perhaps estrangement.

HOME TOILETTES.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

Two Cylindrical Dusters.

BOTH patterns of these dusters are easily made; the handles of worn-out dusters can be used for the purpose. For the leather duster, Fig. 1, cover one end of a round wooden rod with a roll of wadding six inches long, and this again with a piece of sheepskin of the requisite size, laying it in close pleats at the end of the rod, and also on the other side, which is fastened around the rod by repeatedly drawing the thread through a hole which is bored in at that point. On this side of the roll sew on a thick fringe of red wool, which is knotted over the rod, and head the point in the same manner.

The worsted duster, Fig. 2, is made of gray and red worsted in the following manner: Cut twelve pasteboard circles, each about five inches in circumference, and cut out in the centre of each circle about a quarter of an inch more or less, according to the size of the rod, so as to obtain a pasteboard ring. Lay together two such rings, and wind them from six to eight times with worsted, as shown in the accompanying illustration. Cover four of these double rings with gray and two with red worsted. In order to fasten these rings on the rod cut out on one end six grooves, each one inch apart; put one of the wound double circles on the rod so that the pasteboard shall be exactly the beginning and end of the threads, and cut them off. Join these figures in a row by joining the two middle picots of a leaf of the former figure instead of working the two middle picots of the last leaf. Every two rows of these four-leaved figures are joined by means of the tatted rings already spoken of, and which are composed each of 32 ds., which are joined between the four-leaved figures, as shown in the pattern. Begin each ring with 2 ds., take up the picot of the four-leaved figure, work again 2 ds., take up the next picot, and continue in this manner, paying attention to the pattern, until the ring has reached the required size. Each ring is worked in the centre in lace stitch, as shown in the illustration. Work the collar round the neck in close button-hole stitch.

Crochet Collar.

THIS collar is worked with fine crochet cotton. It is composed of single crochet rosettes and flower-like figures, which are joined by means of sewed bars. Work, first, the rosettes, which are always begun in the middle. Make a foundation of 9 chain, join in a ring by means of a slip stitch, then crochet the 1st round. First 5 chain, of which the first four serve as one treble; after which alternate in the ring 17 times 1 treble and 1 chain. 2d round.—1 single crochet in each chain of the last round, between over one of the grooves; cut the wool on the outer edge of the ring, as partly shown in Fig. 3, then shove the rings a little apart, and bind the wool fast in the groove by tying as shown in Fig. 4. This done, cut the pasteboard through, and slide the rings off the rod. The other rings are put on in the same manner, and in the alternation of color shown in the pattern. The ends of the worsted, which must stand out compactly, are cut around so that they shall be perfectly regular. On the other end of the rod tie round the handle a crochet cord with which to hang up the duster.

Tatted Collar.

THIS collar, part of which is shown of the full size in the illustration, is worked with very fine twisted thread. It is composed of four-leaved tatted figures and single tatted rings, which are joined as shown in the figure. The four-leaved figures are worked as follows: Work 3 ds. (double stitches), 1 p. (picot); alternate seven times 2 ds., 1 p., then 3 ds., and join the row. Close on this leaf of the figure work three other similar leaflets; but in working these, join the last picot of the last leaf instead of forming the 1st picot of the new leaf; and in working the last of the four leaves, join to the 1st p. of the 1st leaf instead of forming the last picot. Having finished the figure tie together which always 4 chain. After this fasten the thread. Every following rosette is to be fastened to the preceding, as shown in the pattern. The flower-like figures are also begun in the centre. Make a foundation of 12 chain, join in a ring by means of a slip stitch and crochet. 1st round—2 chain, which serve as a short double stitch; * 3 chain, passing over 1 stitch; 1 short double in the following stitch. From * repeat 4 times. Then follow 3 chain. 2d round—In every 3 chain between 2 short double of the last round always 1 single crochet; 1 short double; 3 double; 1 short double; 1 single crochet. Having prepared the requisite number of rosettes and figures, make the border round the neck as follows: On a foundation chain of suitable length crochet 1 round alternating 1 double; 1 chain passing over 1 stitch. Then on this round, as also on the other edge of the foundation row, each 1 round composed of 2 single crochet in every chain, followed by 3 chain. Now arrange the finished figures on a foundation of paste-board or oil-cloth, which is cut the desired shape of the collar, and fasten them together by means of sewed bars of fine crochet cotton.

Sofa Pillow in Guipure Net and Tatting.

See illustration on page 361.

MATERIALS: Spool thread Nos. 60 and 50; twisted crochet cotton; blue satin; satin ribbon of the same shade, one inch wide; horse-hair or feathers.

This tasteful sofa pillow is made of blue satin, covered on the upper side with guipure net and tatting, bordered with a quilting, and finished on the corners with bows of blue satin ribbon an inch wide. Work the foundation of the cover with spool cotton No. 60, and over a mesh two-thirds of an inch round. This foundation has 63 holes (64 stitches) in length and breadth. Begin on a corner with 2 foundation stitches, and net backward and forward in rounds, adding one stitch at the end of each round, till the number of stitches counts 64; on this work one round without widening or narrowing; then take off one stitch at the end of every following round (that is, net as one stitch the last 2 loops of each round) until the stitches are reduced to two. Tie these two stitches together without forming a new stitch.

The finished foundation must be stretched on a frame and worked in the design shown by the last illustration (which consists of one large square, surrounded by twelve smaller ones) with spool cotton No. 50, in point de toile, point de reprise, and point de feston. The small squares are separated by a row of holes worked in point d'esprit. The illustration shows such a square of the full size. The central square, which is 31 holes in length and breadth, is bordered by two rows of holes, which are not worked, but are ornamented by sewing on two rows of tatted lace with the ring set opposite.

For each row work at a quarter of an inch distant from the threads a ring of 7 ds. (double stitches), 7 p. (picots), separated each by 1 ds., 7 ds., and sew them on the foundation as shown in the figure. Besides this, work on the foundation raised rosettes, the position of which is shown in the figure. Each rosette except the central one is composed of 4 rows of rings. Begin with the outer row, and work a hair's-breadth apart 12 rings, each composed of 7 ds., 9 p., each separated by 1 ds., 7 ds.; then tie the beginning and end of the thread together. Each of the 12 rings of the second circle numbers 5 ds., 5 p., each separated by 1 ds., 5 ds. In the 3d circle work for each ring 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds. Finally for each ring of the last circle, 3 ds., 1 p., 3 ds.

The circles of the rosette in the centre of the large square are larger; they number 16 rings each.

FLOWERS.

Under the brown of the old year's leaves,
Under the shadow of budding trees,
The spring-flowers grow.
Along the hedge, by the running brook,
We found them in many a walk we took,
We children, long ago.

They have passed away, those first fair years,
And with them our childish joys and fears;
But the scent of the flowers
That we loved is the same, and as sweet
As when we gathered them under our feet
In that spring-time of ours.

FALLING BETWEEN TWO.

LUCY BARNARD opened the door and looked out into the darkness of the dreary November night.

"You do not suppose he is there yet, Margaret?" asked she, anxiously.

Margaret was paring apples for the next day's baking at the great cherry table over by the window, and, looking up at the clock, she answered cheerfully as Thanksgiving dinner and every body alive to eat it, "I think he must be nearly in sight of the 'light in the window.'"

"I wish you wouldn't always be quoting poetry," returned Lucy, impatiently, displeased at the implied suggestion of any body but herself having an interest or a right to light her lover home. Then, with a sudden contradiction of feeling, she continued: "None of those Blane-fields will take care of him whatever happens. Oh, why didn't I make Walter promise to go around by the road? or why did I let him go at all this horrible night? It is darker and foggier than ever, and he will certainly lose his way going over the hill. Besides he will take cold; don't you know he will take cold, Margaret? His throat was a little sore already, and he will get a lung-fever, with nobody to nurse him, and there you sit and look as though you didn't care a bit!"

At that instant an inner door opened and Lucy's brother Ferdinand came in with a flaring oil-lamp and some books in his hands, repeating Latin poetry as he came. Upon the first sound of his voice and step Lucy took her knitting-work from the little square stand in one corner of the room, which was covered with papers, books, work, and a great brown earthen pitcher of white chrysanthemums in full flower, and seated herself in a low wooden rocking-chair, with her feet on the broad hearth of the huge "rotary" stove.

"So 'Blackdrop' has gone, has he?" said Ferdinand, pulling Lucy's endeavor-at-curly as he went by. "Well, which of the Blane-field girls does he admire most? Did he tell you?"

Sara has the reddest cheeks, and Alice's eyes are rather the bluest, but then Flora is decidedly the best company of the three. If I were a young lady I should hate desperately to have a lover of mine board in such a fascinating family."

Lucy did not reply, only looked dignified and rocked and knit the faster. But by-and-by, when Ferdinand was apparently absorbed in his books, she went to the door and looked out once more. The fog had thickened, and the air rushed in harsh and chill.

"Why the cat isn't here!" she said, in pretended surprise. Then she shut the door and went back to her seat.

As she passed Ferdinand, who seemed always to have an instinctive knowledge of every thing, he said, without looking up, "Have you thought of wolves, Lucy? or wild dogs? I heard a terrible barking in the direction of the west woods, just the way 'Blackdrop' would take in going across over the hill. It is quite a long walk to Blane-field's even if one doesn't get bewildered, and wander out of the way. I don't know what would induce me to go such a night as this, fog and dogs and all. Nothing short of seeing those pretty Blane-field girls at the end, I reckon."

"What you say falls on the outside of my cape, and perhaps you had better not take your time from your studies," retorted Lucy, putting by her work and lighting a candle.

"Before you go to sleep," called Ferdinand, as she disappeared through the doorway on her way to her room, "I advise you to read Emerson on 'Friendship' three times, with care. It will do you good."

Lucy slammed together the door in reply, and began to cry as soon as she was fairly in her own chamber. It was a cheerful room even in November, with buff and white paper on the walls, white cotton curtains bordered with a strip of brown calico at the small-paned windows, a little brick fire-place, a few books on a hanging shelf, several pretty engravings in rustic home-made frames, and one or two wreaths of dried flowers, still fresh in her eyes with sweet memories. But Lucy looked at none of her little household treasures. She threw up the window opening toward the west, and leaned into the dreariness until she had caught a sore throat; then she went to bed and cried herself into a headache, as she lay listening to the sound of the water falling with a perpetual splash into the deep barrel by the door under her window; and to the wind which came up at moonrise, fretting to itself and sighing around the corner of the house.

In the morning, however, the world brightened again; although the sun had no more lustre than a boiled turnip, the sky was dull, and the air was dank. But it was daylight, and,

"Colors seen by candle-light
Will not look the same by day."

"You suppose Walter got there safely last night? Say, Margaret!" asked Lucy for the fiftieth time the next day.

"I haven't a doubt of it," answered the patient Margaret fifty times over.

"What a little goose I was!" said Lucy, on the very next Sabbath evening, as she sat upon the red chintz-covered sofa in the little parlor beside a youth, dark-eyed and dark-skinned enough to justify Ferdinand's nickname for him.

"You never need worry about me, for I shall come out all right," said he, answering her look of loving confidence with a tender smile that glorified his thin, indecisive lips.

Lucy lingered over the memory of this smile longer than she did over her wreaths of faded flowers, for it was the last she saw for many a day.

The previous winter Walter Elmoak taught the village school and fell in love with Lucy Barnard at the neighborhood tea-parties, the singing-schools, and the evening meetings. Since then he had been employed surveying land in an adjoining town, and now he was ready to go back to finish his course at college.

So he went away, leaving Lucy with a kiss on her lips and a tear in her eye. Settled at his studies again Walter found life in an old university town quite another thing from life in a little rural village; and his letters to Lucy were filled with debating clubs, prize exercises, rowing matches, and skating exploits; but evidently none of these things interfered with her reign in his heart.

There came, however, a time, on the evening of the President's yearly levee, that she faded out of his thoughts like a star at dawn.

He had come in late, and was just paying his respects to the President and the President's wife, when in a mirror opposite he saw the reflection of some brown curls (real curls, and no make-up), a moist white dress, clusters and wreaths of moss-rose-buds, with an instant glimpse of a face purer than the dress, fairer than the roses, and sweeter than any flower of the field.

"Who is that young lady, the one eating an ice by the window?" he asked somebody.

As it happened the somebody knew her.

"That is Miss Rose Ashmead. Haven't you seen her before, I want to know? Well, no! I guess you haven't. She has not been at home this year. But you ought to know her. Shall I present you?"

Walter made no objection, and Miss Ashmead being as charming as she was lovely he did not think of Lucy Barnard—who was up in her chamber reading over all his letters from the beginning—again that evening.

After this came the long summer vacation; and one day as Lucy Barnard sat sewing by the window she saw a white horse flash by, with a dark, graceful figure in the open carriage behind. Lucy dropped her work.

"Margaret, do put away that old coat!" said she, in an imperative tone. "I don't see why you will bring such shabby work into the sitting-room, afterwards. You seem to be bright enough about some things."

"Oh! has Walter come?" asked Margaret, at once "bright enough" to discern the signs of the times.

"He has. And I do hope, Margaret, you won't put any dough-nuts on the supper-table. Father will soak them in his tea if you do," returned Lucy, as Margaret vanished with her offending work through an inner door just before Walter Elmoak came springing up the front steps, with the old smile and the same tender eyes. The same, and yet with a shade of difference, which Lucy detected without defining.

That evening, as they stood together on the broad granite door-step, with the tiger-lilies and the woodbine at the side, the mountain and the misty river before them in the distance, the maple-tree above their heads, and the moonlight over all, Walter happened to speak of Miss Rose Ashmead. It was not much he said, but at the first word Lucy flashed out, and then grew dignified; so Walter turned the conversation, and instinctively avoided any further mention of the lady's name in his talk or in his letters.

But he did not avoid her presence when he was back at the University. Not a bit. He saw her often without an especial effort; for the stately old town was brilliant that winter. A party epidemic broke out and raged violently. There was an unusual amount of snow for that locality, and sleighing became fashionable. Every thing and every body combined to throw the charming Rose in Walter's way, and unconsciously her winning grace was doing its work on his susceptible heart.

One evening he called at Dr. Ashmead's, and, finding Rose out, waited a while in the parlor, sitting back in a deep window and looking over a book of poems. Presently she came in, flushed and sparkling from a quick walk; and without seeing Walter she came to a pier-glass and, taking off her bonnet, stood smoothing her curls. Her shining eyes, glowing cheeks, and tumbled hair made such a sweet, fresh picture that, almost without knowing it, he crossed the room, and, coming behind her, kissed the bright face.

Rose gave a little start, went white in place of pink, and turning, walked soberly out of the room without speaking. She met her younger sister at the door, and did not come back.

Then in a flash young Elmoak knew that in all these past days his heart had been drifting away and away from Lucy Barnard, and turning with all the facile passion of youth to Rose Ashmead. He returned to his lodgings and went to bed, that he need see nobody, where he tumbled all night-long and wondered he did not die.

"Toothache, is it, Elmoak?" asked his disturbed chamber.

"A touch of it," groaned Elmoak.

"Is this I? Has such a thing happened to me?" I laughed at Lucy's girlish warnings, and thought I had more strength of character," said he the next morning, as he tied on his cravat in the closet, too mortified and miserable to look at himself in the glass.

Yes, it was certainly he; and all day long the knowledge pressed heavier and heavier upon him.

"I am sorry Lucy cares so much for me! She is a good girl, and I shall always be glad to be her friend; but I see now I never really loved her; and I must not perjure myself even to save her from sorrow. I must certainly break off from her," decided this conscientious soul.

But while he yet mused there came a letter from Lucy, tender and true, filled with common home pictures of a common home life.

"Father is topping turnips in the kitchen, of course. The man has no more sense of fitness than a cat; and he would as soon winnow wheat in the parlor as any where if the family were there and nobody protested. Aunt Patty sits by him saying, 'One hundred and ninety-six pounds is it, Jabez, in a barrel of flour?' Jabez answers 'Certain.' 'Well, I reckon just as likely as not Solomonson cheated me in that last bag. I don't hold him any too good for it. And I want you to weigh it over after him just so I can satisfy myself. An eighth bag it is—how many pounds ought that to be?' continues my careful aunt. You wonder I can tear myself from such absorbing conversation, I know; but to tell you the truth, I can not talk with my throat, and so I have come off up stairs to talk with my pen and forget the deprivation for a while. I don't know indeed whether I shall ever be able to speak aloud again. Even Doctor Rockafellow-thinks it doubtful. I took a severe cold at our Sabbath-school picnic and have never recovered my voice, though I feel pretty well otherwise. It may be only nervous weakness, from which I shall rally; but the doctor warns me I shall have to keep closely housed for some time, and give up all meetings, lectures, and parties for the present. So you see I shall depend more than ever on my correspondents. 'Remember, love, remember.'"

How could Walter have the hardness in replying to tell Lucy her place was filled? No! he must not be so heartless. It could not be right. It might be Lucy was following her mother in consumption. Probably she was; and such a step on his part would perhaps hasten the disease. Then he should always feel himself guilty of her death. So it was better to go on writing her as usual. She might waste away and die, and then he should be glad he had given her no unnecessary pain. Therefore, in any event, it was better to wait for the great arranger, Time.

"It is only with the present we have to do; and I will not make any body wretched about what may never happen," said he, shutting his eyes and stopping his ears.

Next time he met Rose Ashmead he said, softly, "Forgive me, I mistook you for a flower."

"I will, if you will never mistake again," replied Rose, gravely.

How sweet were her words of blame, and how beautiful her quiet dignity shone through them! Elmoak loved her better than ever, and showed it in every wrinkle of his coat. He tried, or fancied he tried, to hold himself somewhat aloof from the fascination of her influence; but what is a leaf to the current of a river? He reformed, indeed, for weeks and months from saying in words what every body with eyes had long seen; and Rose wondered, that while he came to her so constantly and showed in a thousand ways how dear she was, he really said so little about it.

And still he kept answering Lucy's loving letters in the same old loving way. Sometimes despising himself as a hypocrite, and sometimes pitying himself as an involuntary martyr.

One day a letter came from Margaret. Lucy had taken a fresh cold, or what seemed so, and was not able to write, but thinking Walter would miss his accustomed letter, she had begged Margaret to write for her.

"She is going to die! How thankful I am I have done nothing to give her pain!" said Walter, with tears in his eyes of mingled relief and tenderness. Then he wrote Lucy a letter of affectionate sympathy, and after mailing it went up to Doctor Ashmead's, and was fascinated into saying to Rose the things which had been in his heart and eyes so long.

But though he had Rose's ring on his finger and Rose's kisses on his lips, he was far enough from being happy; for Sin has a twin-sister whose name is sorrow, and who follows the one is followed by the other.

The days went on and on, until upon one day Ferdinand Barnard, who had a way of falling in with almost every body, fell in with a Miss Cornell, from the old university town where Walter Elmoak was going through his senior year, and picking May-flowers with Rose Ashmead at that particular hour. This Miss Cornell happened to be a young lady who had no Blue Chamber in her house. The doors were always wide open to every comer, and one could not know her long without knowing every thing she knew. So before their chance car-ride together was ended, Ferdinand, among other gossip, had heard about the intimacy of Elmoak with Miss Ashmead. "I won't positively say they are engaged, but it amounts to that, without question. You may believe me or not, but he spends five nights in every week at the Doctor's to my certain knowledge," said Miss Cornell, who exaggerated unmercifully in her narratives. Ferdinand detected this trait in her character, but still he deduced something very like the truth from her statements.

"You did not follow my advice and read Emerson on 'Friendship' three times with care, and now see what comes of your headstrong independence," said he to Lucy when he reached home, chafing and angry.

"I want to know if you are so silly? I have more confidence in my friends than to believe what every little fool says against them," whispered Lucy, in reply.

But that strong-mindedness was only for Ferdinand. For herself and for Margaret she dropped the veil of self-restraint, and went into paroxysms of agonized fear, writing, before she tried to sleep, a letter to Miss Ashmead, whose very existence she pretended to doubt. But in her heart she knew the shameful story was true; she recognized an old, unnamed pain that found voice now and explained itself, springing into place as though it had always been acknowledged and regnant. So when Rose's indignant reply of confirmation came she felt no more assured than before.

"I wonder if you think I shall break my heart about it, Margaret?" she asked, scornfully. "I have been afraid I could not succeed in living for Walter, and I promise you I won't die for him."

She kept her word royally, and from that time began to recover.

As for Rose, humiliated and mortified night unto death as she believed, she yet allowed herself to give no sign of pain to the gay world of which she formed a part; and not even Miss Cornell could positively assert there had ever been really an engagement. But as for her it was "when the half gods went that the gods arrived" in very truth. The last time Walter came to see her in the old way, as apology for the lateness of the hour he said he had been walking with one of the divinity students who had lately come, a young man named Herbert Halloween; and, behold! it came to pass afterward that this same Herbert Halloween came in and built up the broken-down altar in the heart of Rose; kindling on it a holier fire than the double-minded Elmoak had ever lighted. So she learned after much sorrow to bless God for her losses while she thanked Him for her gains.

And Elmoak, disappointed and self-degraded beyond expression, found after all it was his own heart which was ground between the upper and the nether millstone. Rose Ashmead would not see him; but Lucy Barnard would not even open his letters of self-reproach and penitence. Instead of a surfeit of love and ladies he found himself left with none; until at last his affections, being of wonderfully recuperative power, turned for solace to Miss Cornell, who was just about as fitting for him as a barberry-bush for a sycamore-tree.

They were married after he had finished his medical course, and they live to-day in the white brick cottage at the head of the main street in this very village.

Dr. Elmoak has become a man of note and position in his profession as well as in town, while the depth of Mrs. Elmoak's capacity is sounded by the number of the congregation on Sunday, the number of pieces in her neighbors' washings, the particulars of the last funeral, and the details of diphtheria and fever. Her bread is always heavy, her butter strong, her pickles soft, and her vinegar weak; she carries her muff wrong side out, pins her shawl crooked, musses her bonnet-strings, and don't keep her husband's buttons on; and, all in all, as he has no children, and not even the consolation of a cat, his domestic life is a pitiful failure.

Last Sabbath, when our new church was dedicated, I especially noted this as I saw him bald and portly, sitting at his end of the pew in his high dicky and dusty coat beside his pale-eyed, dowdy wife, who was whirling around to take observations when any body came in, as though she were hung on a pivot like a telescope. Four seats before them sat Lucy Barnard, the wife of a rich banker in a neighboring town, magnificent and regal in black velvet and garnet moire antique; while Herbert Halloween, now a Reverend Doctor, preached the dedicatory sermon; and Mrs. Rose Halloween, beautiful and winsome as ever, sat opposite the banker's wife, looking like her, perfectly content, and even exultant with what life had brought her.

Looking at the Past and the Present brought so closely together, I thought that Dr. Elmoak, like nations, was receiving his punishment in this world.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

PARIS, February 26, 1868.

THE festivities of the Carnival and the procession of the Bœuf Gras have been so often described that it is perhaps a dangerous topic. Yet if the performance does not become trite, but is repeated every year, perhaps the description ought to be repeated also.

Let us then, without wearying patience by too close attention to all its details, meet the procession once or twice in the course of its three days' journey about the streets of Paris, and see what new features it presents this year.

On Sunday last many people went to the great Church of the Madeleine who rarely go to church any where, for the vast steps, broad landing, and magnificent portico of this temple command an uninterrupted view down the Rue Royale, and afforded, by the continuous side arcades connecting the front and rear porticoes, the means of following the movement of the procession, which it was announced would in the course of the day march up the Rue Royale, pass through the flower-market at the side of the church, and turn up the Rue Tronchet in its rear.

At half past one o'clock the steps and portico were crowded with spectators, many of whom had just come out from service, others having been sitting on the steps since ten in the morning. The Rue Royale was cleared of carriages, and a great crowd covered both the broad sidewalks and the greater part of the smooth asphaltum carriage-way, in the centre of which a row of gens d'armes preserved a sort of open avenue for the expected procession. A murmur of exclamations, answering to the distant sound of trumpets, announced the approach of the cortège. The advance-guard of cavalry, followed by a decorated car, upon which stood the first prize ox, wheeled into the street upon a canter, and drew up before the hotel of the Minister de la Marine. When these moved on up the street the succeeding parts of the procession followed. Gorgeously dressed cavalry, or squads of horsemen uniformly attired in brilliant fancy costumes, alternated with the four cars bearing the four oxen, and the six cars or triumphal chariots, which by their designs, the dresses of their occupants, and the banners they bore, symbolized the different quarters of the globe, and agriculture during the four seasons. Upon the car of Asia was raised a life-like image of an elephant, and aloft upon his back was a tower or palanquin with pink covering, in which sat an Oriental princess. Slightly swaying in her lofty seat as the chariot rolled over the smooth pavement, and perhaps also shivering a little in the cool wind, the expression of her countenance was hardly so placid as that of the great ox behind whom she rode. In her uncomfortable elevation she seemed to be a felicitous representation of the infelicity of royalty. The car of agriculture, bearing peasants in native costumes, sitting with their implements of labor under a little grove of artificial apple-trees in full bearing, was escorted by four young ladies on horseback, in white robes, but with bare heads, arms, and necks, who personified the four seasons. The view down the street upon this approaching pageant, brilliant with colored dresses and banners flashing in the sun, and resonant with the bands of drums and trumpets, and surrounded by a crowd that pressed on every side and ran before and after, and surveyed also by elegantly-dressed spectators from private boxes on either side, afforded a scene of rare brilliancy.

Not less interesting to us was the crowd of which we formed a part. Here at our side was one of the headles or vergers of the Madeleine, who exclaimed with enthusiasm and delight as each part of the cortège came into view, and entered into a long conversation with us, and asked us about our country. He pointed out M. Duval, the great butcher, riding in his carriage in the procession, the leading spirit in the management of this humorous preliminary to the fests of Lent. Near us stood one of the priests, who had come out bareheaded to witness the scene, which he did with apparently equal interest, though in silence. Behind the pillar at our back stood the soldiers, who in uniform and with arms guard the gates of worship and direct one which door to enter at and which to pass out of on these days of great throngs. In the midst of the crowd are seen every where poor people pursuing those little industries which are patronized on such occasions: boys with huge baskets of waffles and a tin dredging-box to sugar them with for the purchaser, women with trays of candies and wooden rattles, and men with benches on their shoulders, which they run to put down in advance of the procession, and let out standing places to those who wish to see over the heads of the crowd.

On Tuesday, Mardi Gras, the third and last day of the festival, and a general holiday, the procession was to visit the Tuileries. A few moments before one o'clock we reached the Place du Carrousel, where we found its open pavement covered with spectators. Hundreds of windows in the surrounding Palace buildings were opened, and were black with heads looking down upon the scene. The fantastic cortège entered under the arches leading from the Rue de Rivoli, and passed through the iron railing into the court of the Tuileries. The Emperor and his family, with members of his household, appeared upon the balcony of the clock-tower, and the gates of the railing were then opened to the crowd, a portion of which pressed into the court and surrounded the five hundred personages who composed the procession. On this day one of the chariots bore a life-size figure of an ox with golden horns, which was in fact a balloon inflated with gas. When this car was before the Emperor the string was cut and the huge animal rose into the air, to the infinite amazement of the spectators. I have heard of broad grins, but I never before witnessed one like this, which was at least 20 acres in extent. The flying ox preserved his centre of gravity very well while waltzing slowly up into the sky, and at last disappeared, as a soaring bird does, from our sight. It was a sort of apotheosis of Beef, intended perhaps by the one who contrived the freak to symbolize the withdrawal of meat from human society, which the Church enjoins for a time.

During the afternoon and evening the streets, particularly the Boulevards, from the new Opera-house eastward, were thronged with pedestrians and carriages, all omnibuses and carts being excluded; and among them walked or rode boys and men masked and fantastically dressed, cutting such antics as they could for the amusement of the crowd. Many of the children appearing in the streets were also in fancy costumes, but they all behaved with the utmost gravity.

I saw one man parading the street toward dusk in the apparel of a woman in deshabille, and in such a plight that chivalrous Frenchmen ought to have horsewhipped the fellow and ducked him in the Seine. As for the rest that I saw in a three hours' walk, if not always very witty or humorous it was grotesque enough, and it would be ungrateful not to try to laugh at those who try so hard to make themselves laughable. But to our thinking there is more happiness expressed in the natural spontaneous merriment of a pure and unaffected mind, or in the earnest thoughtful look of eyes that have their depths of reverence, charity, judgment, and modesty, as well as the surface-sparkle of wit, than in all the artificial and half-contemptuous gaiety with which Paris has made such an effort to be amused.

One could not help thinking that some of the parents who drive out with their children dressed like Punch and Judy, or the clowns of a circus, would have done better to have taken them down the narrow streets of Old Paris, and bestowed the expense in carrying thither food and fuel to some of the pallid poor who shiver and fast without needing the injunctions of the Church to do so. To carry smiles and happiness abroad in that way would be teaching the little ones to make people laugh to some purpose.

But here we are, fairly into a second column, and not into Lent yet.

It is said that a wise man is known as much by what he omits to say as by what he says. This is certainly true of newspaper correspondents in these days, when the telegraph competes with, but does not supersede, the mail, and the reader of the weekly paper reads half a dozen dailies also.

Let us hope for the good time coming that somebody has predicted, which will set this all right, when every intelligent person will carry in his pocket a portable electric battery with the end of a wire, and all that he need do will be to go to a public station of the telegraph at the nearest street corner, and hook on, and talk away around the world at sixpence a half hour.

GRATIAN.

MODERN MANNERS.

A HIGHWAY DRAMA, IN SIX ACTS.

ACT I.

Scene 1.—Broadway, in the heaviest snow-storm of the season. Lady standing on the corner watching for an omnibus with a vacant seat. All are full. Still she waits. It grows dusk. How can she get home? At length, wearied out, she ventures to signal one to take her in.

Scene 2.—Lady enters the omnibus. Twelve "lords of creation" are seated within. Lady shrinks back at first; but knowing no other way to reach home, nerves herself, clinging to the roof, to endure the stony stare of twenty-four eyes. The twenty-four eyes gaze relentlessly upon the lady's flushing face. Oh, could she but have walked!

Scene 3.—At the farthest corner two eyes begin to look pityingly upon the standing lady. Their owner signals, at length, for her to take his seat. She bows gratefully—'tis pleasant to be thought of kindly—but the seat is difficult to reach, and she hesitates to accept an attention which may be grudgingly offered. But the owner of the two pitying eyes courteously insists, and the lady is seated.

Scene 4.—The eleven lords turn twenty-two wondering orbs upon the rustic, unsophisticated masculine who knows so little of modern etiquette as to resign his seat to a lady.

ACT II.

Scene 1.—Fourth Avenue car; all the seats occupied, but only two of them by ladies. One of the ladies young and pretty. Car stops; enters an elderly lady, crowned with a "hoary head" such as the ancients were accustomed and commanded to "rise up before." No one rises; elderly lady supports herself against the door of the car.

Scene 2.—The young and pretty lady seated in the car sees the hoary-headed lady standing. She casts a hasty, indignant look at the stolid men around; then rising, courteously offers her seat to the aged lady, who accepts gratefully, with thanks. Young lady stands through her ride, rewarded—outwardly—only by rude, wondering stares.

ACT III.

Scene 1.—Astor House, starting-point of Eighth Avenue cars. Gentlemen and ladies waiting. Car comes in sight. "Gentlemen" start and run to meet it; they jump on it while moving, cling to the sides, rush inside, and fill every seat before it really stops. Ladies enter; no seats. Ladies get out of the car and wait for another. Same process repeated; gentlemen run ahead and fill up the car; ladies stand or wait.

Scene 2.—Eighth Avenue car, at Bleecker Street. Enters a well-dressed, modest-looking lady. Seats filled with lines of "lords of creation," most intent upon the "news" of the day. No one is standing but this one lady, who finds herself conspicuously located. Lords look up—see one lady standing solitary—resume their reading with new interest, apparently quite indifferent to outward things.

ACT IV.

Scene 1.—Broadway car. A feeble old gentleman enters. Seats filled. No young and vigorous noble offers civilities, or pays the slightest attention to the pale face and bent form. Suddenly one rises, a mere boy, and with courtly grace presents his seat to the aged gentleman. Not until then is it seen that the young knight, brave and noble in soul, is mutilated in body, and stands on crutches, while an empty sleeve swings loosely at his side. His soldierly act rouses some dormant spirit in lookers on, and seats are offered him. He declines, saying he is quite able to stand.

ACT V.

Scene 1.—Sixth Avenue car. Seats not full, but occupants have spread themselves largely. Enter lady and gentleman. People look up blankly, but never attempt to contract themselves. Gentleman and lady look vainly for an opening. Great obtuseness prevails. Gentleman makes a direct request for room. A reluctant movement is made, and supercilious stares bestowed upon the intruders.

Scene 2.—Lady enters a crowded car. Gentleman rises to give her his seat. A youthful dandy slips dextrously into the vacant place, adjusts his eye-glass, and coolly opens the morning paper. Indignant looks of gentleman entirely wasted, as he reads with fixed eyes. Lady smiles curiously, and continues to stand.

ACT VI.

Scene 1.—Railroad director asleep. Dreams. In dream sees a large parlor filled with ladies. Placard in conspicuous place with words "Office of the Directresses of the City Railroad Companies." Ladies writing and talking.

Scene 2.—Grand transformation-scene, with panoramic views of the city of New York. Number of cars and omnibuses on every line tripled; car passes a given point every half minute. No car crowded. Seats for all. No cross looks. Every body exceedingly polite. Every body very happy. General indications of the rapid approach of the Millennium!

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE CAB.

THAT evening Beatrice's performance had been greeted with louder applause than usual, and, what was more gratifying to one like her, the effective passages had been listened to with a stillness which spoke more loudly than the loudest applause of the deep interest of the audience.

Langhetti had almost always driven home with her, but on this occasion he had excused himself on account of some business in the theatre which required his attention.

On going out Beatrice could not find the cabman whom she had employed. After looking around for him a long time she found that he had gone. She was surprised and vexed. At the same time she could not account for this, but thought that perhaps he had been drinking and had forgotten all about her. On making this discovery she was on the point of going back and telling Langhetti, but a cabman followed her persistently, promising to take her wherever she wished, and she thought that it would be foolish to trouble Langhetti about so small a matter; so that at length she decided to employ the persevering cabman, thinking that he could take her to her lodgings as well as any body else.

The cabman started off at a rapid pace, and went on through street after street, while Beatrice sat thinking of the evening's performance.

At last it seemed to her that she had been a much longer time than usual, and she began to fear that the cabman had lost his way. She looked out. They were going along the upper part of Oxford Street, a great distance from where she lived. She instantly tried to draw down the window so as to attract the cabman's attention, but could not move it. She tried the other, but all were fast and would not stir. She rapped at the glass to make him hear, but he took no notice. Then she tried to open the door, but could not do so from the inside.

She sat down and thought. What could be the meaning of this? They were now going at a much faster rate than is common in the streets of London, but where she was going she could not conjecture.

She was not afraid. Her chief feeling was one of indignation. Either the cabman was drunk—or what? Could he have been hired to carry her off to her enemies? Was she betrayed?

This thought flashed like lightning through her mind.

She was not one who would sink down into inaction at the sudden onset of terror. Her chief feeling now was one of indignation at the audacity of such an attempt. Obeying the first impulse that seized her, she took the solid roll of music which she carried with her and dashed it against the front window so violently that she broke it in pieces. Then she caught the driver by the sleeve and ordered him to stop.

"All right," said the driver, and, turning a corner, he whipped up his horses, and they galloped on faster than ever.

"If you don't stop I'll call for help!" cried Beatrice.

The driver's only answer was a fresh application of the whip.

The street up which they turned was narrow, and as it had only dwelling-houses it was not so brightly lighted as Oxford Street. There were but few foot-passengers on the sidewalk. As it was now about midnight, most of the lights were out, and the gas-lamps were the chief means of illumination.

Yet there was a chance that the police might save her. With this hope she dashed her music scroll against the windows on each side of the cab and shivered them to atoms, calling at the top of her voice for help. The swift rush of the cab and the sound of a woman's voice shouting for aid aroused the police. They started forward. But the horses were rushing so swiftly that no one dared to touch them. The driver seemed to them to have lost control. They thought that the horses were running away, and that those within the cab were frightened.

Away they went through street after street, and Beatrice never ceased to call. The excitement which was created by the runaway horses did not abate, and at length when the driver stopped a policeman hurried up.

The house before which the cab stopped was a plain two-story one, in a quiet-looking street. A light shone from the front-parlor window. As the cab drew up the door opened and a man came out.

Beatrice saw the policeman. "Help!" she cried; "I implore help. This wretch is carrying me away."

"What's this?" growled the policeman.

At this the man that had come out of the house hurried forward.

"Have you found her?" exclaimed a well-known voice. "Oh, my child! How could you leave your father's roof?"

It was Jolin Potts.

Beatrice was silent for a moment in utter amazement. Yet she made a violent effort against her despair.

"You have no control over me," said she, bitterly. "I am of age. And you," said she to the policeman, "I demand your help. I put myself under your protection, and order you either to take that man in charge or to let me go to my home."

"Oh, my daughter!" cried Potts. "Will you still be relentless?"

"Help me!" cried Beatrice, and she opened the cab-door.

"The policeman can do nothing," said Potts. "You are not of age. He will not dare to take you from me."

"I implore you," cried Beatrice, "save me from this man. Take me to the police-station—any where rather than leave me here!"

"You can not," said Potts to the bewildered policeman. "Listen. She is my daughter and under age. She ran away with a strolling Italian vagabond, with whom she is leading an improper life. I have got her back."

"It's false!" cried Beatrice, vehemently. "I fled from this man's house because I feared his violence."

"That is an idle story," said Potts.

"Save me!" cried Beatrice.

"I don't know what to do—I suppose I've got to take you to the station, at any rate," said the policeman, hesitatingly.

"Well," said Potts to Beatrice, "if you do go to the station-house you'll have to be handed back to me. You are under age."

"It's false!" cried Beatrice. "I am twenty."

"No, you are not more than seventeen."

"Langhetti can prove that I am twenty."

"How? I have documents, and a father's word will be believed before a paramour's."

This taunt stung Beatrice to the soul.

"As to your charge about my cruelty I can prove to the world that you lived in splendor in Brandon Hall. Every one of the servants can testify to this. Your morose disposition made you keep by yourself. You always treated your father with indifference, and finally ran away with a man who unfortunately had won your affections in Hong Kong."

"You well know the reason why I left your roof," replied Beatrice, with calm and severe dignity. "Your foul aspersions upon my character are unworthy of notice."

"And what shall I say about your aspersions on my character?" cried Potts, in a loud, rude voice, hoping by a sort of vulgar self-assertion to brow-beat Beatrice. "Do you remember the names you called me and your threats against me? When all this is brought out in the police court, they will see what kind of a daughter you have been."

"OH, MY DAUGHTER!" CRIED POTTS. "WILL YOU STILL BE RELENTLESS?"

"You will be the last one who will dare to let it be brought into a police court."

"And why? Those absurd charges of yours are worthless. Have you any proof?" he continued, with a sneer, "or has your paramour any?"

"Take me away," said Beatrice to the policeman.

"Wait!" exclaimed Potts; "you are going, and I will go to reclaim you. The law will give you back to me; for I will prove that you are under age, and I have never treated you with any thing except kindness. Now the law can do nothing since you are mine. But as you are so young and inexperienced I'll tell you what will happen."

"The newspapers," he continued, after a pause, "will be full of your story. They will print what I shall prove to be true—that you had an intractable disposition—that you had formed a guilty attachment for a drum-major at Hong Kong—that you ran away with him, lived for a while at Holly, and then went with your paramour to London. If you had only married him you would have been out of my power; but you don't pretend to be married. You don't call yourself Langhetti, but have taken another name, which the sharp newspaper reporters will hint was given you by some other one of your numerous favorites. They will declare that you love every man but your own father; and you—you who played the goddess on the stage and sang about Truth and Religion will be known all over England and all over Europe too as the vilest of the vile."

At this tremendous menace Beatrice's resolution was shattered to pieces. That this would be so she well knew. To escape from Potts was to have herself made infamous publicly under the sanction of the law, and then, by that same law to be handed back to him. At least whether it was so or not, she thought so. There was no help—no friend.

"Go," said Potts; "leave me now and you become covered with infamy. Who would believe your story?"

Beatrice was silent, her slender frame was rent by emotion.

"O God!" she groaned—but in her deep despair she could not find thoughts even for prayers.

"You may go, policeman," said Potts; "my daughter will come with me."

"Faith and I'm glad! It's the best thing for her," and the policeman, much relieved, returned to his beat.

"Some of you'll have to pay for them winders," said the cabman.

"All right," answered Potts, quietly.

"There is your home for to-night, at any rate," said Potts, pointing to the house. "I don't think you have any chance left. You had better go in."

His tone was one full of bitter taunt. Scarcely conscious, with her brain reeling, and her limbs trembling, Beatrice entered the house.

CHAPTER XL.

DISCOVERIES.

THE next morning after Beatrice's last performance Langhetti determined to fulfill his promise and tell her that secret which she had been so anxious to know. On entering into his parlor he saw a letter lying on the table addressed to him. It bore no postage stamp, or post-office mark.

He opened it and read the following:

"LONDON, September 5, 1849.

"SIGNORE,—Cigole, the betrayer and intended assassin of your late father, is now in London. You can find out about him by inquiring of Giovanni Cavallo, 16 Red Lion Street. As a traitor to the Carbonari, you will know that it is your duty to punish him, even if your filial piety is not strong enough to avenge a father's wrongs."

"CARBONARO."

Langhetti read this several times. Then he called for his landlord.

"Who left this letter?" he asked.

"A young man."

"Do you know his name?"

"No."

"What did he look like?"

"He looked like a counting-house clerk more than any thing."

"When was it left?"

"About six o'clock this morning."

Langhetti read it over and over. The news that it contained filled his mind. It was not yet ten o'clock. He would not take any breakfast, but went out at once, jumped into a cab, and drove off to Red Lion Street.

Giovanni Cavallo's office was in a low, dingy building, with a dark, narrow doorway. It was one of those numerous establishments conducted and supported by foreigners whose particular business it is not easy to conjecture. The building was full of offices, but this was on the ground-floor.

Langhetti entered, and found the interior as dingy as the exterior. There was a table in the middle of the room. Beyond this was a door which opened into a back-room.

Only one person was here—a small, bright-eyed man, with thick Vandyke beard and sinewy though small frame. Langhetti took off his hat and bowed.

"I wish to see Signore Cavallo," said he, in Italian.

"I am Signore Cavallo," answered the other, blandly.

Langhetti made a peculiar motion with his left arm. The keen eye of the other noticed it in an instant. He returned a gesture of a similar character. Langhetti and he then exchanged some more secret signs. At last Langhetti made one which caused the other to start, and to bow with deep respect.

"I did not know," said he, in a low voice, "that any of the Interior Council ever came to London.....But come in here," and he led the way into the inner room, the door of which he locked very mysteriously.

A long conference followed, the details of which would only be tedious. At the close Cavallo said, "There is some life in us yet, and what life we have left shall be spent in trapping that miscreant. Italy shall be avenged on one of her traitors, at any rate."

"You will write as I told you, and let me know?"

"Most faithfully."

Langhetti departed, satisfied with the result of this interview. What surprised him most was the letter. The writer must have been one who had been acquainted with his past life. He was amazed to find any one denouncing Cigole to him, but finally concluded that it must be some old Carbonaro, exiled through the afflictions which had befallen that famous society, and cherishing in his exile the bitter resentment which only exiles can feel.

Cavallo himself had known Cigole for years, but had no idea whatever of his early career. Cigole had no suspicion that Cavallo had any thing to do with the Carbonari. His firm were general agents, who did business of a miscellaneous character, now commission, now banking, and now shipping; and in various ways they had had dealings with this man, and kept up an irregular correspondence with him.

This letter had excited afresh within his ardent and impetuous nature all the remembrances of early wrongs. Gentle though he was, and pure in heart, and elevated in all his aspirations, he yet was in all respects a true child of the South, and his passionate nature was roused to a storm by this prospect of just retaliation. All the lofty doctrines with which he might console others were of no avail here in giving him calm. He had never voluntarily pursued Cigole; but now, since this villain had been presented to him, he could not turn aside from what he considered the holy duty of avenging a father's wrongs.

He saw that for the present every thing would have to give way to this. He determined at once to suspend the representation of the "Prometheus," even though it was at the height of its popularity and in the full tide of its success. He determined to send Beatrice under his sister's care, and to devote himself now altogether to the pursuit of Cigole, even if he had to follow him to the world's end. The search after him might not be long after all, for Cavallo felt sanguine of speedy success, and assured him that the traitor was in his power, and that the Carbonari in London were sufficiently numerous to seize him and send him to whatever punishment might be deemed most fitting.

With such plans and purposes Langhetti went to visit Beatrice, wondering how she would receive the intelligence of his new purpose.

It was two o'clock in the afternoon before he reached her lodgings. On going up he rapped. A servant came, and on seeing him looked frightened.

"Is Miss Despard in?"

The servant said nothing, but ran off. Langhetti stood waiting in surprise; but in a short time the landlady came. She had a troubled look, and did not even return his salutation.

"Is Miss Despard in?"

"She is not here, Sir."

"Not here!"

"No, Sir. I'm frightened. There was a man here early this morning, too."

"A man here. What for?"

"Why, to ask after her."

"And did he see her?"

"She wasn't here."

"Wasn't here! What do you mean?"

"She didn't come home at all last night. I waited up for her till four."

"Didn't come home!" cried Langhetti, as an awful fear came over him.

"No, Sir."

"Do you mean to tell me that she didn't come home at her usual hour?"

"No, Sir—not at all; and as I was saying, I sat up nearly all night."

"Heavens!" cried Langhetti, in bewilderment. "What is the meaning of this? But take me to her room. Let me see with my own eyes."

The landlady led the way up, and Langhetti followed anxiously. The rooms were empty. Every thing remained just as she had left it. Her music was lying loosely around. The landlady said that she had touched nothing.

Langhetti asked about the man who had called in the morning. The landlady could tell nothing about him, except that he was a gentleman with dark hair, and very stern eyes that terrified her. He seemed to be very angry or very terrible in some way about Beatrice.

Who could this be? thought Langhetti. The landlady did not know his name. Some one was certainly interesting himself very singularly about Cigole, and some one else, or else the same person, was very much interested about Beatrice. For a moment he thought it might be Despard. This, however, did not seem probable, as Despard would have written him if he were coming to town.

Deeply perplexed, and almost in despair, Langhetti left the house and drove home, thinking on the way what ought to be done. He thought he would wait till evening, and perhaps she would appear. He did thus wait, and in a fever of excitement and suspense, but on going to the lodging-house again there was nothing more known about her.

Leaving this he drove to the police-office. It seemed to him now that she must have been foully dealt with in some way. He could think of no one but Potts; yet how Potts could manage it was a mystery. That mystery he himself could not hope to unravel. The police might. With that confidence in the police which is common to all Continentals he went and made known his troubles. The officials at once promised to make inquiries, and told him to call on the following evening.

The next evening he went there. The policeman was present who had been at the place when Potts met Beatrice. He told the whole story—the horses running furiously, the screams from the cab, and the appeal of Beatrice for help, together with her final acquiescence in the will of her father.

Langhetti was overwhelmed. The officials evidently believed that Potts was an injured father, and showed some coldness to Langhetti.

"He is her father; what better could she do?" asked one.

"Any thing would be better," said Langhetti, mournfully. "He is a villain so remorseless that she had to fly. Some friends received her. She went to get her own living since she is of age. Can nothing be done to rescue her?"

"Well, she might begin a lawsuit; if she really is of age he can not hold her. But she had much better stay with him."

Such were the opinions of the officials. They courteously granted permission to Langhetti to take the policeman to the house.

On knocking an old woman came to the door. In answer to his inquiries she stated that a gentleman had been living there three weeks, but that on the arrival of his daughter he had gone home.

"When did he leave?"

"Yesterday morning."

"WHAT LIFE WE HAVE LEFT SHALL BE SPENT IN TRAPPING THAT MISCREANT."

THE PRINCESS OF WALES AND HER ELDEST SON.

THE PRINCESSES OF WALES.

WE present our readers with a portrait, engraved from a capital photograph, of the present Princess of Wales, now in her twenty-fourth year, together with that of her eldest son, the Prince Albert Victor Christian Edward, who was born on the 8th of January, 1864, and who is as healthy and blooming a boy as the most doting and partial of parents could desire.

It is nearly five years since the Princess of Wales came to England, a girlish bride, in the early spring of her remarkable loveliness, and to say that she has blossomed into all that was reasonably expected of her would be but feebly to express the lively estimation in which she is held by all classes. Whatever her youth, beauty, education, and amiability of character promised has been amply fulfilled. As a wife and mother, and as the second lady in the land, she has established for herself a position so pure and exalted that it could only belong to such a reign and womanly example as that of Queen Victoria.

Hitherto the Princesses of Wales have been neither happy nor popular, and as they are few in number, a brief mention of them may not be uninteresting.

The first Princess of Wales was Joan of Kent, wife of Edward the Black Prince, and we all have read how that doughty warrior was always on his war-horse, fighting with France or Spain, so that Joan had not much of his society; and to add to her distress she was not blessed in their only son, the unhappy Richard of Bordeaux.

There was not another Princess of Wales for more than 300 years. The second was Caroline of Anspach; and when we know she was married to George II., we have before us a pretty clear idea of what kind of married life she led. The title may, therefore, be said to have been revived, nay almost created afresh, in the Guelph family.

The third Princess of Wales was Augusta of Saxe-Cobourg, mother of George III., whose husband, Prince Frederick, was killed by the blow of a cricket-ball, and, says the historian, "died universally de-pised." Of this lady, the renowned Junius, who knew the family well, and hated it—which fact may, perhaps, render him a questionable authority—wrote most bitterly, charging her, to serve her own selfish ends, with having made her son, George III., a fool, as if his natural organization had no share in the matter, being the child of such a father as Prince Frederick, and such a woman as Princess Augusta.

The fourth Princess of Wales was Caroline of Brunswick, the most miserable and unfortunate of the series—a woman who, whatever her defects of character, did not deserve to have for a husband such a vile and heartless debauchee as George IV. Caroline, because she was ill-used and persecuted, was the pet of the bulk of the nation; but the "upper ten," who professed to know the mysteries of Court and Court ladies, gravely shook their heads at the mention of her name. When mob-law was in the ascendant in London, that brilliant cavalry soldier, the late Marquis of Anglesey, was surrounded at Whitehall, and asked to shout "God save the Queen," which he did; but added, in his stentorian voice—the voice that had rang over many a bloody field of battle—"And may all your wives be like her!" King Mob was tickled, and lustily cheered the plucky old soldier.

Princess Alexandra of Denmark is the fifth; and happy is it for her that her lot is cast in such a time—a time when her husband, the prince, instead of cutting throats in Guienne or Castile, goes quietly to Paris, the capital of great France, to dine with the Emperor and Empress, and lend his countenance to the very opposite of war, an exhibition of the arts of industry of all nations—a time when the brutish irregularities of George II. and a Frederick would be thought hideous, and the blackguardism of a Prince George impossible.

For the brilliant progress in morals and social condition of the people during the present reign, the nation, of course, is more largely indebted to its own unfettered and indomitable self than to any other cause; but it is unquestionable that to the example of Queen Victoria and her good husband may be attributed a very large share of that improved tone, that dignity, reverence for law and religion, and higher appreciation of the more refined influences that govern human conduct, which so markedly distinguish and adorn the England of our day.

Not but that the fair princess has had her trials. The superstitious would say she would not be a Princess of Wales if she had not. Royalty does not, more than any other portion of mortality, repose on a bed of roses; and if Princess Alexandra has been spared one kind of infliction she has been sorely visited with another—even to the peril of her life.

That terrible disease, rheumatism, in its most acute form, seized upon her at a very critical time, and for weeks she lay in a very serious condition. But her good constitution and fortitude, although bitterly tried by the most agonized tortures, aided by skillful medical treatment, carried her through, to the great joy not only of her own relations, but of the whole nation. The attack brought on a lameness in one of her knee-joints, which confined her indoors for months; but now, we are happy to learn that, since her return from the trip which she and the Prince of Wales took to Wurtemberg in the autumn, her health has so far improved that her restoration to entire convalescence is almost a certainty; and with it comes the assurance that she will resume that place in society which so well becomes her youth, beauty, and position. There is a likelihood, also, of the Queen, this next season, emerging from her long retirement, and holding some Court revels of that kind only which would have the sanction of Queen Victoria. So that 1868 promises to be a gayer year than its predecessor; and let us hope, in addition, it will be a brighter one for the country at large.

The presumptive heir to the kingdom of Great Britain is an object on which much interesting speculation might dwell; but, in all human probability, it will be long before his now baby brow will be called upon to bear the "massy weight" of the "golden round and top of sovereignty." The male members of the Guelph dynasty have been long-lived, as a rule; so that an actuary would calculate, in his cold way, that it will be at least forty years before this little child-prince will be called upon to assume the splendor and cares of royalty. Forty years! What sort of an England will this child, if he ever should become king, inherit? Who could prophesy on such a subject?

ADVENTURE WITH A BEAR.

GERALD and Harry Austin were the sons of an English officer of the army. Their mother died when they were quite young, and their early training had been much neglected. When they reached the age of fourteen and fifteen their deficiencies became so apparent to their father that he placed them under the sole charge of a tutor, whose name was Mr. Stuart. It was arranged by Mr. Austin and Mr. Stuart that the boys should go to Norway; and there, while traveling about, attend to their studies, and also receive such moral and physical culture as might be necessary.

It was in the course of this tour through Norway that Harry met with a surprising adventure. He was walking in the woods with Mr. Stuart and Gerald, all having their guns in the hope of finding some wild game. It was suggested that they should make a collection of rare birds' eggs to carry home, and Harry became intent upon the idea.

Walking with his head high in the air, and his eyes fixed upon the trees, he suddenly exclaimed: "There is one! There's a nest, I am certain. Now for a climb!"

"That is no nest made by any known bird, I am sure," said Mr. Stuart. "It is only some dead rubbish lodged in the bough."

"I am sure it is a nest," said Harry. "At any rate it will do no harm to climb up and see."

"It will be waste of time, Harry; but I see you are bent upon it. Much better come on; we are some way from home as it is."

"Well, Sir," said he, "I'll run after you, and overtake you in no time. Don't wait for me."

"We will walk slowly," said Mr. Stuart. "It will not take you long to bring down all the eggs you find in that bird's nest."

They went on, and before they were out of sight Harry was at the top of the tree. Certainly there was nothing like a nest there; it was, as Mr. Stuart had said, merely a collection of rubbish; but when Harry got to the first batch of dead leaves he saw another a little higher up, which he thought looked still more like a nest. This induced him to climb farther, so that he was a longer time up the tree than he had intended.

As he was making his way down again, rapidly, he heard a noise just close to the foot of the stem. Harry rested at the lowest bough, and looked down. There was something which breathed hard near the tree—something smelling at the stock of his gun, which he had laid down upon the grass before he began to climb. It was a great, awkward, ragged-looking brown thing, who kept snuffing at the gun, and making remarks to himself, I suppose in his own language, for it certainly was not English.

"It can't be a bear, surely?" said Harry, as he sat astride the bough of the tree, looking down at his friend.

Now Harry knew no more about bears, as living animals, than I dare say you do. He had perhaps seen one or two live bears, but they had been tame, because they could not help themselves; and when he saw this bear engaged in smelling at his gun, he only felt disposed to laugh. Had he known more about the matter he would more likely have sat where he was, comfortable enough, until the bear, finding he could make nothing of the gun, moved off of his own accord; but as it was he did about the most foolish thing he could. He broke a twig off the tree and threw it down on the bear's head, shouting, "Yah! leave my gun alone, you beggar! I'll be after you in a minute, and teach you to touch another gentleman's property."

The bear looked up, startled at the voice, and perhaps surprised at being called a gentleman; and when he saw Harry, he turned slowly away with a grunt and seemed inclined to make off.

When he was a few yards distant, down dropped Harry from the bough and seized his gun. The bear was slowly moving away.

"Here, take this for your impudence!" exclaimed Harry.

At his speaking the bear stopped, and turned his head once more; whereupon Harry fired full in his face.

The beast gave a savage growl, and with much greater quickness than Harry would have given him credit for, rushed back at him. Harry saw his mistake now; but it was too late. The only thing he could do was to jump behind the tree, while the bear on the other side embraced the trunk of it, and savagely scratched and tore the bark.

"If I could only blind him," thought Harry; "if I could fire now close to his face."

But it was of no use. Harry had forgotten for the moment that but one barrel of his gun was loaded. He had discharged the other at some bird a few minutes before parting with Mr. Stuart and his brother.

Meanwhile the bear had made up his mind what to do, and kept Harry dancing round and round the trunk of the tree, which was fortunately a pretty thick one, with his heart in his mouth, and feeling very much as if it was all over with him.

Besides, the bear, instead of looking now a mere untidy, ragged bundle of fur, on a closer view appeared a very savage and horrible beast, gnashing his great teeth, and growling in a most unpleasant manner.

Harry felt that he could not dance round and round the tree, dodging the bear, much longer. He was sure that, in a minute or two, he should dodge the wrong way, and be in the bear's arms; and he recollected something he had heard or read about bears hugging people so as to stifle them.

All at once he flung his gun in the bear's face. It hit him on the nose, and made him give a roar of pain. He stopped his dance after Harry, and the latter took advantage of the pause to reach another tree, not so thick in the stem as the one round which he and his companion had been performing their capers, up which he ran like a lamp-lighter.

When he got to a bough he sat upon it to rest and to breathe, for he was tired and panting with his involuntary dance. The bear was once more smelling at the gun, and slowly turning it over and over, but not in the curious, inquisitive way he had done before. He was angry with it now, because it had hit his nose; and every now and then he bit the barrel of it viciously.

"Take care of your teeth, old fellow!" muttered Harry, from his elevation. "You'll do yourself more harm than you'll do the gun, I fancy."

But the bear had by this time satisfied himself with regard to the gun; and, with a loud grunt, he bethought himself of his other enemy. He looked about from side to side, and, not seeing him, grunted again. Harry chuckled to himself. Whether he made any sound in so doing I do not know; but almost immediately afterward the bear looked up and saw him sitting astride on the bough of the tree, apparently very much at his ease.

He roared with rage at sight of him. "Ah, ha!" said Harry, in answer to his address. "You're sold, my friend, eh?"

Not a bit of it. After a moment's hesitation the bear went to the foot of the tree where Harry was and commenced climbing it.

"What shall I do? what shall I do?" exclaimed Harry aloud, feeling now really dreadfully frightened.

There was nothing for him to do but to climb higher up the tree, out of the bear's reach; but the higher went Harry the higher went the bear, getting more and more angry at every disappointment, and growling more and more fiercely.

The trees of the wood were very close together, so that their upper branches interlaced. Harry passed from one tree to the other, hoping that Bruin would either lose sight of him and give up the pursuit, or that he would not be able to follow his example, by the boughs not being strong enough to support his weight.

But the bear was much more cunning than Harry thought. He directly perceived the movement of his enemy, and passed to the next tree by some lower and stronger boughs.

Then began a chase on the tops of the trees; Harry passing as rapidly as he could from one to the other, the bear lumbering after him, but appearing to gain upon him notwithstanding his clumsiness. After a time Harry found himself at the top of a tree without any bough reaching out far enough to touch a neighboring one.

There was nothing left for him but to descend; and, finding himself once more on the ground, he ran with his utmost speed to escape his pursuer. He thought that perhaps he might get beyond the wood, or that he might outrun the bear; but before long he heard heavy steps behind him, and there was his friend, pounding along, puffing and panting, but for all that gaining upon him at every step.

Harry was pretty nearly knocked up by this time. The excitement, the fear for his life, added to the no small amount of violent exercise which he had taken, had almost exhausted him; but it would not do, quietly to give in to be hugged and done for without further resistance; and, knowing that there was nothing left for him but to take to the trees again, he stopped at once and began to climb. His legs were only just clear of the ground, when the bear also was at the tree.

"This will never do," thought Harry; "he will reach me directly."

The thought had only passed through his mind, when his hat was knocked off his head by a projecting branch. It would have gone long before, only that it was rather tight for him. The bear stopped, turned to look at it, and then, seizing it, tore it into shreds before proceeding in his chase.

"Well," thought Harry again, "if you like that sort of play, I can accommodate you with each article of my dress in turn;" and he took advantage of the bear's occupation to climb to the top of the tree.

Things went on in this way, Harry always flying, and the bear untiringly following him; every now and then the boy getting a short respite, and regaining the ground he had lost by the sacrifice of some article of his clothing. His coat, his waistcoat, even his trousers, had each in turn been torn to shreds by the bear; and Harry was gloomily turning over in his mind what he should do when the sole remaining piece of his dress, his shirt, was gone, being fully assured that, before long, he should have to divest himself of that also, when he heard voices, not very far off, shouting his own name.

"Harry! Harry! where are you?"

"Up here."

"Up where?"

"At the top of this tree."

"What are you doing?"

"I've got a bear up here."

"Got a what?"

"A bear."

"Why don't you come down?"

"He'll come after me if I do."

Mr. Stuart and Gerald did not half understand what he meant, and again shouted to him to come down.

When he did so they understood it less, for he was in his shirt.

"Why, what have you done with your clothes?" asked Mr. Stuart.

"He has torn them all up," answered Harry.

"Who?"

"Why, the bear."

"Harry, what do you mean? Have you gone mad?" asked Gerald.

He looked so, with his hair all on end, scratched and torn with making his way through the pine-trees.

"That's what I mean," answered Harry; "there he comes—the brute!"

Almost directly afterward the bear appeared upon one of the lower boughs, preparatory to dropping to the ground.

"Why, it's a bear!" said Gerald, as if the idea had struck him for the first time.

"You would say so," said Harry, "if you had been chased by him for as long a time as I have. It's a bear and a half."

The bear looked amazed when he found that his acquaintance had met with a reinforcement. He stood irresolute for a moment, as if half disposed to show his discretion rather than his valor; but when he caught sight of Harry standing in his shirt among the rest, the old sense of grievance seemed to revive, and he growled afresh and made toward him. But as his eyes were turned upon, and his attention taken up by Harry, treating the other two with profound contempt, as he had no formal introduction to them, Mr. Stuart went up close to him and fired his gun close into his eyes.

The poor brute was almost blinded; and Mr. Stuart and Gerald, after several discharges of their guns, succeeded in killing him. Then they all three stood a while and looked at him, after which Gerald asked:

"Where is your gun?"

"I threw it at him," said Harry, pointing to the bear. "I fired it once at him. I wish I hadn't. He would have let me alone, I dare say, if I had not, and I had only one charge; you had my powder and shot, you know."

"We must go and look for the gun," said Mr. Stuart.

"And what shall we do about the bear? I should like to carry him home," said Gerald.

"I am afraid he is beyond us," said Mr. Stuart; "but we will come back and try after we have found the gun. Here, Harry, take my coat, for convenience sake, to say nothing of propriety. Perhaps we may find some of your clothes also on our road."

"Hardly, Sir, I think; excepting in strips and shreds."

The gun was found uninjured; but none of the clothes were worth carrying home. As they returned to the spot where they had left the dead bear, Harry recounted, in his amusing manner, how the beast had pursued him, and how narrowly he had escaped being caught on several occasions; how frightened he had been when he heard the quick breathing of the bear close to him; and how at times he had thought that he could not hold out any longer, and felt inclined to stop and let the bear catch him, sooner than have to climb any more.

"Yet you laugh about it now," said Gerald, "as if it had merely been a lark."

"I can afford to laugh, now that it is all well over," answered Harry; "but I can assure you I felt more inclined to cry at the time."

"Here we are at the bear. Well, although I did not shoot him myself, I think I have been instrumental in helping you to the largest head of game you have bagged to-day."

"Are you quite sure he is dead?" said Gerald, poking at him with his ramrod. "Suppose he should be only shamming, and should all at once jump up at us; shouldn't we take to our heels?"

"I can assure you that would not be of much use," said Henry, "if he were to run as he ran after me."

"He is dead enough," said Mr. Stuart. "How about carrying him?"

They tried to lift him on to their shoulders; but the boys found that they were not equal to the bear's weight. It was getting late in the day now; but the evenings in Norway are so long that they were not aware how late it was.

"Suppose we leave him here, and return tomorrow with help and bring him home," said Mr. Stuart.

This suggestion was adopted, and they returned to their hotel in town, Harry being exhausted with his chase.

As soon as their story was told great surprise was evinced, and many compliments were paid them; while at least a dozen men volunteered to fetch home the bear. A cart was brought out in a very short time, a horse harnessed to it, and Gerald expressed his intention of going with the party to point out the spot where the bear was to be found. This proposal was received with an unanimous cheer.

An hour afterward the cart returned, bearing the carcass of Bruin. The men walked in order, three on each side of the cart, one at the horse's head, and the rest following in procession. Their heads were crowned with fir branches, and they held lighted fir boughs in their hands. On the cart was the huge body of the bear, and on the top of it they had placed Gerald Austin, also crowned with fir, sitting like a young Bacchus across a tub. He had parted with his coat to his brother Harry, and he wore a scarlet flannel shirt, which had a very good effect in the bright torch-light.

The Norwegians were singing at the top of their voices one of their ancient songs to celebrate the death of a bear.

It was all very picturesque and striking; but poor Gerald, in his matter-of-fact English feeling, was very glad when they allowed him to descend from his elevation, where, he afterward told Mr. Stuart, he felt "exactly like a fool."

Meanwhile poor Harry slept the sleep of exhaustion, and knew nothing about the matter.

RIBBONS.

NO industry is so subject to the caprices of fashion as the ribbon trade: one year in favor, another discarded for some other fabric. Ribbons are essentially a fabrication of luxury, and only sell when accepted by fashion. To produce what is likely to succeed six months later—for it requires that time to make the designs and arrange the colors—to manufacture, to sell—and, if by good fortune it succeeds, to see the pattern immediately copied by an inferior manufacturer—such are the vicissitudes of the ribbon trade.

In France, St. Etienne (Loire) is the principal centre of this fabric, which for three centuries has made a considerable increase, due to the great aptitude of the people of that department for industrial works.

Birds work well in with the patterns, but the most common and popular ornament is flowers. Last year the special fashion was for "fleurs des champs," as the French style bouquets of the poppy, corn-flower, ox-eye, daisy, corn-cockle, pink convolvulus, with the addition of wheat or barley. We had them then in every combination, beautifully grouped and shaded on black, white, or colored grounds in the ribbons of Germet and Coignet, the great manufacturers of St. Etienne. Nor was the little daisy of the field (parquerette of the French) omitted. Its crimson-tipped flowers form a graceful ornamentation to one of the prettiest ribbons. There were also the choicest bunches of the poet's narcissus on a black ground, and bunches of the scarlet poppy on a white. We can not enumerate all the lovely patterns in this class—the orange flowers for the bride, the lilies of the valley, and others.

JAMES'S BANKRUPT LAW.

THE BANKRUPT LAW OF THE UNITED STATES.

1867. With Notes and a Collection of American and English Decisions upon the Principles and Practice of the Law of Bankruptcy. Adapted to the Use of the Lawyer and Merchant. By EDWIN JAMES, of the New York Bar, and one of the Framers of the recent English Bankruptcy Amendment Act. With copious Indexes, and an Appendix containing the General Orders and Forms promulgated by the United States Supreme Court. 8vo, Clth, Beveled Edges, $4 00; Sheep, $5 00.

The above is a new edition, containing the GENERAL ORDERS, together with the FORMS OF PROCEEDINGS IN BANKRUPTCY, AS PROMULGATED BY THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT, with a copious Analytical Index. This important work was prepared by Mr. James during the time the legislation in Congress on the subject was proceeding, the main provisions of the law having been carefully supervised by him. The novelty of the practice left American lawyers without experience in bankruptcy cases, and Mr. James has therefore endeavored to supply the practitioner with a treatise on the subject upon which he may confidently rely. His experience as one of the Commissioners for the amendment of the English Bankruptcy Law, and as an extensive London practitioner in Bankruptcy cases, has peculiarly fitted him for the task. The author has also endeavored, by the adoption of a clear and untechnical style, to render the work a guide to the merchant and the layman.

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.
First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.
Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.
Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.
Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.
Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.
Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are
BOGUS OR IMITATIONS.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.
Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

FACETIÆ.

Why are women extravagant in clothes?—Because when they buy a new dress they wear it out on the first day.

CELESTIAL FOOD.—By the latest advices from China we learn that even there horse-flesh has been adopted as an article of food. The Celestials have discarded edible birds' nests and taken to mares' nests instead.

A lady, in examining the inscriptions and effigies on the tombstones in a cemetery, came upon one which bore the neatly-engraved image of a horse, the reason of which she vainly strove to ascertain by the inscription, when a little girl who was with her remarked that it was put on the stone "because he died of the nightmare."

MEN AND WOMEN.—Man is composed of two yards and a half of broadcloth, a shirt collar, and more or less assurance; woman of many and various materials, an impression that she is the perfection of possibilities, and a faculty of spending much money and getting next to nothing in return.

If you should see a building well in flames, what three eminent authors would you be likely to call up first?—Why, Dickens, Howitt, Burns.

When the Duke de Choiseul, who was a remarkably lean man, came to London to negotiate a peace, Charles Townshend being asked whether the French Government had sent the preliminaries of a treaty, answered he did not know, but they had sent "the outline of an ambassador."

When is a window like a star?—When it is a skylight.

HISTORY OF A FAMILY PORTRAIT.

1760.

"My dear," said Mr. Simkins to his wife, "you are still young and beautiful."

"Why not? I am only thirty."

"Well, you must have your portrait painted before you are a day older. I know a celebrated artist who will do you justice; we will go to him at once."

In a week the portrait was finished and hung. A great family dinner was given to celebrate its inauguration, and all the guests exclaimed, "Charming! Adorable! What a perfect resemblance!" "Only she is not half so pretty; these painters are such flatterers!" whispered one old maid cousin to another.

TEN YEARS AFTER.

Mr. Simkins, dressed in mourning, stands gazing at his wife's portrait. "There she is," says he, with a sigh to a friend.

"Poor woman, she was soon snatched from you!"

"I shall never be comforted for her loss. I will hang this portrait above my bed, that her dear features may be always before my eyes."

"Do you never intend to marry again?"

"No, indeed."

"We shall see."

THREE YEARS AFTER.

"So, my friend, you are going to marry?"

"It is so dreary to live alone."

"You, who would never give your first wife a successor!"

"From her heavenly abode my dear saint looks down and blesses the union. Miss Jenkins was one of her most beloved friends."

"My dear."

"What is it, my angel?"

"I hope that you do not insist on keeping that portrait over your bed; not that I am jealous of it; but it recalls so many memories. You might hang it in your study."

"It shall go there to-morrow."

"Besides, it is prudent; the picture is very large, and it might fall some night and hurt us terribly."

FIFTEEN YEARS AFTER.

Scene—A Lawyer's Office.—MRS. JONES. "You have the will of poor dear Uncle Simkins; what has he left us?"

LAWYER. "Very little, for all his fortune goes to his widow; but he wished you to have some souvenir of him."

MRS. JONES (eagerly). "What is it?"

LAWYER. "The portrait of your aunt, his first wife."

MRS. JONES (coldly). "Ah!"

Mr. JONES. "He had much better have left us his kitchen furniture; we are in want of sauce-pans."

LAWYER. "You can send for the portrait to-morrow, if you like."

Mr. JONES. "And pay the carman!"

Mr. JONES. "Where shall we put the picture?"

Mrs. JONES. "I don't want it in the parlor."

Mr. JONES. "Nor I in my study. Let us hang it in the vestibule; it will cover a great spot on the wall."

1867.

SHERIFF. "I have a warrant to seize your furniture."

ADOLPHUS JONES. "Well, it can't be helped, if my father won't pay my debts."

SHERIFF. "A bureau, a table, half a dozen chairs, and a picture—who is this?"

ADOLPHUS. "The portrait of a great, great aunt, I believe, that my friends gave me to furnish my room. I hope it will bring a good price for the sake of my creditors."

SECOND-HAND STORE.

"What do you ask for this picture?"

"Fifty cents."

"It is too much; I will give you thirty. I am one of your customers, you know. I have bought a great amount of trumpery of you for the Theatre."

"Very well; take the picture. Do you want it for yourself?"

"Oh no; for the theatre. We are bringing out a new piece, and want the portrait of a lady for one of the side-scenes. This will just do."

MORAL.

"Won't that boa constrictor bite me?" said a little boy to a showman. "Oh no, boy, he never bites—he swallows his wittles whole."

A country paper says there is a man in that neighborhood so mean that he sits on the doorsteps of the church on Sundays to save the wear of his pew-cushions.

A TURKISH BATH (FOR LADIES ONLY)—The Bosphorus.

GRAMMAR—The art of speaking and writing correctly.

LOVERS' GRAMMAR—The above art reduced to its simplest form. For them there is but one noun or substantive—Love.

But one proper name—Edward or Caroline.

But one common name—lover.

But one adjective—adorable.

But one possessive—my.

But one personal pronouns—he and she.

But one verb—to love.

But one adverb—forever.

But one preposition—despite.

But one conjunction—but.

But one interjection—Oh!

The letter "S" is said to be as good as a sewing-machine, because it makes needles needless.

It is related of two old Scotch ministers that one asked the other if he was not sorely tempted at times to go fishing on Sunday afternoon. "Oh, mon," replied his fellow-laborer, "I'm never tempted long; I just go."

When may a man be said to be dressed in borrowed plumes?—When he's tarred and feathered.

A diminutive attorney, named Else, once asked Jekyll, "Sir, I hear you have called me a pettifogging scoundrel?" "No, Sir, I never said you were a pettifogger or a scoundrel; but I did say you were little Else."

The previous question—What'll you drink?

Laid on the table—The cloth.

Passed to a third reading—Love letters.

Bills passed—Greenbacks.

Ordered to be printed—A kiss.

Seconding the motion—Second hand to the pendulum.

Offered under suspension of the (fe)rule—A school-boy's apology.

Committee of the (W)hole—Hoosick Tunnel contractors.

Foreign Relations—Stories by a Cousin-German.

"That was greedy of you, Tommy, to eat your little sister's share of the cake."

"You told me, ma, that I was always to take her part," said Tommy.

What is every body doing at the same time?—Growing old.

"I have passed through great hard-ships," as the schooner said after sailing through a fleet of iron-clads.

Polite smoker, at side of railway car: "Allow me to assist you to a-light." Severe old lady—"Thank you, I do not smoke!"

Little Frank was taught that every one was made of dust. One day he was watching the dust in the street as the wind whirled it in eddies. "What are you thinking of?" asked his mother. "Oh," said Frank, with a serious face, "I thought that the dust looked as though there was going to be another little boy."

"Is Mrs. Blinkins at home?" asked Mr. Saunders of the Irish girl who answered his ring at the door. "Yes, I blave she is, Sir." "Is she engaged?" "An' is it engaged, you say? Faix, an' I can't tell you, Sir; but she kissed Mr. Tinent last evening as if she had never seen the like uv him, and it's engaged I blave they are, Sir."

QUESTIONABLE PEOPLE—School-teachers and those who get up catechisms.

When is iron the most ironical?—When it's a railing.

An old bachelor, after examining the fashion-plates in the monthlies, gets off the following:

Little head and little bonnet!

Little pate, with nothing on it!

(One might say "with nothing in it,"

But that you charm me every minute;)

Little lady, now I know

Why maidens let their ringlets grow;

For otherwise—as bonnets go—

Their heads would freeze, and "that is so!"

Little waist and monstrous flounces!

How the silk sea waves and bounces!

How the hooping billows quiver

Like a lovely rustling river!

Oh, wondrous water-silk sea!

What whalebones in your depths must be!

What lots of gold—all wastefully

Squandered on you—bright silken sea!

"Lazy folks take the most pains." Mistake—glaziers take the most.

An orthodox clergyman, who delivered a lecture on the "Plurality of Worlds," was greatly shocked the next morning to see himself reputed as advocating a "plurality of wives."

Black Guipure Waist.

THIS waist can be made of black or white figured lace or muslin, and can be worn over either black or colored low-necked dresses. The original is of black guipure, gathered slightly at the bottom, and set into a belt an inch and a half in width. The trimming consists of two bands of satin ribbon, an inch and a half wide, running over the shoulders from the front to the back; these are cut in points on either side, for which notches, one-fifth of an inch in length, are made in the ribbon two-fifths of an inch apart, after which the corners are turned over on the wrong side and fastened together. The middle of the ribbon is then covered with bead and bugle lace two inches and a half wide, the design of which is given in Fig. 43. The bottom of the sleeves is finished with a similar trimming. The neck, front, and top of the sleeves are trimmed with ribbon an inch and a quarter wide, cut in points, and trimmed in a similar manner. The belt is of black satin ribbon an inch and a half wide, with broad sash ends behind. A rosette, formed of pointed black satin ribbon, finishes the belt in front, and another is set on the neck.

BREAD-WORK.

SEVERAL years ago, as we were standing talking to a friend at a street corner, a little girl with a basket on her arm came up to our side, and, in the usual manner of a match girl, held up her petty wares for our inspection. At first glance we took them for Parian vases and baskets, and being otherwise engaged at the moment, were just turning away with indifference when the child said—"I made them, ladies; they're bread-work."

ciating so homely an article with fancy-work presented itself.

"Yes, ma'am, we make them out of bread, my mother and I, and sell them easily at three shillings a piece."

Our curiosity was now fully aroused to know how the delicate, tiny flowers and buds which, on examination, appeared to be so well done, and grouped so tastefully, were ever manufactured from such unpromising material. So by the offer of a liberal sum, and the purchase of one of the little bouquets, we obtained from the child a tolerably clear account of the process which subsequent practice proved to be reliable. We do not doubt that it will be new to most of our readers as it was to us, and therefore will proceed to give the simple directions.

Take a small portion of very white, fresh bread (it should be moist rather than dry and crumbling), and with very clean hands take a little piece between the finger and thumb, and press it out thin and flat.

Have ready a small piece of the fine white wire used in wax-flower making, put a little lump of the bread on the end, and mould it with the fingers like an elongated pin's head.

Now take the flattened piece of bread, which should be thin and smooth, and about the size of a ten cent piece; curl it around in a funnel shape, just as one would make a paper bag. Through this the wire may be passed, letting the little ball on the end form a centre, and the bread can be pressed firmly around the stem.

BLACK GUIPURE WAIST.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XVIII., Fig. 43.

This, if done properly, will show a good imitation miniature of an Egyptian lily (calla).

Next a rose may be formed by making the petals first, in a somewhat similar style; that is, by pressing out the tiny pieces of bread into a round shape, and then having moulded a small lump upon the end of a piece of wire (larger than in the lily) to serve for a foundation, begin to put on the petals in the same way that a wax rose is formed; the bread being so pliable is easily pressed and moulded into shape.

Various other miniature flowers, such as noon sleepers, phlox, or small lilies with clover leaves, ivy, etc., may be produced. These are not elaborately made as are wax-flowers, but with as light and delicate a touch as possible.

When about a dozen flowers and a few leaves are finished, they may be grouped together by taking a lump of dough and sticking it into the little vase, so as to fill up the top, and the stems can then be stuck into it so as to group the flowers compactly together. Or if a basket is chosen to hold them, it can be filled in the same manner with the soft dough, the use of the latter being merely to hold up the stems firmly.

In a short time the bread and dough will both become hard, and when covered with a little glass shade present quite a pleasing appearance, closely resembling the ordinary Parian ware. No one would imagine that the material is only bread.

Stiff bread-dough will answer quite as well as the baked bread, and is perhaps easier to mould.

GETTING MARRIED.

AMERICAN parents affect a great deal of horror at the system the French practice in getting husbands for their daughters. This, which is termed the mariage de convenance, consists in treating nubile girls as if in pairing they had no more right to choose their partners than cattle-breeders allow their heifers. Here, however, the comparison ends; for cattle-breeders all over the world have a judicious regard to vigor of race, suitable age, and other harmonies, while parents in France exclude these prudential considerations, and introduce a new element in the coupling of their offspring. Waiving all reference to equality of years, purity of blood, and sympathy of mind and temper, they merely insist upon the possession by either one or the other, or both, of money. Thus the old and decrepit are often united to the young and blooming, and the pretended union by marriage not seldom brings together two so discordant in sentiment, that the only harmony between them is the mutual agreement to disagree. The money, however, secures the pot au feu, which in modern France seems to be all that is desired, soothed though it may be by the discord of its partakers.

American parents may well be horrified at the French system of marriage, which outrages natural instinct, produces mutual disgust, and leads inevitably to misery and crime. Is it not, however, just possible that they themselves, unconsciously it is hoped, may be, in marrying their children, pursuing a plan not unlike that of the French, of which they express so great a horror?

It is true that the particular individual is not always pointed out by the mother to her daughter as the husband to whom she, willing or unwilling, must plight her troth. The marriageable girl—we speak of her, of course, who belongs to that circle which arrogates to itself the title of “best society”—has certainly a kind of choice of her partner for life; but in the United States it is as much restricted to the particular class as in France it is to the single person. This class may be qualified, for want of any other distinctive character, as that of the party-goers—a set of young men whose parents have, or are supposed to have, the means of allowing them a supply of dress-coats, varnished boots, and white kid gloves, and of affording the prodigal wear and tear to which the nightly balls and parties of the season expose them. To this must be added the waste of time, and of intellectual and of physical vigor, which are the inevitable results of social dissipation, and unfit those who indulge in it for the serious business of life. All this, moreover, implies a disposition to, or a capability of expense, which commands especially the party-goer to mothers with marriageable daughters. Even should a wide choice be conceded to our young girls of fashion, their natural tastes and inclinations have been so thickly varnished by the artifices of a meretricious education, and suppressed by the frivolities of fashionable life to which they have such an early introduction, that, having no appreciation for better men or sympathy with them, they would not care to look for other husbands than those included within the narrow circle alluded to. Here they find those who, like themselves, are merely painted puppets of show. Such it requires no great effort to please, no force of intellect to impress, no culture to attract, no sentiment to attach. A little smearing of paint, a cunning milliner to adjust the flimsy drapery, here a gay bit of ribbon and there a glistening bead, managing parents to place them on the stage of fashion, a touch of the springs, and that is all. Thus puppet meets puppet; they advance and retreat, fly and pursue, flutter and languish, whirl in the waltz and agitate in the polka, until finally they fall exhausted into each other's arms, and the whole ends with a matrimonial tableau at some fashionable Grace Church or other.

Of course, no good comes out of such marriages. Neither husband nor wife can be fit for their marital duties, and as for their parental, it were devoutly to be wished that they might never be called upon to exercise them.

On the mere ground of worldly policy it is easy to show that fashionable mothers are making a fatal mistake in thus educating and disposing of their daughters in marriage. It would be easy to prove that not one out of ten of the constant young party-goers ever comes to good. It is not in the fashionable ball-room that Young America is acquiring that discipline necessary for the vigorous work of life. It is in the fields, the work-shop, the counting-house, and the schools of law, medicine, and theology that our athletes are exercising. To them will belong the future prizes of life. For such we commend mothers to educate their daughters. With husbands like these they will be more likely to have connubial happiness, and to secure that worldly prosperity which parents seem to consider still more important.

Let mothers trust the making up of their list of guests to their husbands, and not take the stereotyped one of Mr. Brown. Ask them to bring from their warehouses, their offices, and counting-rooms their young apprentices, students, and clerks. Their entertainment will cost less than that of the “party-goers,” for they will be satisfied with gentle words and a simple hospitality. They will come too with a guarantee of their worth, for they will have given proofs of probity and intelligence, and of a proper respectability, of which the young men of fashion generally offer no evidence stronger than that given by their tailors, bootmakers, and glovers.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Lavinia.

MY DEAR LAVINIA,—You will remember that at Mrs. Reservoir's, last week, when I saw Steerforth Rochester dancing with a very young and lovely partner, I asked you with some feeling who she was, and said, warmly, that I was amazed, and wondered if she had no mother or brother.

“Certainly,” you answered, with surprise, “there is Mrs. Almond sitting with Mrs. Pendragon.”

“But does she know Rochester?”

“Of course she does. We all know him. He is one of the handsomest and most agreeable men and best partners in society; and as for his manners, why, even you, Mr. Bachelor, will acknowledge that they are charming.”

“And his morals?”

“What have we to do with his morals? If he behave properly with us we must be satisfied. It would be very indecorous for us to appear to know any thing of the immoralities of gentlemen.”

Mr. Rochester came up at this moment, and asked you for a turn, and away you went in the waltz, and away went my mind in a whirl of reflections.

By-the-by, just after you left me, I saw your friend Delia dancing gayly with that pleasant young Thurtell who murdered her younger brother. Now, don't start when you read this, for, upon the whole, I am not sure that it was her younger brother—possibly it was only the younger brother of somebody else. And as I saw you winding in the embrace of Rochester through the sweet mazes of the dance which the music wove, I said to myself: “Lavinia would not dance with him, I am sure, if he had murdered her sister.” Then I could not help wondering whether you knew, or had never heard, that he had murdered somebody else's younger sister. Did I write, murdered? Well, I will not refine upon words. Let us say, destroyed, if you prefer. But, Lavinia, if you, and women like you, delight in the attentions of Steerforth Rochester, and dance with him willingly, and countenance him gladly, is it not a premium upon murder; and don't you become an accessory after the fact? If you prefer to say ruin and woman, instead of murder and man, we will not quarrel about a word.

I was so much pleased with the ball at Mrs. Reservoir's that I, too, am thinking of giving an entertainment; and as my rooms are entirely too small, I thought, as the spring was coming, that I would have it at that pleasant old inn, Rosamond's Bower. It is old-fashioned, but that is all the better, for my design is to ask some old-fashioned company. And I wish you, dear Lavinia, to be Lady Patroness at my fête, and decide difficult questions of invitation for me. For I must be very select, and selection is by no means an easy task under the circumstances. For instance, I want to ask either King Charles II. or Melancthon. It is an awkward choice, and I should like to invite both, but it is out of the question. We must decide between them, and which shall it be? I am afraid that Melancthon is a dreadful sober-sides, while we know that Charles is a most courtly and charming gentleman. To be sure, it seems to me that I have heard stories—and as this is to be a party of young girls, perhaps—But then, as you said to me in speaking of your partner, Rochester, “What have we to do with his morals? If he behave properly with us we must be satisfied. It would be very indecorous for us to appear to know any thing of King Charles's immoralities.”

Ah, very well; we seem now to be coming upon a principle of selection. We will ask King Charles II., and Mistress Eleanor Gwynn, and the Duchess of Cleveland, and—but I seem to see you shake your head. What is the difficulty, my dear Lavinia? Surely you are superior to prejudice! I know that Mistress Gwynn was formerly an orange girl; but here are the Tubbertons and the Pounds and the Hundred-weights, who were all orange boys; that is, they sold fruits and other good things, not by the basket, indeed, or singly, like Mistress Eleanor, but the trade was quite the same, and that it was wholesale makes no difference. It was not always wholesale. Hezekiah Tubberton used to sell pats of butter and half pounds of sugar. I will not insult you by supposing that you can object to Eleanor Gwynn because she used to earn an honest living. And as for the Duchess of Cleveland and Madam Carwell or the Duchess of Portsmouth—but why do you shake your head again and look offended? I know that they are not exactly Charles's wives. But let us look at it a moment.

You will not forget what you have already said of the fascinating Mr. Steerforth Rochester, that if his manners are agreeable his morals are not for our investigation. But certainly you do not complain of the manners or the beauty of Mistress Gwynn and the Duchess of Portsmouth? Why, the Duchess is of a fine old French family, and her manners and her accomplishments are very remarkable. I assure you she is not less fascinating for a woman than your friend and partner Mr. Rochester is for a man. Her dancing, her singing, her languages, her refined repose, her delightful ease, her exquisite toilette—my dear Lavinia, what would you have? Why, she is the very pearl of people for Rosamond's Bower. Upon what possible ground could I fail to invite her? and what questionable conduct it would be toward King Charles himself, to ask him and omit his particular friends and favorites in society! You must really give me a better reason than a shake of your head.

Now, my dear Lavinia, I seem to hear you asking me whether I do not know perfectly well why you are unwilling to invite Mistress Eleanor Gwynn and her companions, and why you will decline to come to the party yourself if they are to be present? I will answer you frankly, my dear young lady; and I say that I should suppose I knew the reason if I had not seen you whirling down Mrs. Reservoir's rooms in the embrace of Mr. Steerforth Rochester. For if it be the character of Mistress Gwynn which makes it impossible for you to ask her to any party of which you are the especial patroness, or even to attend one at which she is present, what were you doing in Mr. Rochester's arms? I wish to remind you of those words of wisdom, “What have we to do with his morals?” and I wish to ask if the morals of Mr. Steerforth Rochester are not to be considered, why those of Mistress Eleanor Gwynn are brought into court? Besides, you have preferred King Charles II. to Melancthon upon the general ground of manners; and if you have no moral objection to the king, may I respectfully ask what is the moral objection you have to his madam? Miss Lavinia, you have lost your right to object to Eleanor Gwynn when you willingly invite Charles Stuart and dance with Steerforth Rochester.

And there is one thing more. Is it only murderers of her younger brother that Delia ought not to dance with? Would she smile upon them—provided always that their manners were good—if they had merely destroyed the younger brother of some poor sewing-girl or servant-maid? Suppose it were the younger sister? In one word, does she think that murderers ought not to be welcomed at Mrs. Reservoir's balls; and, if so, is that the only crime that should exclude people? I observe, Miss Lavinia, that you ladies are very severe upon those of your own sex who fall. I have known Mrs. Tilbury's virtue to be in such sublime insurrection over Biddy's misconduct that I have been very much encouraged in my hopes for the moral regeneration of society. But scarcely had Mrs. Tilbury summarily driven the “vile jade” and the “abominable” something that I need not particularize, from her house, than I have known her to compose her ruffled plumage as soon as possible, ascend to the drawing-room, and, with her most polished and engaging manner, receive and entertain Mr. Steerforth Rochester. Mrs. Tilbury knew his reputation. If Biddy were not his victim, other Biddies were. Yet she was all sunshine to him—all wrath to Biddy. I said that Delia's dancing with a murderer was a premium upon murder—and I say that Mrs. Tilbury's treatment of Rochester was a premium upon vice.

And how is it with you, Miss Lavinia? You are ready to invite King Charles because we must not trouble ourselves with gentlemen's morals if their manners are correct, and you recoil from Mistress Eleanor Gwynn, however charming her manners, because you dislike her morals. Good Heavens! if Nell Gwynn is guilty, what is King Charles? My complaint of you is, that you betray one of your own sex in smiling upon her betrayer. And you do it constantly; you do it consciously. Society is wringing its ridiculous hands and crying “Oh dear!” at crimes which it promotes. You teach this kind of man to despise you when you do not make him feel the contempt which a woman ought to feel for him. You are morally guilty of the offense when your manner shows the offender that he is still welcome. You are morally responsible for the next Mistress Gwynn when you bid King Charles to your party, and do not hesitate to waltz with him. A tipsy man claims your promise for the German, and you yield “because you can not discriminate.” I hope he tumbles down with you upon the floor. If you women will make yourselves puppets and toys and sugar-candy, you have no right to expect men to take you at a higher value than you place upon yourselves.

My dear Lavinia, I have not actually had this conversation with you, for I am only writing to you. But I did see your gracious treatment of Steerforth Rochester, and you know, as well as I do, that he is what King Charles was, and that the reasoning which makes it honorable and proper for a young woman to receive the one would prevent her from scorning the other. I insist, further, that Mistress Eleanor Gwynn is no worse than the king, and that Mr. Steerforth Rochester's mistress is no worse than he. I should like to know why Lord Willoughby d'Eresby was permitted to be an honorable officer of the Queen's Court in England, while the whole kingdom would have shuddered if the Queen had received at her levees a certain lady who lived in a lodge near London? She had done no wrong which Lord d'Eresby had not done: or if she had, it was at his solicitation.

At least, my dear Lavinia, you women ought to stand by each other; and if I am ever married—which will be when the man comes down from the moon to be my groomsman—and if ever Mrs. Bachelor gives a party, and proposes to invite King Charles II., or Mr. Steerforth Rochester, or Lord Willoughby d'Eresby, for once in my life I shall be resolute, and I shall say, “My dear, not one of those men shall be bidden to our house without their Mistress Eleanor Gwynns. For if those ladies are unfit guests, certainly those gentlemen are not less so.” And when you are married, Lavinia, if your husband will say the same thing, and insist upon it, the atmosphere will begin to clear wonderfully.

Your real friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

MILLINERS' OPENINGS.

SOME of our most exclusive milliners have displayed at their early openings a variety of beautiful bonnets, designed to be worn when the first spring days arrive. As we informed our readers, after taking a preliminary glimpse at the coming novelties in the wholesale houses, the new bonnets are not larger than those of last season, the diadem is the leading feature, and the Fanchon still prevails. The impression formed then has been confirmed by a thorough inspection of the elegant novelties exhibited at the openings, and selected with great care for a most fastidious class of customers. A graceful new shape, called the Metternich, consists of a large round crown entirely without a brim, except such as is formed by the diadem. This crown bonnet is worn very far forward, the diadem being placed over the forehead, and the crown covering the top of the head, leaving the back hair without drapery.

BLACK LACE.

Black lace promises to be a favorite material for spring bonnets. A single piece of Chantilly covers the frame. Many bonnets are entirely made of lace, the head-piece, the fall at the back, and the barbes being all in one. It is sometimes embossed with steel or with straw. Another elegant and expensive style is silk embroidery of tiny flowers, forget-me-nots, and heliotropes, on the coiffure and barbes. A thread of steel or of gilt, so fine as to be almost invisible, glistens unexpectedly amidst the fine meshes of a gossamer barbe. Black Malines, of smaller meshes, and thinner, if possible, than tulle, is powdered with steel that glitters like gems. We notice also that black lace, either thread or blonde, is used for trimming bonnets of every description, white straws, chips, and Neapolitans, both gray and black, and also forms a part of colored tulle and crape hats. It is quilled on the diadem, is made into rosettes and bows, with long barbe ends over the back, and covers the narrow ribbon-strings that fall in the front solely for ornament. A great deal of colored lace is used, but it does not supersede the black, because it is not brought out of such handsome quality; and although it is desirable to have all the trimmings of a bonnet harmonize, yet colored lace is not looked upon with favor by people of taste.

An elastic cord, passing under the chignon, is necessary to keep the new bonnets in proper position. If preferred, narrow strings of poult de soie ribbon are used to tie at the throat, but it is considered more stylish to dispense with them altogether, or fasten them at the back. The lace over-strings that accompany almost every bonnet hang loose almost to the belt, where they are caught by a rosette, or bow, a spray of flowers, or an ornament of steel or pearl. The throat is thus left bare, a fashion that we shall appreciate more highly when the heat of summer sets in. A fall of lace, or a scarf, is attached to nearly all bonnets.

The delicate Malines lace is brought out in every shade of color, and is preferred to the coarser dotted nets. It is used for scarfs and mantilla veils, and frequently forms the whole bonnet. It is very much admired when sprinkled with tiny specks like diamond dust or frost.

A brilliant shade of yellow is called butter-cup color, and is very becoming to brunettes. We have spoken of the dark rich shade of red called Sultan. Garnets are used with this color. The Metternich green, so much in favor for evening, is found to be very trying to the complexion by daylight unless relieved by lace. In conjunction with black lace it makes a suitable bonnet for spring, and is so pretty that means will be found to make it becoming.

ORNAMENTS AND FLOWERS.

Among the prettiest ornaments are those of pearl, not white alone, but light shaded tints and rich colors as dark as maroon. There are flowers with pearl petals and gilt stamens, and butterflies with quivering rings of colors as varied as an opal. Pendants of pearl and of straw droop from the diadem and the crown of bonnets. Garnets are introduced among the trimmings. They look too conspicuous to be popular; but we have seen a few at the best houses, tastefully arranged and softened by lace. Steel and gilt are used together with very good effect, and the steel is desirable alone, but not the gilt. Occasionally a little jet is seen, and one of our most tasteful milliners says that we are not yet prepared to do without it altogether. Handsome crystal flowers vibrate on slender stems among metallic leaves; drooping sprays of velvet and feather flowers on gilt tendrils, butter-cups with long, trailing grasses, and clusters of the smallest flowers without foliage, such as mignonnette and verbenas, are displayed in every window. The small flowers are used on coronets, while the bonnet is trimmed at the crown and sides with a large scarlet poppy, a white lily, the brilliant cactus, or a tulip. Daisy wreaths are also still in favor, and autumn leaves, especially those purpled by the frost.

FRENCH BONNETS.

The most notable bonnet where all are attractive is a diadem Fanchon of exquisitely-fine black lace. A vine and leaves of highly-polished cut steel that will not tarnish ornament the diadem. The coiffure is embroidered with steel. Thistle balls of jet and steel are half concealed among the lace and a fringe as fine as thistle-down that border the bonnet. The narrow strings are of fringed ribbon. Wide lace barbes, fringed to match the coiffure. The price of this elegant bonnet is $60.

Another of black lace, marked $55, is a solid piece of thread lace on a Fanchon frame. Forget-me-nots with gilt stamens are embroidered with silk on the centre-piece and barbes. Blue and gray velvet leaves are on the coronet, and a small cluster of them hold the lace strings together.

A white chip bonnet, made by Madame Hoffé, of Paris, is in imitation of one worn by the Princess Metternich. It is of the shape named after the Princess, a large crown and turned-up diadem brim. A quilling of narrow blonde lace edges the diadem, and a wreath of half-ripe wheat is along the entire edge of the front. A green beetle, glistening like enamel, is in the centre of the wreath. Narrow Metternich green ribbon forms a rosette on the back of the crown. A cluster of wild flowers is set on the left side. Lace strings over ribbon. Price $50.

One of Madame Virot's bonnets is of white Malines tulle, puffed over a thin frame. A wide fall of blonde lace is joined below the chin with a white satin rosette. A wreath of dark green leaves extends along the front edge of the diadem and around the bonnet. Sprays of lily of the valley sprinkled with crystal dew-drops are outside on the left. Price $50.

A tiny bonnet, a mere coiffure indeed, is made of a beautifully-wrought pattern of white blonde lace. The barbes and head-piece are all in one, and are fastened to a wide-spreading diadem of forget-me-nots. There is scarcely any frame to the bonnet, and handsomely-dressed hair will be plainly discernible through the lace. This is also $50.

A violet crape has the material plain over the frame. Violet tulle is puffed over the back and forms long, scarf-like strings. Three pipings of satin are studded with gilt, and fall in scallops on the chignon. The bandeau is of steel and gilt with shirred crape above it. A cluster of violets in the face trimming reaches over the edge of the bonnet and among the strings.

A blue crape, made similarly to the one just described, has an arched bandeau of pearl flowers over the forehead, and at the back a kerchief of blonde lace with pearl pendants on each scallop of the lace.

A very stylish black Neapolitan has a high-pointed diadem of straw and quilled lace, on which is a wreath of pearl butter-cups of perfect coloring. A wide fall of black lace is open behind to disclose the chignon, and is connected with the strings in front. Narrow ribbon of the butter-cup color beneath the lace streamers. The bonnet is held secure by an elastic ribbon under the back hair. Price $45.

A fancy straw of graceful shape is trimmed with three narrow bands of ribbon of the Sultan color. A straw bow in the centre of a velvet band is placed over the forehead. Large cactus on a straw stem with trailing buds at the side. Fall of black lace open in the back forming a kind of mantilla veil at the sides. Lace strings with rosette of Sultan ribbon.

A simple and graceful bonnet for a young blonde is a Fanchon of white-frosted Malines. On the coronet is a quilling of tulle bound with white satin. The tulle is puffed over the frame, each puff being separated by satin pipings, edged with narrow blonde lace. The inside trimming is a ruche of lace, over which is a wide bandeau of blue forget-me-nots sparkling with crystal dew-drops. A cluster of moss-roses on the left extend among the forget-me-nots. Blue and pink together, the Pompadour colors, are very stylish, and becoming to a fair young face. Price $20.

A steel-colored Neapolitan braid is trimmed with a wide fringe of steel balls on black lace. Leaves slightly turned by the frost form the diadem.

A spring bonnet made of Metternich green silk is covered with three rows of black lace quilled on. Daisies of the same shade of green were in every scallop of the diadem. Narrow green strings covered with lace.

One of the most harmonious designs is a white Malines embroidered with silk and puffed on a Fanchon frame. A quilling of tulle bound with white satin rests against the diadem, and an elder wreath extends across the front and around the bonnet. On the forehead are merely the leaves, the blossoms are on the left, and the dark berries on the right. A feathery blonde edge surrounds the long lappets that are caught together with a rosette. Price $12.

A coquettish bonnet is of white lace over a thin frame. A green velvet diadem covered with blonde forms the face trimming, against which rests on the outside a wreath of mingled flowers with foliage drooping at the side. A shell rosette of green velvet is set on the left. A pearl butterfly just emerging from the chrysalis state trembles on the quivering stem of a flower at the back. A mantilla veil of white net spotted with satin droops from the bonnet. Price $30.

An elegant bonnet was made of satin pipings of the butter-cup color on a black foundation. A large satin bow was placed directly at the back, from which fell a bunch of butter-cups with their long trailing leaves. On the diadem were bows of steel and gold. A plain English straw was neatly trimmed with a bunch of Sultan red leaves at the back, beneath which fell wide black lace, turned back en revers, and draping the sides of the bonnet. Inside was shirred silk, of the Sultan shade, surmounted with a velvet bandeau studded with garnets.

These are a few of the handsomest bonnets of the season. There are many others at lower prices that are also graceful and pretty. Close-fitting Neapolitans, studded with steel or jet, may be bought for four or five dollars; and with the addition of a little lace and a few flowers, and some straw ornaments, any lady of taste can make for herself a spring bonnet at very trifling expense. If white straws are preferred, violet and Metternich green ribbons are arranged in loops over the crown and coronet, together with a few straw leaves and large pendant ornaments at the ends of the long strings. A ruffle of black lace is a pretty finish to ribbon strings.

ROUND HATS.

Very few round hats have been displayed at the openings. It is rather early for them, as they are more especially adapted to the sea-side and country; besides which the hatters have, by their large importations, almost taken this branch of the trade out of the milliners' hands. The Spanish and Marie Antoinette styles, with high sloping crowns, are the newest shapes, and are pretty for watering-places and riding-hats; but another shape, with a lower crown and turned-up brim, will be more popular for the city. The rims are rolling or caught up at the sides, and faced with colored satin or velvet. Straw cords and tassels and straw passementerie form the trimmings. A few turbans, sloping downward from the front, are seen; and a regular cap with visor is made of leaves or shells of silk. Lace strings more than a yard long fall from the sides, are lapped in front, and tied behind like a fichu.

DRESS-MAKERS' OPENING.

At the spring opening of French dresses by one of our leading modistes we were surprised to notice the entire absence of the redingote or polonaise. This garment is, however, in such favor here that it will not be abandoned this season, though it is no longer cut so full as the original pattern, but is half adjusted to the figure by side bodies, and is worn with a fichu or scarf.

All the short suits exhibited had two skirts, the under one cut in the way we have lately described, and bordered with a founce or with three narrow frills. The upper skirt is gored flat in front, with the back widths fulled in at the sides, and puffed or festooned to give a very full appearance, as of the tournure or bustle. There is no longer any doubt that the panier style is about to be revived, or that it will be generally worn, since it is precisely the opposite of the scant drapery over small crinoline that has so long been in favor.

The most admired short suit was a chameleon silk of beautifully blended rose color and mauve. The lower skirt was of inch-wide stripes, a solid brown alternating with a changeable stripe of the same width. A pleated ruffle at the bottom was of the chameleon silk cut in squares and bound with the stripes. The upper skirt was trimmed with a narrower ruffle, and festooned in the back. A half-adjusted basque, with long mantilla fronts, was the over-garment. The price was $300, with material for waist and sleeves.

A summer suit was a mohair skirt of green and white stripes a half inch wide. The over-dress, of solid green poplin, was sleeveless, with a square neck disclosing the front of the striped corsage. Two large box-pleats fell loosely from the back of the neck into the skirt. A quilling of the same surrounded the over-garment. Coat-sleeves of striped mohair.

A very elegant trained dress was of steel-gray silk, trimmed with a wide fold of the same piped with satin, on which large rosettes were set at intervals. These rosettes were of the silk, double bias and pleated, and in the centre was a cluster of grapes and leaves of polished steel. The side widths were fulled into the back in a kind of fan-shaped quilling, and caught with a rosette. The sleeves were close, the cuffs ornamented with a rosette. On the plain, high waist was a wide fringe of steel balls arranged like a bertha. A narrower fringe formed the collar. The sash at the back was trimmed with three rosettes on each streamer, and fringed. A small bow with sash ends was on the bosom.

A black silk, made with a long train, was trimmed on each seam with the new appliqué flowers. A large pansy, perfectly formed, of black satin, bound with velvet, was at the bottom of each seam of the skirt, the satin stem and spray continuing up the seam to the belt. Price, ready made, $200.

An evening dress of pink gauze, with white hair-line stripes, had a full train trimmed with a bias fold of pink satin put on to simulate a long tunic. This fold was bordered by a novelty in fringe made of quill shavings. It is lustrous and prettily shaded. Two rounding puffs at the knee were separated by rouleaux of satin. The corsage was not made up. A bertha of tulle puffs and quill fringe accompanied the dress. Price $275.

A pretty short suit of violet serge was trimmed with fluted ruffles of silk. A chain made of links of white and purple silk fell from the belt to a small pouch for the kerchief. A similar chain festooned the skirt behind. The wrapping was a scarf with pelerine ends.

Scarf ends attached to basques were brought round below the jacket and fastened behind. The upper skirt was festooned through this in the panier style.

There were graceful burnouses for evening wear, with folded hoods and openings for the arms. A light material of silk and wool was chain stitched in delicate colors and fringed. Others were of black cashmere embroidered or braided with gilt, and fringed.

PERSONAL.

THE Hon. J. ROSS BROWNE, United States Minister to China, is spending a few days in New York, with old personal friends. He will not depart for the honorable and responsible field of duty to which he has been called by his Government until after the arrival of Mr. BURLINGAME. Mr. BROWNE's contributions to the literature of the country have been universally admired. His official Reports, published by Congress, on the mineral resources and products of the auriferous regions, exhibit industry and practical ability of the highest order. We doubt not that his course in China will develop superior diplomatic capacity, and secure for him the confidence of the Chinese and of his own countrymen.

—AGATHA STATES, nee MANDEVILLE, the American Prima Donna, whose successful debut at Pike's Opera House has drawn from all the critics such warm commendation, comes from a musical family, and the hereditary talent of two generations promises to culminate in her. With great obstacles to the pursuit of her studies (of a private nature), and under the most trying domestic difficulties, she has fairly won her way to the front rank of great artists. Her present engagement with Mr. HARRISON will give the public of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston the opportunity to indorse the verdict of the most critical audiences of Europe as to her merit.

—EZRA CORNELL has purchased for his University the library of the late Professor ANTHON, containing 7000 volumes of valuable books in science, literature, and art. Ex-Senator WHITE, the President of the University, has gone abroad to make purchases of about 25,000 more volumes, and to select scientific apparatus for the institution.

—The Rev. Dr. BISSELL, recently elected Bishop of Vermont, has for many years past been rector of Trinity Church, Geneva. He is a modest, industrious, devoted parish clergyman, of good abilities, and good executive talent, and possesses those qualities that will make him greatly respected and beloved as a bishop.

—Mr. Speaker COLFAX's receptions in Washington are very pleasant. He is the only public man who receives thousands of ladies and gentlemen, and says to them, after an introduction, "This is my mother!" She is his constant companion, and is only seventeen years the oldest. She has put on the chameleon silk and the cap with blue ribbons, to receive the multitude that flock in masses to do homage to her son. Pride half slumbers in her bosom, but love is vigilant and wide-awake. There is no metallic impression on her countenance—a genuine, heart-felt welcome is extended to all who go to pay their respects to her idol. So the people come and go, and wonder why Speaker COLFAX's receptions are unlike all others.

—MARK TWAIN, who has just sailed for California, has never felt exactly right about that sailing excursion up the Mediterranean, where they had so many pious people for passengers, else he would not have been so spiteful as to say, that the only amusements they had on board were prayer-meetings and "seven up."

—Of the impeachment managers in the House of Representatives, Mr. BINGHAM, of Ohio, is a man of 60, slight figure, thin and whitened hair, impulsive, earnest, shrewd, and full of resources; one of the ablest men in the House. Mr. BOUTWELL is noticeable for fine eyes, a well-knit frame, raven hair, and a calmness of feature and manner that baffles speculation as to what passes in his brain. Mr. STEVENS, whom Judge BLACK, in his recent speech before the Supreme Court, pronounced as intelligent a head and shoulders above any Republican in the House, is tall, spare, and firm; his features, unchangeable as marble, and stern as unyielding purpose can make them, at any period of his life would have attracted notice, but now, when disease has made them pale, and suffering has given them an expression of anguish, the spectator looks with wonder that a mere determination of will can bear him through scenes like this, and seemingly cheat the grave of a victim. General LOGAN is short, stout, swarthy, with jet black hair, and looks the strong, courageous, stubborn man he is. When in the army and near an enemy it was his custom to go the rounds of his pickets at midnight. The result was he always knew his ground, had his pickets further advanced than most other officers, fought like a bull-dog, and was never whipped. Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, is 40, has curly hair, sprinkled with gray, is logical, clear-headed, and perhaps the best lawyer in the House. Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania, is the handsome man of the managers, slight, with long, curly hair, tinged with gray, and has the appearance of a good liver and man of the world. General BUTLER's face, figure, and manner have too often been made the subject of newspaper description to render a repetition necessary. Such is a photograph of the Impeachers.

—Since the PRINCE OF WALES has arrived at that period when he can wear the full and noble beard, the loyal people of the kingdom asseverate that he looks, about the face, quite like the British Lion!

—The Rev. Dr. THOMPSON, of the Broadway Tabernacle, ministers to a people renowned for works of liberality. Last year the contributions of his congregation amounted to $36,000. He has 540 church-members, of whom 60 were added last year.

—The KING OF GREECE is the son of one king, the nephew of another, and has an Emperor for a father-in-law; yet when the weather is pleasant the young man and his wife walk to church of a Sunday just as we do in New York; that is to say, those of us who have neither coupés nor coupons.

—BISMARCK and Mr. GREELEY resemble each other in at least one respect—both sleep in church. BISMARCK snores. Fact!

—BRIGHAM YOUNG's notion of morals at the East is somewhat of the "confidence" sort. In his annual message to the Legislature of Utah he alludes to the admission of the Territory as a State, saying that Congress would do a simple act of justice in "laying aside all narrowness of opinion and bigotry, and granting the admission!" BRIGHAM has had occasion, during the past winter, to mourn the decease of five of his wives, from pneumonic affections. Such are the mournful consequences of being married too much.

—The Hon. Mr. WARD HUNT, Mr. DISRAELI's new Chancellor of the Exchequer, is described by the London Spectator as "a strong-headed man and a lucid speaker, with great influence among squires, but a man who under our imbecile system of promotion by seniority, is rather young (forty-three) for so high an office."

—Thus looks JOHN BRIGHT as he appears now: He is a hale man of fifty-six, about the size of H. WARD BEECHER, though stouter; has a face of the finest English type, full and open, with gray side-whisker, and a healthy, ruddy complexion. The mouth, chin, and lower jaw express great firmness and vigor. The nose is full, nostrils broad, while the space is broad between the clear, full gray eyes, which appear capable of great expression. In repose they are mild and kindly. Both brow and head are broad, full, and arched high in the coronal region. The whole figure is cast in a massive mould. He looks the orator and leader of men, even when silent; and there is in his presence itself a pervading sense of power. His manner is pleasant, grave, and cordial, yet not unmixed with a dash of hauteur and brusqueness that one can readily trace to his business and public life. The brusqueness is that of a busy man, while the hauteur is the natural consequence of contests in which he is not only leader, but himself so vital an element.

—For seven years longer, at least, the Astor House is to remain a hotel, a lease for that time having been taken by Captain REDINGTON STETSON, son of Mr. CHARLES A. STETSON, the original lessee. Captain STETSON was in many a hotly-contested battle during the late war, and bore himself right gallantly as became his name.

—Young Mr. TYNE has been gravely "admonished" by Bishop POTTER. Henceforth, if he has the hardihood to preach the Gospel outside the election-district or ward in which his church is situated, without "express permission" of some brother clergyman, he stands in danger of being deposed from the ministry. Just 130 years ago JOHN WESLEY was charged with the same offense—intrusion into other men's parishes. He replied in these memorable words:

"You ask, 'How is it that I assemble Christians who are none of my charge to sing psalms, and pray, and hear the Scriptures expounded; and think it hard to justify doing this in other men's parishes upon catholic principles?'"

"Permit me to speak plainly. If by catholic principles you mean any other than scriptural, they weigh nothing with me: I allow no other rule, whether of faith or practice, than the Holy Scriptures: but on scriptural principles I do not think it hard to justify whatever I do. God in Scripture commands me, according to my power, to instruct the ignorant, reform the wicked, confirm the virtuous. Man forbids me to do this in another's parish—that is, in effect, to do it at all, seeing I have now no parish of my own, nor probably ever shall. Whom, then, shall I hear—God or man? 'If it be just to obey man rather than God, judge you. A dispensation of the Gospel is committed to me; and woe is me if I preach not the Gospel.' But where shall I preach it upon the principles you mention? Why, not in Europe, Asia, Africa, or America; not in any of the Christian parts, at least, of the habitable earth. For all these are, after a sort, divided into parishes. If it be said, 'Go back, then, to the Heathens from whence you came,' nay, but neither could I now (on your principles) preach to them: for all the Heathens in Georgia belong to the parish either of Savannah or Frederica.

"Suffer me now to tell you my principles in this matter. I look upon all the world as my parish; thus far I mean that, in whatever part of it I am, I judge it meet, right, and my bounden duty to declare unto all that are willing to hear the glad tidings of salvation."

ALPHABET WITH VIGNETTES FOR POCKET HANDKERCHIEFS.—[SEE PAGE 373.]

Alphabet with Vignettes for Pocket Handkerchiefs.

THE tasteful alphabet on the preceding page is worked with embroidery cotton in satin stitch: application work being used for the vignette of the letter G. The vignettes may be used with different letters according as the embroiderer may desire.

Cravats and Collars.

WE give illustrations of a number of pretty cravats and collars, which may be varied to suit the taste of the wearer.

collar, and set on in front, as shown in the illustration. The muslin is cut away underneath the insertion. The cravat is fastened with a button and loop.

Cravat with Bow.—Fig. 41 gives the pattern of the ends. Arrange the Swiss muslin, insertion, lace, and needle-work as shown in the pattern, cut away the muslin underneath the insertion, lay the top in two pleats from × to ●, and fasten both ends under the bow on a double bias strip of muslin. The knot in the middle of the bow consists of a needle-work figure edged with a frill of lace. Set the bow and ends on the front of the collar, which is composed of four thicknesses of Swiss muslin cut straight.

Cravat with Ends.—This cravat consists of a bias strip of Swiss muslin, three-quarters of a yard long and an eighth of a yard wide, edged with narrow needle-work insertion and lace, and laid in three pleats through the middle. The ends are pointed, and trimmed with insertion three-quarters of an inch wide, needle-work application figures, and leaves of insertion and lace, two inches long and an inch and a half wide, as shown in the illustration.

Flower-Pot Cover.
MATERIALS: Brown or gray carriage leather, narrow worsted braid, light-brown fine silk cord, dark-brown crochet silk.
This flower-pot cover is simple, and is easily made of cheap materials.

Flower-Pot Cover.

Smoking Cap.

MATERIALS: Black velvet, silk, and lining silk, fine silk cord, black crochet silk, black silk tassel, wadding.

This pretty smoking cap is made of black embroidered velvet and silk, with a wadded and quilted silk lining. Cut from Fig. 37 five pieces of velvet, all of the same size; draw the design on each one, and work it with black crochet silk in satin and over stitch, as well as in herring bone, point russe, and knot stitch. Cut five pieces from Fig. 38, cover them with a puffing of silk; sew each piece to one of the velvet pieces from 32 to 33, and join them together from 32 to ●. Having thinly wadded and quilted the lining, sew it in the cap, cord the edge and seams, and put the tassel in the centre.

Talma for Young Girl.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XI., Fig. 13.

Smoking Jacket.
For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 22-25.

Bavette Cravat.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XVII., Fig. 42.

Cut a piece of carriage leather of the desired form and size: notch the top: sew the sides together, and trim it in the manner shown in the illustration, with narrow worsted braid arranged as a trellis, fastening the braid together where it crosses by means of a little figure worked in cross stitch with crochet silk. Face the top and bottom with a strip of carriage leather an inch and a half wide, and finish the top and bottom with silk cord, or with string beads, if preferred.

Walnut Yard Measure.

MATERIALS: Shell of a large walnut, light-green crochet silk, green ribbon half an inch wide, round whalebone, two large beads, two small rings, copal varnish.

Take the shell of a large walnut, carefully polish the inside, and hollow out the ends of each half, so that when they are closed a small circular orifice will remain. Make an opening in the side of one-half the walnut shell, two-thirds of an inch wide, and just deep enough for the ribbon to pass through easily. Take a round whalebone or stick, which must be half an inch longer than the walnut shell; put on each end a large bead, wound with green silk, and attach the ribbon for the measure in the middle, making fast the end. Wind the ribbon round the whalebone, and lay the latter in the half of the shell in which the opening has been made, and through which the end of the ribbon has been previously passed, then glue the shell together, and cover it with a coating of copal varnish. When the walnut shell is perfectly dry, inclose it in a netted cover of green crochet silk. In making this cover leave an opening at each end, and fasten a small ring thereon with button-hole stitch. An oblong ring is fastened on the end of the ribbon, and button-holed with green crochet silk.

Cravat with Ends.

Reed Ash Receiver.

Reed Ash Receiver.

This pretty ash receiver represents a bucket of reeds hooped with beads, which are also used to cover the wire handle. It is three inches high, and is two and a quarter inches in diameter at the top and an inch and a half at the bottom. A little brass basin is set in the bottom to receive the ashes. Cut a pasteboard foundation of the desired size, glue it together, set a scalloped rim round the top, and fit it to a pasteboard bottom. This done, cover the foundation with split reeds, glued in place, and put on the hoops, which are made by winding a thin split reed with silk strung with beads, in such a manner that the beads may lie on the outside of the reed, and the silk alone on the inside thereof. Put a wire ring on each side of the bucket, to which fasten the handle, which is made of wire wound with beads.

Infant's Muslin Cap.

This cap is made of fine Swiss muslin, a needle-work square an inch and a quarter long, Valenciennes and needle-work insertion, and very narrow Valenciennes edging, and two widths of pink ribbon, one three-quarters of an inch wide, and the other only a hair's breadth. First prepare the crown, which is five and a half inches square, and is composed of the needle-work square before mentioned, and Valenciennes and needle-work insertion, and surround the upper half of the same with a frill of Valenciennes edging. Cut the front from Fig. 21; the lower corners must reach the lower corners of the crown; the upper corners of the crown overlap the border, as shown by the line on the pattern. The cap is bound in the neck with muslin, through which narrow ribbon is run and drawn up, with ends tying behind. The front of the cap is trimmed with two frills of Valenciennes lace with ribbon loops between; one frill extends entirely round the cap. The place for putting on the strings is marked by a star in the pattern. A ribbon rosette with ends is set on the side of the crown.

MARGARET.

*Low at her feet the daisy lies,
She sings a burden old and sweet,
She sings (the summer daylight flies),
"Si douce est la Margarete."*

"By all thy tongues of silver flame,
By thy heart's golden fret,
I pray thee, and by our one name,
For I am Margaret;
I pray thee take my doubt away,
And make me know my lot,
Thy silver leaves I pluck, and say,
'He loves me—loves me not—'
Thy silver leaves fall one by one
(He loves me—loves me not),
And starlike glimmer faint upon
The darkening garden-plot.
He loves me—he is far above,
And I am lowliest;
He loves me not—but so he love
None other, I can rest.
He loves me—loves me not.—Oh flower,
If now my lover came,
Thy sacred charm would lose its power—
Gold fire and silver flame—
Divine for me a happy lot,
I doubt, I hope, I fear.
Oh joy! (he loves me—loves me not—
He loves me) he is here!"

*Low at her feet her lover lies,
He sings a burden old and sweet,
He sings (the summer daylight dies),
"Si douce est la Margarete."*

QUEEN ELIZABETH'S GARDEN.

WHERE the balmy winds blow over the fair green hills of Surrey, there stood an old-fashioned mansion built in Elizabethan style, solid, substantial, and time-worn, with pointed gables and heavy mullioned windows. Over the doorway was carved in quaint old English letters, "Peace be to this House!" The principal rooms looked out on a broad terrace, inclosed by a heavy stone coping. On each side of the gravel-walk prim flower-beds were cut in the soft green turf. Pretty Gabrielle Romaine, the young mistress of the house, would have had this still, old-fashioned-looking acre modernized and made pretty, but her father had a fancy for its quaintness, and she would not have thwarted his wish had it been ten times as ungainly in her fair young eyes. So she contented herself with avoiding it, and took refuge on the other side of the house under the stately trees which bent their graceful heads over the mimic lake and sheltered a great expanse of lawn. There was another dearer haunt still, in the department consecrated to kitchen uses, which she called "Queen Elizabeth's Garden." Here were many gravel-walks edged with trim double borders of box, behind which were planted tall, stiff-backed hollyhocks and sunflowers lording it over the bright-faced sweet-williams, meek larkspurs, and strong-scented southern-wood growing under their shadow. Flox and saxifrage, ragged robin and sweet-brier, lupins and bold Canterbury bells, all the dear old-fashioned flowers grew here in profusion. But the part Gabrielle loved was a long, broad strip of green turf shaded on either side by fine trees, having for boundary a quaint old-fashioned arbor. You might fancy that in such a one, many centuries ago, under the reign of good Queen Bess, old cronies may have sat hobnobbing over their punch-bowl, and discoursing in language which would seem strangely odd and stilted to our irreverent modern ears. In these days of Havanas and Manillas, Cavendish, Bird's-eye, and Turkish, we should smile with ill-concealed mirth to see their primitive experiments on the strange weed stout Sir Walter had brought them over seas. But you could not by any stretch of imagination fancy fairy Gabrielle Romaine a stately dame, with hoop, farthingale, and ruff (it makes me laugh when I think of that little golden head peeping out from a great mass of starched muslin and lace), pacing with measured tread of high-heeled shoes, and carrying on ceremonious flirtation with a stiffly-bedizened cavalier. No! you must associate nothing but what is gay, simple, sweetly childish, with the little form that comes tripping to its favorite haunt clad in soft, white muslin, with long blue floating ribbons. She is full of glee; all her brothers are at home together—unheard-of good fortune—and they are coming with her father to a feast she has prepared for them in her summer-house.

The said retreat is not one of those rustic gimcracks such as you may buy and have removed to your half-acre suburban garden on a cart; but a great airy apartment, with cushioned seats, and a big round table, where a dozen might dine comfortably. She has come to give a finishing touch; to see that every thing is complete. Yes, there stands the great china bowl of roses in the midst, and there the luscious heaped-up strawberries, the cream and queen cakes, the shining silver tea service, and all the more material part of the repast which will be fully appreciated by the hungry young soldiers. For each of the four—Charlie, Jack, Algy, and Fred—have devoted their six feet of strength, good looks, and valiance to the service of their country. Among all these big men—for Mr. Romaine is taller and broader than any of his sons—lives this dainty little maiden of seventeen, ruling them as absolutely as nearly two thousand years ago Cleopatra swayed her kingdom on the yellow waters of the Nile. Who would have resisted a sovereignty so sweet, so simple as that of this little maiden, whose crown was her wealth of golden hair, and her sceptre a pure white lily? There was fear in the love of these five strong men, for Gabrielle's frame was delicate: her mother had died in a decline. Mr. Romaine had consulted the first physicians in London on her behalf. They had not shaken their heads, nor even looked grave at her, but they said there was delicacy, and she must be very carefully guarded—this little flower.

Well, the feast was spread, the guests seated, and the presiding nymph held the great silver tea-pot (as much as she could conveniently lift) poised in mid-air:

"Papa!" cried the little fairy, beaming smiles upon him from her dark blue eyes, "I am going to take a mean advantage of you. I've prepared a grand banquet for you, like Esther, and when you've eaten and drank yourself into extra good-humor, I have a petition to make unto you, O King!" and she toned down her laughing voice into solemnity.

"We'll aid and abet," cried Jack, in his jolly voice.

"Yes," echoed Fred, with his mouth full of strawberries; "I'm game for any thing."

"Well, dear, a cup more tea, and then you shall make your request known," said her father.

When she had supplied the wants of the company, she commenced:

"Papa, you know next Thursday week will be my birthday?"

"Bless my soul!" exclaimed Mr. Romaine, feigning to have forgotten, as if there was not a lovely bracelet ordered already from London and Ryder's, to mark the occasion. "How old shall you be?"

"Oh, papa! as if you did not know! Eighteen, of course; and I want—I want to have a party."

"A party, child! what sort of party?"

"An evening party, of course, papa; with a band from London, and every thing, like we had in the winter."

"Bravo, Ellie! a capital idea!" cried Charlie.

"Of course the governor will consent. I wonder we didn't think of it before!"

"I'm afraid dancing is not very good for you, love," said her father, with a slight shade on his brow. "Dr. Heaton—"

"Dr. Heaton's an old coddle, papa. It won't hurt me, indeed. You dear old darling, do say Yes."

"Come, Sir, say Yes!" interposed Algernon; "celebrate Miss Puss's birthday and the return of the warrior band altogether, and give a dance."

"But, Gabrielle, my love, is it not too short a notice?"

"Oh no, papa! not a bit; there is never any thing going on in August; and I do so want to ask our new neighbors, the Halls. Jack, you haven't seen them, and they are so pretty. There are three, all with lovely dark hair and eyes. I would give any thing to be like them. One for you, one for Charlie, and one for Fred."

"Why am I left out, Miss?" cries Algy.

"Because you're a grand young Guardsman, Sir, and I mean to have a lady of title for you. Lady Alice Maryon is coming to stay with the Parkers, and I shall invite her for your especial benefit."

Mr. Romaine's consent was not very hard to win when his little daughter was the suppliant; so the petition was granted, and Gabrielle with her brothers proceeded to arrange every thing that could insure the success of the birthday party amidst much jubilation and laughter. The mellow sun sinking lower and lower in the western sky threw his ruddy golden shadows athwart the broad chestnut leaves, and came peeping in at the door of the summer-house. Surely the gaze of Phoebus never lingered on a sweeter scene than this loving union of weakness and strength. To-morrow, next week, next year, he may peer curiously in again, but he will never more see there the sight on which he dwells so lovingly to-night.

The fifth of August has come at last. Gabrielle is eighteen to-day. She trips out of the house into the garden with a basket on her arm, a huge pair of scissors in her little fingers to cut flowers for the further adornment of the rooms.

"Jack! Charlie! you lazy boys, come and help me. Fred is too busy making love to Ada in Queen Elizabeth's garden. We won't disturb them." So with many quips and pranks and wiles the little mistress flits about taking sunshine wherever she goes, bringing out smiles on the faces which look up at her kind merry words. "Lord love her pretty face!" says the coachman, as she runs into the stable with a carrot or lump of sugar for her pet Sibelle. "Bless her sweet heart!" cries the cross old butler, as she trips into the pantry with some mild request. The dogs fawn upon her, the horses thrust their noses into her pretty white hands—even sleepy puss, lying curled up in full sunshine, sends a volume of great purrs after her. Who ever looked on Gabrielle Romaine without loving her?—too well, alas! But all is bright to-day; every thing is in active preparation; the sun gets to his resting-place midway in the heavens, declines, sinks, is gone altogether.

"I wish papa and Algy would come, Jack," pouts Ellie. "Why could not those tiresome people wait a day longer?"

Jack takes out his watch.

"They'll be here in ten minutes now, dear. Go and dress. Ada went an hour ago."

Gabrielle goes obediently. In three-quarters of an hour she is dressed, and comes into the ball-room all in fairy white, with pearls on her neck, and a great lily nestling in her hair. Jack and Fred are there already.

"Oh, Jack! have they not come yet?" she cries.

"No, Puss; but there is another train. You dear, pretty little thing!" and loving, big-hearted Jack gives her a good squeeze. She does not mind his disarranging her dress a bit: is he not her pet brother of all? wouldn't he lay down his life for his little sister?

Twenty minutes; the next train is due: Gabrielle's cheeks flush with excitement. In half an hour the guests will begin to arrive, and her father may not be ready to help her receive them.

"Here they are!" she cries, as a figure comes within sight of the window. "No!—yes! why it's Algy—Algy alone! Oh, Jack! he seems quite lame. Something has happened."

Jack is out in the garden flying toward his brother before the words have fairly left her lips.

"Algy! what's the matter? Where's the governor?"

"Coming behind in a fly. There's been an accident: he's awfully hurt. I came first, not to frighten Ellie. For God's sake, Jack, get her out of the way before they bring him in!"

And the young Guardsman, sick and staggering with pain, leans for a moment on his brother.

"Poor old fellow! where are you hurt? Rest on me," cries Jack. "Algy—father won't die?" and his voice falters like a woman's. "Who's with him?"

"There was a physician in the train: he's coming with him. Go in, Jack, or Ellie will suspect."

Jack nerves himself with a desperate effort, and goes calmly toward the house. But Gabrielle is already on the steps, in her satin shoes, with uncovered neck and arms.

"Come in, darling!" says Jack, tenderly. "You'll catch your death of cold."

"Oh, Jack—what is it? what has happened?"

"Algy's hurt his foot: come in, Ellie, dear!" and the young man draws her in with tender force. But she breaks from him, and, rushing down the steps, flings herself on her younger brother.

"Are you hurt, Algy, dearest? Where is papa?"

The sound of wheels coming slowly up the gravel-drive is heard at this moment.

"For God's sake, Jack, take her in!" cries Algernon, in an imploring tone.

"No—no—no!" she shrieks, breaking from them; and then she gasps: "Only let me stay!—only let me see him! Oh, papa! papa!"

They dare not use force to the fragile little creature, and so, despairingly, they let her stay. The carriage comes up to the door, and a tall form alights from it. Jack and Fred rush to him. Between them they lift out the seemingly lifeless form of their father. For the moment Gabrielle is forgotten: she crouches silently, with blanched face and terror-stricken eyes, and as they carry him in she follows. The house is all confusion; the servants run hither and thither terrified. Up stairs goes that sad procession, the strong arms of the stranger supporting the heavy, death-like head. When Mr. Romaine is laid upon his bed, and the physician hangs over him, Gabrielle comes trembling to his side. He hears a faint rustle, and, turning, sees a small, white face, looking scared from out a crown of golden hair. Somehow he thinks of Shakespeare's "Ophelia." A great compassion comes over him for this poor little stricken maiden, decked in the fairy ball robes, and he hastens to answer the look of entreaty in the imploring eyes. He has more tender pity than some who think it duty to adhere to rigid truth; he takes her hand, and says very gently: "This is just a fainting fit. Please God, we shall soon have him better. You must not stay now, but when we have made an examination you shall come again."

"You promise?" she cries, with wild entreaty in her eyes, too utterly agonized to cry.

"I promise! I will fetch you myself."

At first the physician had little hope of his patient, but presently Mr. Romaine opened his eyes and moaned. The injuries were chiefly internal—his sufferings intense. After an hour Dr. Yorke went down stairs to find Gabrielle. She flew to meet him, with wistful eyes.

"Your father is conscious now," he said, gently. "He will get over it."

Then the great tears came raining down Gabrielle's white face in a torrent, and her tender frame shook with sobs. Philip Yorke looked at her with an unwonted moisture in his eyes, a knot rising in his throat. The sight of her quivering, convulsed form, sent a strange thrill of pain to his heart. He took a soft white cloak that lay near, and covered her neck and arms with it.

"You will take cold," he whispered, kindly. "May I go to papa?" she asked, presently.

"You shall if you wish it, but I would rather you waited until to-morrow."

"Do let me go now!" she cried, rising.

"If I promise to stay all night with him myself, will you not wait a few hours?"

Looking up in his kind, grave face, she felt a sudden boundless trust in him.

"And to-morrow," he went on, "to-morrow you shall be installed as head-nurse—only go to bed now, and try to sleep."

She promised, and went away obediently to her room. Not to sleep, for many hours; but to toss wakefully from side to side; to send up fervent prayers for her darling father; to cry bitterly when she fancied he was suffering, and to feel a great, reassured comfort in the presence of the stranger. As the morning light came strongly through the drawn blinds she fell into a heavy sleep.

When she awoke Jack was bending over her, and the full August sunshine poured into the room. She did not remember at first, and only looked up with a wondering smile at seeing her brother there. Then remembrance dawned upon her.

"Oh, Jack, papa?"

"The dear old governor's better, darling—I came to tell you."

"And that gentleman?—the doctor?"

"Dr. Yorke? He's gone; he was obliged to be in town by ten o'clock, but he is coming again this afternoon—and Ferrers is here. He's the nicest, kindest fellow I ever met in my life. Wasn't it fortunate, his happening to be in the train?"

"Was he hurt, Jack?"

"Not a bit. Only a little shaken."

The days wore slowly away, and Mr. Romaine gradually recovered. His little daughter was an indefatigable nurse, refusing absolutely to leave him, except at night. Big, tender-hearted Jack, installed himself also in the sick-room as long as he was at home, but his leave of absence was nearly up. Algernon, who had quite recovered from the accident, and Charles were already gone.

There was great lamentation when Jack's turn arrived. Poor little Gabrielle missed him sadly. At Mr. Romaine's urgent request Dr. Yorke still came frequently to see him; and, after a while, the golden-haired maiden came to watch eagerly for his arrival. She would gather him the choicest roses, because he once said he cared for flowers. She would have all manner of dainty refreshment spread out for him, and was in ecstasy if he only partook of it. Pluto could not have watched Proserpine's appetite with more intense concern than did Gabrielle the physician's. His visit was always rather a long one, because he had to wait for the up-train, and she would watch him furtively, with a strange, fascinated interest, as he talked to Mr. Romaine. What was there in him to attract this soft, kitten-like maiden? A tall, deep-chested frame, with a cold, grave, passionless face, and thoughtful gray eyes, which looked as if they lived for science, and discovering the dark causes of human ills alone. It was a handsome face, with the broad open brow and well-cut mouth; but there were threads of white in the dark curling hair, for Philip Yorke's life had already numbered eight lustres. But Gabrielle thought of him all the day, and dreamed of him at night, while he never gave her a look or word more than kindness and courtesy demanded. Was he blind, that he failed to read those ingenious eyes?

In time Mr. Romaine became so well that Dr. Yorke's visits perforce had an end; but so great was his regard and liking for the physician that he begged him to come down and stay at Beechwood as often as the arduous duties of his profession admitted. Philip Yorke accepted the invitation when it was given, but months rolled by, and Gabrielle never saw the man who had come to fill such a large portion of her thoughts and dreams. Sometimes Mr. Romaine went to London and consulted him; then, on his return, many were the questions his little daughter would ask. Yes, he answered, he had seen Dr. Yorke; he looked somewhat worn—was overworked. He had promised to come some Saturday until Monday, to have a day's shooting—that was the one recreation he permitted himself—had not been able to fix a day though.

The dear little maiden's cheeks began to pale. She did not go singing about the rooms, with that sweet, blithe voice all the household were wont to listen for; and the heaven-blue eyes grew to have a pained, wistful look. As in the olden fairy-tale many handsome young princes traveled from afar to waken with their kisses the sleeping beauty, so came many gallant hearts seeking to quicken love in the heart of pretty Gabrielle. But for them she slumbered heavily, seeing in her dreams one form alone; and for all he would see or care, she cried to herself, she might slumber on into the long trance from which is no awaking here.

Was it so? Did he in truth care nothing? Were his senses so dulled that he knew naught of the love he had called into life? No! He had seen it all well enough, with a strange wonder, a strange pain. This pure lily maiden to love him, a man twice her age, who many weary years ago had banished all hopes of the love of good women. His heart ached as he thought of that fresh young love which would have seemed a glimpse of heaven to him if..... Oh! that curse of his life, which nothing could alter or atone for now! "I will not go to Beechwood any more," Philip Yorke said to himself; "it is but a child's fancy. She will soon forget me when she no longer sees me." During all the long winter months, through the fresh spring-tide of budding hedges, when fair mother earth awakes from her long trance, he kept his resolve in spite of oft-repeated invitations from the Romaines. But one day in the early summer came a delicate note from Gabrielle. "Papa is not quite so well," she wrote. "He has a slight return of the old pain, and does not feel equal to a journey in the train. Will you come down to-morrow and stay until Monday? The country looks so pretty; we think a little change would do you good."

What could he do? A man in any other profession might have invented some excuse; but a physician is at the beck and call of any one who chooses to demand his services. And, if he went at all, he might as well stay: it would seem uncourteous to refuse again. So he went; and Gabrielle and her father received him with the warmest welcome. How sweet and peaceful it seemed here among the Surrey hills, with the birds still singing, the sunlight still falling on the green grass and boughs, as they sat out after dinner! Mr. Romaine and he talked and smoked, while Gabrielle flitted hither and thither, waiting on her father, playing with her dogs, or sometimes sitting still to listen, with eyes turned full upon him as he spoke, like Desdemona might have done to the Moor. When the last ray of sunlight was gone, and they went into the house, Miss Romaine sang to them old, simple ballads in a voice as sweet as an angel's.

"I will never come again," groaned Philip.

Yorke, to himself, as he watched her, and felt a wild worship of her beauty and innocence surging up in his heart. The next afternoon some one came from town to see Mr. Romaine, and Gabrielle was left alone with the physician.

"You have never seen 'Queen Elizabeth's Garden,'" she said. "Come, and I will show it you."

He rose and walked with her to her favorite spot.

"I do not wonder at your coming here often," he smiled, as they paced together up and down the broad turf walk. "It is a very Arcadia for day-dreams."

"I call that my palace," she laughed, pointing to the summer-house; "sometimes I give parties there. Last summer I had a delightful one; all my brothers were at home together, and we persuaded papa to let me have my birthday ball. That was the terrible day of the accident, you know. What would we have done if you had not been there?"

"You would have sent for some one else," said Dr. Yorke, quietly.

"Oh, but no one would have been like you!" she answered, turning her blue eyes upon him with a look that betrayed all their simple tale.

"You love your father very dearly," he remarked, abruptly.

"Love him! oh yes, with all my heart! And Jack, and all my brothers."

"I suppose you would not be happy if you were like me, and cared for no one in the world?" he said, deliberately.

"Don't you care for any one?" asked Gabrielle, a little wistfully.

"I have not known what it means to love any one for the last ten years," replied Philip Yorke, coldly. "I never shall again. My profession is wife, sister, child to me; I have not one thought for any thing else."

Gabrielle turned away to hide her face, and they walked on in silence.

"Papa has promised me another party this year," she said, presently. "I wish you would come."

"I? I never go to balls. It is ten years since I went to one."

"Won't you come to mine, as a very, very great favor?" and Gabrielle looked up at him with such entreating eyes that Philip Yorke felt a sudden desire to stoop and kiss the dear little childish face. He was silent for a moment, so carried away by his thoughts that he forgot to answer her.

"Do!" she pleaded, softly; and, with a start, he came back to consciousness.

"If you wish it, I will," he answered, smiling. Then they walked back to the house.

Gabrielle's birthday came in due course, and this time it was marked by no unpropitious event. A little before twelve Dr. Yorke entered the ball-room. He had had a long, weary day; his head ached with want of rest, but he had promised her and would not break his word. His eyes sought out the fair little mistress of the ceremonies. Yes, there she was, all in white, as he remembered so well to have seen her before, with pearls on her neck and big white lilies nestling in her golden hair. A jealous pang shot through him as he watched her in the arms of a young, handsome man; but as they paused in the waltz he saw her eyes—those eyes which always reminded him of the blue veronica—search eagerly round the room. As they lighted on him a glad smile beamed over her face. Then he sighed bitterly. She left her partner, and came quickly toward him.

"How good of you to come! And you look so tired. Have you had some wine?"

"No, thank you. I do not care for any thing. I have come to wish you many happy returns of the day."

Alas, poor little Gabrielle! Philip Yorke wishing you that wish; what a mockery it seemed in those after-days, when he remembered every word he ever spoke to you!

I must not linger now: my story is not of these pleasant days. I would not make the sweet more sweet, lest the bitter should seem too bitter in your eyes.

The ball was over—Philip Yorke gone.

Many a day Gabrielle sat in her dainty maiden room, dreaming like the Lily Maid of Astolat of her absent knight, so kind and grave, who had never spoken one word of love to her—never been aught but courteous and cold. The little fairy was not so blithe now; she did not trip through the house, breaking like a sunbeam into the lives of those around her. Sometimes she sat with dreamy eyes all the summer afternoon, her hands lying idle, ignorant when people watched her with loving anxious eyes, not even seeing the wistful looks her faithful terrier cast upon her unheeding face. Mr. Romaine understood it all, and sighed with a strange wondering sadness at her love for the cold, grave man twice her age, who was too wrapt in his profession to think or care for a child's fancy.

It was a bright afternoon early in October; the summer had lasted on into autumn, and still the leaves were on the trees. Green, brown, russet-red and gold; all the lovely tints on which our autumn suns linger were in that quaint old garden. Gabrielle was pacing slowly up and down her favorite haunt, thinking regretfully of the fair summer that was gone by, of the cold, dreaded winter coming on. There had been some talk of her spending the winter abroad, but she had opposed it vehemently; it was death to her the thought of going somewhere so far off, where she would have no hope of seeing him.

There came a quick step along the gravel-walk, and Gabrielle turned. She stopped suddenly, with a throbbing heart, the vivid roses mantling in her pale cheeks as she uttered:

"Dr. Yorke!"

But he was altered: his face was not cold or passionless now, but glad with brightness and hope.

"Little Gabrielle," he whispered, "may I ask for your love at last?"

Was it all some strange dream that had come to this little maiden as she wandered forlorn in her bower—some vision sent her of the compassionate gods? Ah no! those bright shining tears showed how glad, how real was her happiness.

And so it came to pass that this fresh young life and the strong stern one were blended together in a great love, so great that none could say which owned the larger share. Was it more happiness to the little frail maiden to cling round the shelter of that strong heart? or was this pure love more priceless to the man who had thought the best part of life sapless and withered for him? Perhaps it was hardly a match Mr. Romaine would have chosen for his idolized daughter; but when he saw how the roses returned to her cheeks, when he heard her glad voice singing again as she tripped about the house, and watched the sweet smiles dimpling in her face, he thanked God, and was content. There was no more talk of wintering abroad. Gabrielle seemed so well and strong, her father almost forgot how anxious he had been for her a month ago. It was fixed then that the marriage should take place in December. Philip Yorke begged so hard that there should be no longer delay, and Mr. Romaine, with a sore heart, yielded the point.

The 20th of December came at last, clear, bright, shining—as fair a winter sun as ever shone upon a lovely bride. What a sweet, tender little flower it was! with what loving eyes all those six stalwart men gazed on the dear face, looking like some pure white flower from out its aureole of golden hair! They had all come to the wedding, Jack, Charlie, and Algy; and besides, there were four pretty bridesmaids and a gay party. The fair procession passed up the aisle of the country church, taking their places at the altar rail. Who would have known that handsome face, with its tender, smiling mouth, for cold, stern Philip Yorke? Ah, never to be cold or stern to her his darling wife from this day forth.

The ceremony commenced; the clergyman read the opening address, and then gave the solemn charge. He paused for a moment, and through the church came a harsh voice:

"I forbid the marriage!"

Startled, every one turned, and then all eyes were fixed upon the bridegroom. No need to ask a question: there, upon the ashen face and staggering form, was written, plainer than all words, that this was no vain interruption. Gabrielle cast one wild glance at him; all the color died out of her cheeks, and, with a convulsed sob, she fell backward. Jack caught her in his arms, and carried her, like one dead, into the vestry.

Philip Yorke sat locked in his own room, his head bent down upon his arms, with such anguish for company as men rarely know, even in this sinning, suffering world. Fifteen years of bitterness, of struggling to forget and live down; a momentary gleam of God's fair sunshine, and then—the night of blackness and thick darkness.

Sixteen years before this day, Philip Yorke, young, passionate, headstrong, had fallen into the meshes of a scheming woman. Shameless, abandoned, far inferior to him in position, she had yet exercised a strange fascination over him, and he married her, despite the prayers, the entreaties of his mother and friends. The delusion lasted a little while, even after she was his wife, until one day he awoke to the knowledge of what she really was. Violent, shrewish, impure of life—and yet he could bring nothing actually against her since her marriage. "You shall never be divorced from me," she sneered, in her coarse, mocking voice. "You are tired of me; you would like to get rid of me, and marry that little, doll-faced Nelly Steele, but you never shall!" Goaded to madness by his sickening disgust for this creature who called him husband Philip Yorke plunged into the wildest excesses, and then, when she had every proof she wanted against him, she resumed her old courses. So, at twenty-five, a man's life was wrecked by one act of headstrong, boyish folly. Philip Yorke had dug the grave for his hopes; he did all that remained to be done—gave them decent burial, trod down the turf, and built up the monument of a useful life over them. The world saw the shining mausoleum, and never guessed how hollow and empty it was. He never saw his wife, but sent her money periodically through an agent, and so the years rolled on. She was in America when he first saw Gabrielle Romaine. A month after the last birthday-ball a New York paper was sent to him. Turning it curiously over, he came to a paragraph marked with a cross, and headed "Suicide of Catherine Yorke." It described the person of his wife; age forty-two, of a florid appearance, with black hair, and of intemperate habits. He laid down the paper with a throbbing pulse. If it were only true! if at last this cursed nightmare was taken off him forever! Free! free to love and be loved by that pure little lily maiden: to have a hope—a life still before he died!

He wrote to his agent, and awaited the answer in feverish impatience. There was no doubt, came the reply, that the dead woman and Dr. Yorke's wife were identical; the day before her suicide she had presented herself at the office, and clamorously demanded money. Her appearance was strange, her manner wild, as though in a state of intoxication. From that time she had not been seen again, although she had threatened to come every day until they gave her the money she wanted. The agent, Mr. Brown, had refused her the sum until it became due. Since then the day of payment had passed, and no application was made for it. There could be no doubt of the woman's identity, as he had made all inquiries, and found that the life and habits of the suicide corresponded exactly with those of Dr. Yorke's unhappy wife. And so the burden rolled away from the poor toiler, and left him free, glad of heart, a changed man—until that day in the little country church where, standing beside his darling, on the very brink of Heaven in this world, that voice, so long unheard, plunged him down into the very shades of Hell. She forced herself into his presence, that shrill, fierce-tongued virago, mocking him with her coarse sneers until he could have strangled her where she stood.

"Am I revenged at last?" she hissed. "And so you thought there was only one Catherine Yorke in the world? You thought, because she was of intemperate habits, it must be me. I sent you that paper. I saw my way to sting you at last as you have done me, and dragged me down, and kept me in want all these years. I set Tom on to watch you, and when I heard all your fine doings, and how you were going to marry a girl young enough to be your daughter, I thought I'd come over in time to be at the wedding." And the woman uttered a shrill, mocking sound that seemed like the laugh of a fiend in Philip Yorke's writhing ears.

How crept on those days of torment, those nights of anguish! He went about his work as usual, and people stared strangely at him, for his miserable story had been published to society in the newspapers, headed, "An Interrupted Wedding." What mattered it to the world? It said nothing to him, because he was a skillful physician, and it required his services. Once he had thought to go away, somewhere far off, where prying eyes could no longer look curiously upon him; but he felt that without his profession he would go mad. Mr. Romaine refused to see or hold any communication with him, and of Gabrielle he heard nothing.

One bitter March morning, as he sat in his consulting-room to receive patients, the servant brought him a note. His hand shook as if palsied when he tried to open it. "I am waiting in the carriage. I must see you. May I come in?"—GABRIELLE. Thus it ran.

He turned away for a moment to steady his voice, and then said:

"Ask the lady in here at once."

A moment of agonized uncertainty; then the door opened, and the little figure he knew so well came in slowly, closely veiled.

Philip Yorke stood speechless, without moving. When she came up to him he shrank back. "Oh child, child! why have you come?" he cried, in a harsh, trembling voice.

Gabrielle drew the veil from her face; the poor white face, so thin and hollow that the sight of it broke his heart. She laid her hand on his arm, looking up with eyes dimmed by many tears.

"Philip," she whispered, "I could not part from you so. They would not let me see you, and so I came when no one knew of it." A cough interrupted her, a cough that sent a thrill of agony quivering through every nerve of his strong frame.

"Oh, Gabrielle, child, you should not have come out to-day!"

"Why?" she asked, wearily. "I do not care for life any more now, Philip. I felt I must see you once, and tell you that I do not blame you. I know nothing, only I loved you so; I know you would not have broken my heart. Would you, dear Philip?"

He covered his face with his hands, the blind, passionate tears raining through them. Had he not already tasted the bitterest anguish life held, but he must look on this piteous, white face and read the end of its story written there? Gabrielle put both her hands upon his arm, crying too.

"I am not ill, Philip," she whispered. "I shall soon be better. I must not stay longer now; only remember, darling, I shall never blame you, never think hardly of you."

He drew his hands slowly from his face and looked down at the eager, loving eyes. Then there came a passionate longing to take her once in his arms in a last embrace—to kiss away the tears from the dear eyes, once—only once.

Then he mastered himself with an iron will. Should he sully this fair flower by one unlawful touch? No! he would not even let so much as a finger rest upon her.

"Oh, Gabrielle!" he cried, bitterly—"little Gabrielle, for whom I would give my life—would to God you had never seen me!"

"No, Philip," she answered, softly, "do not say that; I would not have been without your love. Oh, you don't know how happy it made me!—too happy for this world."

"Child!" he murmured, in a broken voice, "if God would hear a prayer from such a one as I, how I would pray him to bless you for your merciful compassion in saying these things to me! Oh, little one, who was so near being mine—to think that now I dare not even touch you! How could I ever hope, after such a life as mine has been, that God would give me an angel like you? Oh, Gabrielle! go now, child—I can't bear this any longer!" And Philip Yorke's strong frame shook with passionate emotion.

"Good-by, Philip!" She took one of his hands in her little ones, laying her tender lips upon it. Then she turned and went away, blinded with tears.

He strained his aching eyes after her until the door had closed; and then the black darkness, the darkness of night and death, swept into his soul and filled it up with despair; only despair—no light, no hope.

Philip Yorke had his will. No other man ever held Gabrielle to his breast or read love in her blue eyes; but when the summer came she lay dead, with hands folded on her bosom and the pure white lilies nestling there.

WOMEN'S NOVELS.

WITHIN very recent memory the production of stories has increased enormously, out of all proportion with the increase of grave and solid books. Modern novels, in order to be popular, must be full of exciting scenes and glowing descriptions; the tame, colorless love-story, often as not told in a series of letters, which won the fancy of our grandmothers, would now be laid aside with contempt.

Female authorship seems admirably adapted for a certain class of novels. A gossiping letter is generally better written by a woman than by a man, because women observe trivial matters which men pass by with indifference; and such novels as resemble gossiping letters on an extended scale might reasonably be expected from feminine pens; also, we might fairly expect that any department of literature in which female influence predominated would be characterized by purity of conception and gracefulness of treatment. We should readily excuse the absence of strength and originality, but we should certainly expect that educated women, being sheltered by the conditions of their sex from much of the vice and temptation of the outer world, would, in their literary efforts, display a pleasing ignorance of many things which are forced on the observation of men. But what is the real state of affairs? In the pages of sensational novels, especially in those which are penned by the gentler sex, vice runs riot and crime reigns supreme. In the romances of old days it was customary to introduce a single villain, who inflicted much pain and suffering on the virtuous characters, but was ultimately conquered and subdued. Now, however, the villains form the majority—one angel of innocence, perhaps, is permitted to roam through a pandemonium of fiends—but often enough there is no angel of innocence at all—all the dramatis personæ are steeped in meanness and scoundrelism.

Novels of this sort must be mischievous, especially to the young and impressionable, who believe all they read. If we should not like our daughters to frequent the company of rakes and Anonymas, swindlers and murderers in real life, we can not consistently introduce them to such society in fiction. Moreover, the vices which in actual life would appear odious and vulgar are in these books softened by the qualities attributed to the persons who commit them. The cheat, the gambler, and the seducer is depicted as a handsome, manly fellow; and his beauty and his skill in horsemanship are dangled before our eyes as a reason for pardoning his criminalities. The murderer of the old régime had a villainous countenance; the murderer—or rather murdereress, for ladies most often break the sixth commandment—of modern fiction is a gentle, girlish creature with a peach-bloom complexion, soft blue eyes, and a wealth of golden hair.

There is a pleasant sense of satisfaction in the knowledge that we have not altogether to trust to the productions of this school for the impressions the novel-history of our times will create on posterity—that we have writers of both sexes of powerful genius, fine taste, and sound principle, who have striven, and not vainly, to raise and benefit mankind. Rather by George Eliot, Miss Mulock, and Charlotte Brontë, will we trust, the tone and spirit of our age be judged than by those writers who have elevated what is meretricious, superficial, most vicious and sensual, from the blackest depths of our social system to a prominent and highly-decorated post of observation.

We close their books with regret and affection, are wiser and better, have a gentler, kinder, and more Christian feeling toward the world than when we have emerged from the fevered, gaudy, and viciously-confusing stage where the Sensational writer has exhibited a show worthy of the Yahoos.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

BESSIE AND OTHERS.—The stitch known as "point russe" is the most quickly and easily worked of all embroidery stitches, being simply the back stitch used in plain sewing, care being taken to put the needle through so as to make the stitches follow in the same direction, by which means the work preserves a neat appearance on the under side. Having selected a pattern draw it either on tissue paper or on the material. This stitch is usually worked in black silk, though any other color may be used. It shows a single thread on the right side. Different colors may be used in the same design; or in work that requires shading different numbers of black silk. This stitch is especially designed for embroidering on thin muslin. It makes a very pretty cover for toilette cushions and the like. Take two thicknesses of fine thin muslin and work through both. Then cut away the under piece of muslin excepting in the centre of the flowers, leaves, etc. This laid over the colored silk or velvet of the cushion lends the work the appearance of raised white flowers bordered with the delicate black stitches. This stitch may also be used for embroidering children's dresses, Garibaldi's, etc. It is most effective on the double thin muslin, as it thus presents the appearance of being much more elaborate than it really is. In working heavier material it may sometimes be necessary to put the needle through backward and forward instead of forming the entire stitch at once. When the design requires that the stitches be very short they may also be done in this manner in order to prevent drawing the work. For marking or embroidering pocket-handkerchiefs, a stitch called point dame is used. This is the same stitch—the ordinary back stitch used in sewing—except that greater care must be taken with the under side. In working always put the needle so that for every stitch on the upper side there may be a corresponding one on the under side. In working this the thread must be carefully fastened after finishing each separate part of the design. The under side will be different, but equally as neat and conspicuous as the upper side.

Mrs. M. K.—White lace shawls are sometimes dyed; but they are apt to show that this has been done. It is better to purchase a black lace shawl than a white one with a view to having it dyed.

M. T. Hull.—We can not undertake any commissions for the purchase of articles.

Newark.—We furnish no patterns except those contained in the Supplement.

Collar of Black Watered Ribbon.

THIS pretty and stylish collar is made of black watered ribbon an inch wide, and jet beads and grelots. Cut a piece of ribbon just long enough to reach round the neck, sew on it two rows of beads lengthwise, and set on the bottom seventeen pieces of ribbon, each five inches long, the ends of which are pointed by turning the corners over on the wrong side and sewing them fast, and trimmed each with a large bead and a grelot. The seam where the ends are set on is likewise ornamented with a bead and grelot. A chain formed of jet rings and beads, of the requisite length, is set on the ribbon ends, half-way from the top, in the manner shown in the illustration. The collar is tied behind with two ribbons, each a yard long, which are likewise pointed at the ends, and ornamented with beads and grelots.

BROWN VELVET TOQUE.

Brown Velvet Toque.

THIS coquettish little hat is very becoming in general to young girls. It is made of brown velvet, with a revers, narrow in front and wider at the sides. The right side is trimmed with a long white plume and a spray of bronze leaves.

Black Velvet Beret.

THIS beret, of black velvet, is trimmed on the side with a spray of roses with bronze leaves, and a long heron's plume, which falls gracefully over the curled chignon.

COIFFURE OF ELDERLY LADY.—BACK.

Brown Velvet Mignon.

THIS promises to be one of the most graceful hats worn this spring. The original is of blue velvet; the crown is quite flat, and the brim is narrow in front and broad at the sides, where it is turned up, as seen in the illustration. The edge is trimmed with a narrow quilling of blue satin ribbon. A rose with buds and leaves is set on the front, and a blue satin bow, with long ends, on the back of the hat.

Coiffure for Elderly Lady.

FOR this simple and tasteful coiffure part the hair in a line with the ear; roll the front hair forward over a frisette, to which the short curls, seen in the illustration, have first been attached, in such a manner as to conceal the fastening; then join it with the back hair. Tie the latter quite high, braid it in two plaits, and arrange it in the form of a bow. If the hair is short or thin, it may be lengthened at the ends with another tress, and braided over a frisette, in the manner described in former numbers of Harper's Bazar.

White Cashmere Sack.

THIS sack is of white cashmere, lined with white muslin, and embroidered round the edge with colored single zephyr in point russe; black crochet silk may also be used. Fig. 40 gives the embroidery pattern for the border. The sack is cut in the Breton fashion, and is very stylish and effective.

Fig. 1.—Black silk dress with high neck and close sleeves. Black cashmere shawl, trimmed with a broad band of black silk, a fringe, and a border embroidered with black crochet silk and beads in satin stitch and chain stitch. Fig. 39 gives the design for the embroidery. The talma, of which an illustration is given on page 373, may be substituted for the shawl. The dress is cut from the pattern given in No. I., Fig. 3.

Fig. 2.—Dress with high neck and close sleeves of black gros grain. Marie Antoinette fichu of the same material, trimmed with a quilling of black silk. A shawl or talma may be substituted for the fichu. Fig. 3 gives the pattern of the dress. For the fichu, cut from Fig. 29 one piece each of the outside and black lustring lining, and from Fig. 28 two pieces of each. Join Figs. 28 and 29 from 19 to 20, letting the seam come between the outside and the lining. Run the edges together, and finish with the quilling, the edges of which are pinked on both sides.

Fig. 3.—Dress with high neck and close sleeves of black poul de soie, trimmed with bias folds of the same material. Scarf mantilla of heavy black corded silk. The manner of making the dress is described on the first page of the Supplement. For the scarf mantilla, which is trimmed with a box-pleated frill of the same material, cut from the aforesaid stuff one piece from Fig. 30, taking care to observe the piece turned down in the pattern. Hem the edge of the mantilla. For the trimming, take a strip of the stuff three inches wide, both edges of which are pinked, and box-pleat it three-quarters of an inch from the edge, making the pleats a quarter of an inch wide, and the same distance apart. Set the trimming on the mantilla with bead gimp, three-quarters of an inch from the edge, and covering the sewing of the pleats. The mantilla is fastened with ribbons, eight inches in length.

Fig. 4.—Swiss muslin dress with high neck and long sleeves. The bottom of the skirt is trimmed with a flounce a quarter of a yard wide. Bias folds simulate a Pompadour waist. White silk buttons close the corsage. Fig. 3 gives the pattern of the dress. A white veil completes the costume.

Polonaise or Redingote.

See illustration, page 377.

THIS sleeveless Polonaise or redingote must be of the same color as the dress, although the material may be different. The suit in the illustration consists of a short dress of brown poplin, trimmed with brown silk rouleaux. The paletot is of brown taffetas, lined with silk, and trimmed with bias silk folds of the same color. The waist is confined by a narrow belt, with wide loops and ends behind. Cut the fronts, outside, and lining from Fig. 26, the front edge of the left only to the dotted line, and the back whole from Fig. 27. Take care to observe the piece turned down in Fig. 26. These pieces are shown in the figure of the Polonaise on the Supplement reduced to one-sixteenth of the full size. Lengthen the Polonaise on the bottom as much as may be desired.

CONFIRMATION DRESSES.

Baste the outside and lining together; sew up the darts in the waist, and join the back and fronts, making the figures on the pattern correspond with each other. Run the edges together, and cord the neck and arm-holes, then set on the trimming and belt—the latter is fastened behind with loops and ends. The Polonaise is closed at the neck with a hook and eye. Sleeves can be added, and the front cut straight, if preferred.

trimming consists of two strips of Swiss muslin, each two inches wide, which are pleated crosswise, very narrow, and are scalloped on one side. The seam where this trimming is set on is concealed on the straight side by needle-work insertion an inch and a quarter wide, and on the scalloped side by a narrow bias fold of muslin, stitched on and edged with narrow guipure lace. The insertion on the straight side is finished with a similar edging. The front is trimmed, as shown in the illustration, with bands of pink ribbon and lappets of insertion and edging, together with pink ribbon bows. Cut the right front of the waist and skirt from Fig. 32 the full size of the pattern; the gored front breadth is a yard long, and five-eighths of a yard wide at the bottom. The left front reaches only to the dotted diagonal line. Cut the back from Fig. 33, and the sleeves from Fig. 35, taking care to notice the contour of the under part of the sleeve. Prepare the fronts of the yoke from Fig. 32, the back of the yoke from Fig. 34, and the bands for the sleeves from Fig. 36. Face the fronts with a strip of Swiss muslin an inch and a quarter wide, and put on the trimming as shown in the illustration. Gather the top of the back to suit the width of the yoke, set the back and fronts into the yoke to correspond with the figures on the pattern, and trim the neck with lace. Join the back and fronts. Sew up the sleeves from 29 to 30, gather them at the top and bottom, put on the band, trim it with lace, and set the sleeves in the arm-holes, finishing them on the top with a leaf of lace and insertion. Make a shirr in the bottom of the back of the waist, in which run a narrow white ribbon, the ends of which are passed through eyelet holes and tied in the middle of the back. Join the gored front breadth of the skirt with straight breadths, of like length, tucked round the bottom, taking care to leave the skirt open at the sides; put the trimming on the front with the help of the illustration, gather the top of the skirt and sew it on the waist. Finish with buttons and loops.

Talma.

See illustration, page 373.

This talma is a graceful garment for a young girl. The original is of black velvet, lined with black silk and trimmed round the bottom and neck with black satin points. Cut from Fig. 31 two pieces each of the outside and lining, lengthening them about a quarter of a yard at the bottom. Sew up the back, letting the seam come between the outside and the lining, lay the shoulder-pleats from 21 to 22, run the edges together, cord the neck, put on a hook and eye, and lastly, put on the trimming as shown in the illustration.

pocket lapels are of blue cashmere. The jacket is closed in front with loops of blue silk cord and crochet buttons. Cut from Fig. 22 one piece each of the outside and lining; from Fig. 25 each two pieces; and from Figs. 23 and 24 two pieces each of cashmere alone; also of cashmere, wadding, and buckram, the facing for the collar, the roll, and the cuffs. Cut a slit in the velvet, Fig. 22, for the pocket, and sew to the edges a silk pocket of the requisite size. Baste the outside on the lining, make the pleats at the neck and side; join the coat; set on the collar, and put on the quilted facing and pocket lapels. Bind the coat; make the sleeves, laying a pleat from * to * at the cuff, and set them in the arm-holes.

"MONKEYS FOR MASSA CHARLES."

A STORY OF ALL-FOOLS' DAY.

NOW I am going to tell you a story about my dear father; something that happened some years before the war, in the month of April.

My father lived in Charleston, South Carolina, for a great many years. All the black people in the city knew and loved him dearly; he was so kind to them, and saved them many a time from being locked up in the "sugar-house" all night, and from a cruel whipping the next morning; sometimes he did this by his entreaties, and oftener by paying a good deal of money out of his own pocket. His own servants called him "Massa Charles," because they had known him from a boy; and all the rest of the darkeys followed suit: so that is the long and the short of how he came by this name, and we can go on with the story in clear comfort, only you must understand that at the time of this story he lived in New York.

One afternoon, about the latter end of March, Major Alexander Black, a great friend of Massa Charles, was seen walking down to the dock in Charleston, where the steam-ship Columbia was made fast.

"Is Captain Berry on board?" he asked, in a quick, pleasant voice.

"Yes, Sar, he am," answered a black stevedore, who was tumbling a great bale of cotton into the ship.

"Can you take me to him?"

"Yes, Sar, wid pledjure," said the stevedore, pulling up a lock of his woolly hair, because he had no hat on to pull off. "He done gone down in de cabin, Sar, a lilly while ago to eat him dinner, Sar."

Major Black was escorted with great politeness down the companion-way—which means down the stairs, and then the stevedore said: "If you please, Sar, go troo dis yer cabin; the Cap'n in the lilly cabin toder end."

So Major Black marched through, whistling "Yankee Doodle," and presently he came upon Captain Berry, his merry little round face quite red with eating, as if his life depended upon it. Come to think about it, so it did. We must eat to live, and no mistake.

"Aha, Major!" he cried. "Howdy?" (That's Southern for "how do you do?") "Glad to see you. Sit down and take a snack."

"Well," said the Major, laughing, "I've had two dinners already; but that don't make a particle of difference; I'm quite ready for another." Whereupon he took gumbo soup, and pillau, and gudgeon pie, and potatoes, and parsnips, and plum-pudding, on four clean plates, and played what Captain Berry called a highly respectable knife and fork—by which he meant, that if the Major knew how to do nothing else, he could certainly eat a big dinner.

"Now, Captain," said Major Black, after dinner, "what time do you expect to get into New York?"

"I shall arrive, I hope, at about nine o'clock in the morning of the 1st of April."

"Capital! just the thing for me. Here is a letter. I particularly wish that it should be handed to my friend Charley on the first of the month. It is very important. Will you promise me to send a man with it to his counting-house, as soon as you arrive?"

"Yes, certainly, Major; consider it done." And Captain Berry buttoned the letter up tight in an inside pocket of his coat, and then they both went on deck, where the fat little Captain, standing with his stubby legs wide apart, a round jacket on, and his hands deep in his trousers pockets, looked like the letter A out on a frolic.

Pretty soon Major Black went ashore, whistling "Hail Columbia" this time, which he meant as a compliment to the ship as well as the country; and the next morning the Columbia thundered out—"I'm off! Good-by!" with her big gun, and paddled away to New York.

It was very bad weather. The rain fell in long, dark streaks, and the sun refused to show so much as the quarter of an inch of a beam. But little Captain Berry knew what he was about; he just put on his sou'wester, and an oil-skin cap, and rolled around, giving his orders, with his dumpty legs wider apart than ever, looking like a tipsy letter A on a very high frolic indeed.

As to the Columbia, she said to her true lover, the first engineer, "A little water, more or less is a trifle not worth minding, old fellow; just keep my paddle-wheels up to their work." The sea-birds flew in the wake of the ship, white and gleaming, and screamed to each other, "Depend upon it, the little, red-faced Captain down there knows a thing or two! How the ship rushes through the dark waves! Let's hurry up our flipper-flappers, or we shall lose the scrapings of the dinner-plates." You see, the birds always follow ships at sea, and swoop down to catch the food that is thrown overboard. This makes the fishes as mad as hatters, but that is none of our business.

And so, down there in the engine-room, things went on like a house a-fire; that is, coal went pouring night and day into the glowing furnaces, and the boiler on top of them boiled like the great-grandfather of all the tea-kettles; and the steam rushed through the throat or pipe of the boiler with the strength of ten thousand horses, and the piston moved in the great cylinder as the steam forced it to move; and the heavy walking-beam, carried now up now down by the piston, turned the great splashing, dashing wheels, and they with resistless force bore the big ship over and through the huge waves which in vain tried to oppose her progress, but only succeeded in throwing an occasional vast shower-bath over her fore-castle deck; and on the gallant vessel went till the heights of Neversink rose in sight, and showed that smooth water and a safe haven were close at hand. And thus, sure enough, she was safe at her port in New York at a quarter to nine on the morning of the 1st of April.

The same morning Massa Charles sat in the office of his counting-house very, very busy writing letters, and making calculations. His clerks outside in the great store were very, very busy packing goods and playing tricks upon each other, when a square boy came rolling in. He was the cabin-boy of the steamship Columbia. Now walking on board ship, especially in a storm, is something like dancing on a tight rope: you have to sway and balance yourself from side to side to keep from upsetting in a sudden and unexpected manner. This swaying gait becomes a habit; and this is the reason why sailors look like walking roly-polys when they are on shore.

"Letter," said the cabin-boy, throwing it on a pile of chittybiddybophters, which are thin Indian cloths.

"Letter," said the head-clerk, handing it in to Massa Charles.

"No post-mark—must have come by private hand," thought the good little man, as he opened it.

He read it once—crossed one leg hard over the other—read it again—scratched his head, twitched his spectacles off his nose, thumped his fist with such violence on the table that the ink-stand gave a nervous little bounce in the air, and then he said—yes, I must tell you—he said, "Confound it!!!!"

You shall read the letter too. Here it is:

"DEAR CHARLES,—I have consigned to you, per steamship Columbia, two monkeys, for which see bill of lading inclosed. They were sent to me as a present from South America. At first I burst all my buttons off laughing at their droll capers; but of late they have cut a few capers too many, breaking looking-glasses, throwing stones, biting one of my fingers nearly off, and turning me blue and green with fright, by firing a pistol at my youngest child. Luckily the pistol was only capped, not loaded; but this last little joke has decided me to send them to you, and to beg that you sell them to Barnum at the best price you can get."

"One of them—the little one—is in very fine condition; he chatters, gabbles, screams, and whoops continually. The other—a large baboon—is in a very delicate state of health, owing to his diving while the vessel was in port, and biting off and swallowing one of those little goose-barnacles—shell and all—which are found sticking to the bottoms of ships. I presume he took it for a plum, which had dropped out of a pudding; at any rate, it has played the very dickens with his insides, and he requires to be very carefully nursed up; so, pray, keep them both until the baboon gets well. He must have a bowl of hot catnip tea the first thing in the morning, and you had better scratch his back gently for an hour or so, and keep a warm flannel bandage round his stomach when you take him out for exercise."

"And do be very careful to keep all the gimlets, hammers, fish-hooks, pins, and needles out of his reach, for there is no telling what he may swallow next; and don't make the catnip tea before him, or he will be drinking out of the spout of the boiling kettle the first chance; for though he is sick and miserable, it does not prevent his being up to all sorts of mischief."

"I know perfectly well that I have sent you a most pleasing commission; you are so kind to every creature thing; so, pray, let me hear very soon how you get on with your monkeys, and believe me, with kind regards to your family,

Yours faithfully, ALEXANDER BLACK."

"A-r-r-r-r!" cried Massa Charles, in a kind of roar. "Two monkeys! One of them a sick monkey! I must give him physic, and scratch his back every morning! Aleck Black must be mad! stark, staring mad!"

He bounced out of his chair, and began walking up and down the office. The next moment he rushed out. "Harris," he called to his head-clerk, "what do you think is in that abominable letter? Major Black has consigned to me two nasty, useless monkeys, which I am to sell to Barnum as soon as one of them—a sick baboon—gets well; and here I've got to sleep, with one eye open and my hair on end, for fear they'll set the house on fire. Fancy me nursing a great baboon who has swallowed a goose barnacle!"

A roar of laughter resounded through the room at this speech, and for a minute poor Massa Charles's face twisted like a cork-screw with annoyance and anger; then he, too, burst out laughing—it did seem such an utterly ridiculous thing to be sick-nurse to a monkey.

"Well," he sighed, in the midst of his laughter, "I must bear it like a philosopher. It's a very pretty kettle of fish, but it might have been worse—two alligators, or two elephants, and both of them sick. I might as well get my monkeys as soon as possible. I would board them up in the moon, with a first-class homeopathic doctor to take care of them, if any one would show me how to get them there. But that is out of the question. I must take them home; and the whole house will be instantly turned upside down. This is an awful crisis! I shall go distracted!"

The good little man polished his beaver hat on the elbow of his coat, then looked disconsolately into the crown of it, then thumped it hard on his head, then making a sound like "st-st-st," with his tongue on the roof of his mouth, he went out, slamming the door behind him.

"I can't walk along the streets holding the monkeys by the hands like two children," he said to himself, with a grunting kind of sigh. "That won't do! for all the little ragamuffins would be after us with sticks and stones; the monkeys would show fight; then there would be a precious row, and I should be trotted off to the station-house or a lunatic asylum! I'd better take a carriage, I think. What if the monkeys should stare out of the windows and scream murder at the people, or go to scratching, and kicking, and punching, and pounding me inside! I will buy them some lemon-drops and lollipops. They will certainly sit still while they are gobbling up the candies."

So he put on his spectacles and went into a candy-shop, and said to the pretty young lady behind the counter, "My love, I'm in a terrible predicament—"

"Yes, Sir," interrupted the pretty young lady, shutting up the money-drawer with a snap, to let him know that there was no change for his predicament in that.

"Don't be impatient, my dear; let me explain. I've got two monkeys on my hands."

"I have a great many on mine," said the pretty young lady, laughing.

"No! You don't say so! How do they behave themselves, my dear?"

"Why, Sir, they come into the shop and pretend they want to buy candy, and stand round staring and grinning at me—a set of lazy, idle clerks. They ought to go off and work on farms, and leave the shops to us poor girls."

"Oho!" said Massa Charles, "you mean the young fellows by your monkeys. You are quite right, my dear—measuring tapes and ribbons is contemptible work for strong hands and broad shoulders; but I am really in a peck of trouble! I have really two monkeys to take care of, and I want a pound of lemon-drops and another of lollipops to keep them quiet."

The pretty young lady weighed them out, and Massa Charles paid for them with a heart-rending sigh. It comforted him a little to give some out of each paper of candies to two mites of poor children who were passing by sucking their thumbs; and on the way to the livery-stable he got rid of all the pennies he had to the little crossing-sweepers. Then hiring a nice, close carriage he ordered the coachman to drive him down to the steamship Columbia.

Captain Berry was standing on top of the paddle-box giving orders, and he saw Massa Charles the very first thing. He knew him intimately, and called him by his Christian name.

"Hallo, Charley! 's that you? How very grand we are, riding down in our coach like the Mayor! What's in the wind?"

"Oh, yes, it's all very well for you to pretend you don't know. Where's those confounded monkeys?"

"Monkeys?"

"Yes, monkeys!"

"Mon—keys?" asked Captain Berry, in a very high key, elevating his eyebrows and rising on his tip-toes; then, straddling his little fat legs farther apart than ever, he said, very slowly:

"May—I—ask—what monkeys?"

"Why, Sir," bawled Massa Charles, now extremely provoked, "did you not send me a letter this morning?"

"I did, Sir."

"Well, Sir, that letter contained a bill of lading signed by 'A. Stultus, first mate,' for two monkeys, one of them sick. I hope—I mean, I suppose they have died on the passage, and you are afraid I shall blame you. On the contrary, if they have departed this life I forgive you at once, and with all my heart."

"W-h-e-w!" whistled Captain Berry; then hailing the first mate: "What's your name?" said he.

"Ford, Sir; I thought you knew it."

"So I do; but I want this gentleman to know it too. He thinks it is Stultus. Call all the crew here."

In three minutes every sailor was shuffling and rolling up to where Captain Berry and Massa Charles stood, wondering what could be the matter.

"Boys, do you know any thing about two monkeys being put on board at Charleston?" asked the Captain.

"No, Sir!" they shouted like one man, but winking at each other, for sailors are as great fellows to snuff a joke in the wind as a gale.

"Read your letter, Charley," said the jolly little Captain.

Massa Charles read it aloud amidst roars of laughter from "all hands."

"What's the date of it, Charley?" asked the jolly little Captain.

"1st of April," answered Massa Charles, with an innocent stare of surprise, as Captain Berry, slapping his sides and fairly screaming with laughter, cried, "Oh, what a joke! what a capital joke! Major Black was very anxious that you should get that letter to-day—he wrote it three days ago, and dated it to-day; don't you see, the scamp has made a first-class April fool of you!"

"Ha, ha, ha! ha, ha, ha! ha, ha, ha! ha, ha, ha!" roared Massa Charles, and almost went into fits with laughing, he was so tickled to find that the monkeys were of the kind that come on the 1st of April and never any other time; even "Stultus" the first mate's name was Latin for "fool;" but that never occurred to him until all the rest came out.

"I'll be even with my friend Alick," he said, still laughing, as the Captain invited him down in the cabin to lunch, where the two "talked it over," and had a very jolly time.

Then that dear, kind, credulous father of mine came home, before he returned to his business, and told us how that good-for-nothing big mischief Major Black had made a tremendous April fool of him, and my little brother was so enchanted with the story that he tried "to play second fiddle," as father said—for he slyly fastened a long string to father's coat-tail, and turned somersaults of delight when the good man walked gravely off trailing the string behind him, but I took it off at the front-door.

We children ate up the lemon-drops and lollipops, instead of the monkeys; and so, now, this is a true story, which I hope you will get and read on this coming first of April. But the printers are very slippery people, and there is no certainty about it at all.

"AUNT FANNY."

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE series of Oratorios which have been given during the past season at Steinway Hall, under the direction of Mr. Harrison, have proved to be exceedingly popular. There is evidently in our community a growing interest in, and love for, this style of sacred music. The performances have been not merely well attended, but they have been crowded. At the last Oratorio of the season, when Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was given, every available place where one could sit or stand was filled. The entire performance gave great satisfaction. But prominent among the parts that rest in our memory are the quartette, "Cast thy burden on the Lord," sung by Madame Rosa, Mrs. Kempton, Messrs. Simpson and Thomas, and the terzetto, "Lift thine eyes," by Madame Rosa, Mrs. Reed, and Mrs. Kempton. The aria "Oh, rest in the Lord," sung by Mrs. Kempton, was warmly encored. Madame Rosa, and indeed all the principal singers were in excellent voice, and the New York Harmonic Society did themselves much credit. We hope in future seasons there will be a similar series of Oratorios given to the public.

A new method of embalming dead bodies has recently been invented, and is just being brought into public notice in this city. The principle originated with Professor Seely, whose antiseptic preparation, applied to specimens of the Stafford pavement, has already attracted a good deal of attention among scientific men, and the public generally. This principle has been most ingeniously applied to preserving human bodies, by a very simple process, without mutilation, and for an indefinite length of time. Just how long a body may be preserved by this method of embalming is yet uncertain. But there is now at the Morgue one body which has been perfectly preserved for more than three months, and another which was embalmed about six weeks ago. The form, color, and features are perfectly retained, and decomposition wholly arrested. This new invention will undoubtedly prove a valuable one, especially as the application is so simple that it can easily be made by any person. It will probably supersede the use of ice, and will certainly be a great comfort to those whose friends die at a distance, and who will be thus enabled once more to look on their face.

A new market has been opened at the corner of Washington and Bank streets, and called the Upper Washington Market. It is intended for the accommodation of persons residing in the upper portions of the city, and though small is believed to be sufficiently large for the business to be transacted. The second-floor will be rented as stores or offices. There are 61 stalls, all of which have been leased. The passages between the stalls are some fifteen feet wide, thus allowing ample space for persons to pass and repass without being shoved against greasy meat to the great detriment of their garments. The internal fittings are all new, and on the most improved plan, and the cost of the structure is about $50,000. The market will be supplied with the same variety of edibles as the lower market.

Mr. Edwin Booth's new theatre, now in process of construction at the corner of Twenty-third Street and Sixth Avenue, is to be heated entirely by steam pipes communicating with outside engines. In addition to the main entrance on Twenty-third Street, there will be four smaller doors opening on that street, to be used in case of fire, which, with the wide entrance on Sixth Avenue, will afford fair means of egress in case of alarm. This theatre is to be completed before the close of the year, and the inner walls are gradually rising, but operations have been somewhat delayed by the discovery that a few feet below the surface is solid rock, which requires extensive and tedious blasting.

It is generally understood that Mr. Dickens has accepted an invitation to a press dinner to be given in his honor on the 18th of April at Delmonico's. The proposed dinner promises to be a most brilliant affair, and every way worthy the enterprise and liberality of New York journalists.

It is said that Queen Victoria is exceedingly fond of knitting—not fancy work, but good, old-fashioned stockings and socks, and that she gives these products of her industry to the destitute poor about Balmoral. Consequently, knitting has become fashionable among English ladies.

It is announced that the ladies of some town in Pennsylvania are to give a ball for the benefit of the cemetery in that place! Rather a gloomy subject to dance upon!

A California journal tells a wonderful story of a man who lived five years with a rifle-ball in his head. Some ladies live twice as long as that with, apparently, nothing but balls in their heads.

If the custom so prevalent in France and Germany, of small families occupying suits of rooms instead of large houses, should become genuinely fashionable in New York, the effect would be good in many respects. It would reduce rents, and give a young couple just commencing life a chance to "lay up" something. Now every one desires, naturally enough, to live in a "first-class" house; but first-class houses eat up a man's salary when he is but just commencing business. Why can we not have nice houses—"brown-stone fronts," if you please—arranged in suits of apartments for the many who want to live pleasantly and even stylishly, but who can not afford to pay their entire income for a dwelling? This is done in Paris and in many of the German cities. In Bremen, for instance, the family of many a man doing a large business, and moving in society of the highest respectability, often occupy but one floor, and every room is furnished with great simplicity. If a man indulges a disposition to get into a more aristocratic circle by buying a large house on a fashionable street, beautifying it with costly furniture, giving great entertainments, and appearing every afternoon with a large equipage, on any thing less than an immense fortune, the presumption is that either he or his wife has been in America. A traveler writing from Hamburg remarks: "A young couple going to board at a hotel would be considered insane here." They commence housekeeping in a quiet, economical way, taking a suit of rooms corresponding to their means. Fashionable boarding-houses are things unknown. If young people would resolutely commence life on a moderate scale, within their means, living quietly, tastefully, and happily until a competence was secured, there would then be no objection to buying an elegant house as they could afford, and living in it in corresponding style.

The height of the orange "season" with us has passed, but a very abundant season it has been, and still plenty of the luscious fruit is on sale, though prices are somewhat higher than a few weeks ago. Almost every one enjoys this fruit, and consequently it is a matter of general interest that the cultivation of oranges in Florida has attracted the attention of thousands who have recently located themselves there. A great many groves have been planted on the Gulf coast, and on the banks of numerous lakes and rivers, as well as in some interior localities; and if present indications prove true, Florida will soon produce fruit enough to supply the Northern market. On Lake Griffin a northern man has made a grove of 4500 trees simply by clearing a hummock of forty acres. This is probably the largest grove in the State, and is three times as large as any grove now in bearing. "Dummitt's Grove" on the Indian River is probably the largest fruit-bearing grove. It contains 1500 trees and covers about 15 acres. Wild orange-trees, producing sour fruit, grow abundantly in Florida. The tree is a beautiful one, and almost identical in appearance with the sweet orange-tree. Of course, its beauty is greatly enhanced by the fruit, and sometimes a single tree will bear a thousand oranges, and even more. A short time since some oranges were exhibited in Jacksonville, Florida, measuring from nineteen to twenty-three inches in circumference. These were raised at Mandarin by a gentleman who stated that one of his trees bore 5400 fair oranges, and two others, over 3000 each. Oranges in Florida begin to ripen in November, but are seldom picked then. They will hang for months on the trees, growing riper and sweeter. The fruit adheres very closely to the stem, and rarely falls off. Nor is it a very easy matter always to pick it, as sharp thorns make the task difficult. The sour orange, which grows wild in Florida, is a native of Africa, and was introduced into Florida long ago by the Spaniards.

In an amusing letter in the Victoria Magazine, Madame Novello says: "An intimacy with German literature has not prevented my knitting socks by dozens for my brother; the study of music and counterpoint has never been in my way when making a linseed poultice; and a slight acquaintance with anatomy has materially aided me when making rag dolls for the ecstatic gratification of poor children."

The custom of turning down one corner of a visiting card before leaving it at the door of a cherished friend has been translated to mean: "I love you dearly, and I am dying to see you, as you will perceive by looking at the inch of pasteboard."

A lady in Troy uses the local papers to announce that the young gentlemen who have attended her receptions have ruined the paper on the walls of her parlor, and she has been forced to have the room entirely repapered. The walls have been used as head-rests. Oiled young men should take heed in future.

Henry Ward Beecher, in discoursing on different methods of family discipline, inquires: "Is there no virtue in a sugar-plum? Shall we never break the will with a lump-sugar? May not encouragements prevent many of the mischiefs which penalties atone for? May not more sugar-plums be used and fewer rods?" Questions which might profitably be considered in those families—alas, they are many!—where the children's faces wear an anxious and frightened look; where little ones shrink and tremble at the sound of their father's voice, and hide away at the approach of their mother; where voluntary wrong-doing, unintentional disobedience, and accidental mishaps, are indiscriminately punished with severe and hasty blows; where stern so-called justice visits the least deviation from rules with swift retribution; where, in short, parents seem utterly to forget that they themselves are erring, and are not dealt with according to their transgressions. There is a happy medium between undue severity and ruinous indulgence. Parents should seek it. But very few find it. And this topic brings to mind a story we have lately seen. It purports to have been written by a little girl; and certainly contains progressive views of family discipline! Perhaps she had been reading about the "sugar-plum" system, and became radical upon the subject! Here is the story in brief:

THE GOOD LITTLE GIRL WHO TOLD THE TRUTH AND ATE THE GUAVA JELLY.—Once there was a dear little girl whose name was Nellie. She was a good little girl and always told the truth. One day Nellie's mamma went out to buy her some paper dollies. In the closet there were lots of sweet things from Havana. Boxes of guava jelly, boxes of preserved lemons, and all kinds of fruits in boxes and bottles. When her mamma had gone little Nellie went to look at the pretty boxes and bottles, and she thought she would taste some guava jelly. She tasted it, and ate up all the box full, and she thought it was splendid.

When her mamma came home Nellie ran up to her and said, "I am so glad you have got home, for I want to tell you something."

"What is it, darling?" said her mamma. "Well, mamma, I don't know how you will like it, but I have been eating the guava jelly. I have eaten a whole box. But it looked so good, and I wanted it so much!" "You are a precious child! How glad I am that my daughter always tells the truth." And her good mother sat down with Nellie and cut out her paper dollies, and pasted the pretty dresses, and told her of all the pretty things she had seen in the toy-shop, and promised that to-morrow Nellie should go and see them herself. And she put some of each kind of the sweet things down on the low shelf, and told Nellie she could go and get some when she wanted.

The moral is obvious.

CORD AND CREESE; OR, THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XII.

THEY MEET AGAIN.

At four o'clock on the morning of Beatrice's capture Brandon was roused by a rap at his bedroom door. He rose at once, and slipping on his dressing-gown, opened it. A man entered.

"Well?" said Brandon.

"Something has happened."

"What?"

"She didn't get home last night. The landlady is sitting up for her, and is terribly frightened."

"Did you make any inquiries?"

"No, Sir; I came straight here in obedience to your directions."

"Is that all you know?"

"All."

"Very well," said Brandon, calmly, "you may go."

The man retired. Brandon sat down and buried his head in his hands. Such news as this was sufficient to overwhelm any one. The man knew nothing more than this, that she had not returned home and that the landlady was frightened. In his opinion only one of two things could have happened: either Langhetti had taken her somewhere, or she had been abducted.

A thousand fancies followed one another in quick succession. It was too early as yet to go forth to make inquiries; and he therefore was forced to sit still and form conjectures as to what ought to be done in case his conjecture might be true. Sitting there, he took a rapid survey of all the possibilities of the occasion, and laid his plans accordingly.

Brandon had feared some calamity, and with this fear had arranged to have some one in the house who might give him information. The information which he most dreaded had come; it had come, too, in the midst of a time of triumph, when she had become one of the supreme singers of the age, and had gained all that her warmest admirer might desire for her.

If she had not been foully dealt with she must have gone with Langhetti. But if so—where—and why? What possible reason might Langhetti have for taking her away? This conjecture was impossible.

Yet if this was impossible, and if she had not gone with Langhetti, with whom could she have gone? If not a friend, then it must have been with an enemy. But with what enemy? There was only one.

He thought of Potts. He knew that this wretch was capable of any villainy, and would not hesitate at any thing to regain possession of the one who had fled from him. Why he should wish to take the trouble to regain possession of her, except out of pure villainy, he could not imagine.

With such thoughts as these the time passed heavily. Six o'clock at last came, and he set out for the purpose of making inquiries. He went first to the theatre. Here, after some trouble, he found those who had the place in charge, and, by questioning them, he learned that Beatrice had left by herself in a cab for her home, and that Langhetti had remained some time later. He then went to Beatrice's lodgings to question the landlady. From there he went to Langhetti's lodgings, and found that Langhetti had come home about one o'clock and was not yet up.

Beatrice, therefore, had left by herself, and had not gone any where with Langhetti. She had not returned home. It seemed to him most probable that either voluntarily or involuntarily she had come under the control of Potts. What to do under these circumstances was now the question.

One course seemed to him the most direct and certain; namely, to go up to Brandon at once and make inquiries there. From the letters which Philips had sent he had an idea of the doings of Potts. Other sources of information had also been secured. It was not his business to do any thing more than to see that Beatrice should fall into no harm.

By ten o'clock he had acted upon this idea, and was at the railway station to take the express train. He reached Brandon village about dusk. He went to the inn in his usual disguise as Mr. Smithers, and sent up to the hall for Mr. Potts.

Potts was not there. He then sent for Philips. After some delay Philips came. His usual timidity was now if possible still more marked, and he was at first too embarrassed to speak.

"Where is Potts?" asked Brandon, abruptly.

"In London, Sir."

"He has been there about three weeks, hasn't he?"

"Yes, Sir."

"So you wrote me. You thought when he went that he was going to hunt up his daughter."

"So I conjectured."

"And he hasn't got back yet?"

"Not yet."

"Has he written any word?"

"None that I know of."

"Did you hear any of them say why he went to get her?"

"Not particularly; but I guessed from what they said that he was afraid of having her at large."

"Afraid? Why?"

"Because she knew some secret of theirs."

"Secret! What secret?" asked Brandon.

"You know, Sir, I suppose," said Philips, meekly.

Brandon had carried Asgeelo with him, as he was often in the habit of doing on his journeys. After his interview with Philips he stood outside on the veranda of the village inn for some time, and then went around through the village, stopping at a number of houses. Whatever it was that he was engaged in, it occupied him for several hours, and he did not get back to the inn till midnight.

On the following morning he sent up to the Hall, but Potts had not yet returned. Philips came to tell him that he had just received a telegraphic dispatch informing him that Potts would be back that day about one o'clock. This intelligence at last seemed to promise something definite.

Brandon found enough to occupy him during the morning among the people of the neighborhood. He seemed to know every body, and had something to say to every one. Yet no one looked at him or spoke to him unless he took the initiative. Last of all, he went to the tailor's, where he spent an hour.

Asgeelo had been left at the inn, and sat there upon a bench outside, apparently idle and aimless. At one o'clock Brandon returned and walked up and down the veranda.

About half an hour his attention was attracted by the sound of wheels. It was Potts's barouche, which came rapidly up the road. In it was Potts and a young lady.

Brandon stood outside of the veranda, on the steps, in such a position as to be most conspicuous, and waited there till the carriage should reach the place. Did his heart beat faster as he recognized that form, as he marked the settled despair which had gathered over that young face—a face that had the fixed and unalterable wretchedness which marks the ideal face of the Mater Dolorosa?

Brandon stood in such a way that Potts could not help seeing him. He waved his arm, and Potts stopped the carriage at once.

Potts was seated on the front seat, and Beatrice on the back one. Brandon walked up to the carriage and touched his hat.

"Mr. Smithers!" cried Potts, with his usual volubility. "Dear me, Sir. This is really a most unexpected pleasure, Sir."

While Potts spoke Brandon looked steadily at Beatrice, who cast upon him a look of wonder. She then sank back in her seat; but her eyes were still fastened on his as though fascinated. Then, beneath the marble whiteness of her face a faint tinge appeared, a warm flush, that was the sign of hope rising from despair. In her eyes there gleamed the flash of recognition; for in that glance each had made known all its soul to the other. In her mind there was no perplexing question as to how or why he came here, or wherefore he wore that disguise; the one thought that she had was the consciousness that he was here—here before her.

All this took place in an instant, and Potts, who was talking, did not notice the hurried glance; or if he did, saw in it nothing but a casual look cast by one stranger upon another.

"I arrived here yesterday," said Brandon. "I wished to see you about a matter of very little importance perhaps to you, but it is one which is of interest to me. But I am detaining you. By-the-way, I am somewhat in a hurry, and if this lady will excuse me I will drive up with you to the Hall, so as to lose no time."

"Delighted, Sir, delighted!" cried Potts. "Allow me, Mr. Smithers, to introduce you to my daughter."

Brandon held out his hand. Beatrice held out hers. It was cold as ice, but the fierce thrill that shot through her frame at the touch of his feverish hand brought with it such an ecstasy that Beatrice thought it was worth while to have undergone the horror of the past twenty-four hours for the joy of this one moment.

Brandon stepped into the carriage and seated himself by her side. Potts sat opposite. He touched her. He could hear her breathing. How many months had passed since they sat so near together! What sorrows had they not endured! Now they were side by side, and for a moment they forgot that their bitterest enemy sat before them.

There, before them, was the man who was not only a deadly enemy to each, but who made it impossible for them to be more to one another than they now were. Yet for a time they forgot this in the joy of the ecstatic meeting. At the gate Potts got out and excused himself to Brandon, saying that he would be up directly.

"Entertain this gentleman till I come," said he to Beatrice, "for he is a great friend of mine."

Beatrice said nothing, for the simple reason that she could not speak.

They drove on. Oh, joy! that baleful presence was for a moment removed. The driver saw nothing as he drove under the overarching elms—the elms under which Brandon had sported in his boyhood. He saw not the long, fervid glance that they cast at one another, in which each seemed to absorb all the being of the other; he saw not the close clasped hands with which they clung to one another now as though they would thus cling to each other forever and prevent separation. He saw not the swift, wild movement of Brandon when for one instant he flung his arm around Beatrice and pressed her to his heart. He heard not the beating of that strong heart; he heard not the low sigh of rapture with which for but one instant the head of Beatrice sank upon her lover's breast. It was but for an instant. Then she sat upright again, and their hands sought each other, thus clinging, thus speaking by a voice which was fully intelligible to each, which told how each felt in the presence of the other love unutterable, rapture beyond expression.

They alighted from the carriage. Beatrice led the way into the drawing-room. No one was there. Brandon went into a recess of one of the windows which commanded a view of the Park.

"What a beautiful view!" said he, in a conventional voice.

She came up and stood beside him.

"Oh, my darling! Oh, my darling!" he cried, over and over again; and flinging his arms around her he covered her face with burning kisses. Her whole being seemed in that supreme moment to be absorbed in his. All consciousness of any other thing than this unspeakable joy was lost to her. Before all others she was lofty, high-souled, serene, self-possessed—with him she was nothing, she lost herself in him.

"Do not fear, my soul's darling," said he; "no harm shall come. My power is every where—even in this house. All in the village are mine. When my blow falls you shall be saved."

She shuddered.

"You will leave me here?"

"Heavens! I must," he groaned; "we are the sport of circumstances. Oh, my darling!" he continued, "you know my story, and my vengeance."

"I know it all," she whispered. "I would wish to die if I could die by your hand."

"I will save you. Oh, love—oh, soul of mine—my arms are around you! You are watched—but watched by me."

"You do not know," she sighed. "Alas! your father's voice must be obeyed, and your vengeance must be taken."

"Fear not," said he; "I will guard you."

She answered nothing. Could she confide in his assurance? She could not. She thought with horror of the life before her. What could Brandon do? She could not imagine.

They stood thus in silence for a long time. Each felt that this was their last meeting, and each threw all life and all thought into the rapture of this long and ecstatic embrace. After this the impassable gulf must reopen. She was of the blood of the accursed. They must separate forever.

He kissed her. He pressed her a thousand times to his heart. His burning kisses forced a new and feverish life into her, which roused all her nature. Never before had he dared so to fling open all his soul to her; never before had he so clasped her to his heart; but now this moment was a break in the agony of a long separation—a short interval which must soon end and give way to the misery which had preceded it—and so he yielded to the rapture of the hour, and defied the future.

The moments extended themselves. They were left thus for a longer time than they hoped. Potts did not come. They were still clinging to one another. She had flung her arms around him in the anguish of her unspeakable love, he had clasped her to his wildly-throbbing heart, and he was straining her there recklessly and despairingly, when suddenly a harsh voice burst upon their ears.

"The devil!"

Beatrice did not hear it. Brandon did, and turned his face. Potts stood before them.

"Mr. Potts!" said he, as he still held Beatrice close to his heart, "this poor young lady is in wretched health. She nearly fainted. I had to almost carry her to the window. Will you be good enough to open it, so as to give her some air? Is she subject to these faints? Poor child!" he said; "the air of this place ought surely to do you good. I sympathize with you most deeply, Mr. Potts."

"She's sickly—that's a fact," said Potts. "I'm very sorry that you have had so much trouble—I hope you'll excuse me. I only thought that she'd entertain you, for she's very clever. Has all the accomplishments—"

"Perhaps you'd better call some one to take care of her," interrupted Brandon.

"Oh, I'll fetch some one. I'm sorry it happened so. I hope you won't blame me, Sir," said Potts, humbly, and he hurried out of the room.

Beatrice had not moved. She heard Brandon speak to some one, and at first gave herself up for lost, but in an instant she understood the full meaning of his words. To his admirable presence of mind she added her own. She did not move, but allowed her head to rest where it was, feeling a delicious joy in the thought that Potts was looking on and was utterly deceived. When he left to call a servant she raised her head and gave Brandon a last look expressive of her deathless, her unutterable love. Again and again he pressed her to his heart. Then the noise of servants coming in roused him. He gently placed her on a sofa, and supported her with a grave and solemn face.

"Here, Mrs. Compton. Take charge of her," said Potts. "She's been trying to faint."

Mrs. Compton came up, and kneeling down kissed Beatrice's hands. She said nothing.

"Oughtn't she to have a doctor?" said Brandon.

"Oh no—she'll get over it. Take her to her room, Mrs. Compton."

"Can the poor child walk?" asked Brandon. Beatrice rose. Mrs. Compton asked her to take her arm. She did so, and leaning heavily upon it, walked away.

"She seems very delicate," said Brandon. "I did not know that you had a daughter."

Potts sighed.

"I have," said he, "to my sorrow."

"To your sorrow!" said Brandon, with exquisitely simulated sympathy.

"Yes," replied the other. "I wouldn't tell it to every one—but you, Mr. Smithers, are different from most people. You see I have led a roving life. I had to leave her out in China for many years with a female guardian. I suppose she was not very well taken care of. At any rate, she got acquainted out there with a strolling Italian vagabond, a drum-major in one of the regiments, named Langhetti, and this villain gained her affections by his hellish arts. He knew that I was rich, and, like an unprincipled adventurer, tried to get her, hoping to get a fortune. I did not know any thing about this till after her arrival home. I sent for her some time ago and she came. From the first she was very sulky. She did not treat me like a daughter at all. On one occasion she actually abused me and called me names to my face. She called me a Thug! What do you think of that, Mr. Smithers?"

"THE DEVIL!"..... POTTS STOOD BEFORE THEM.

The other said nothing, but there was in his face a horror which Potts considered as directed toward his unnatural offspring.

"She was discontented here, though I let her have every thing. I found out in the end all about it. At last she actually ran away. She joined this infamous Langhetti, whom she had discovered in some way or other. They lived together for some time, and then went to London, where she got a situation as an actress. You can imagine by that," said Potts, with sanctimonious horror, "how low she had fallen. Well, I didn't know what to do. I was afraid to make a public demand for her through the law, for then it would all get into the papers; it would be an awful disgrace, and the whole county would know it. So I waited, and a few weeks ago I went to London. A chance occurred at last which threw her in my way. I pointed out to her the awful nature of the life she was leading, and offered to forgive her all if she would only come back. The poor girl consented, and here she is. But I'm very much afraid," said Potts in conclusion, with a deep sigh, "that her constitution is broken up. She's very feeble."

Brandon said nothing.

"Excuse me for troubling you with my domestic affairs; but I thought I ought to explain, for you have had such trouble with her yourself."

"Oh, don't mention it. I quite pitied the poor child, I assure you; and I sincerely hope that the seclusion of this place, combined with the pure sea-air, may restore her spirits and invigorate her in mind as well as in body. And now, Mr. Potts, I will mention the little matter that brought me here. I have had business in Cornwall, and was on my way home when I received a letter summoning me to America. I may have to go to California. I have a very honest servant, whom I have quite a strong regard for, and I am anxious to put him in some good country house till I get back. I'm afraid to trust him in London, and I can't take him with me. He is a Hindu, but speaks English and can do almost any thing. I at once remembered you, especially as you were close by me, and thought that in your large establishment you might find a place for him. How is it?"

"My dear Sir, I shall be proud and happy. I should like, above all things, to have a man here who is recommended by one like you. The fact is, my servants are all miserable, and a good one can not often be had. I shall consider it a favor if I can get him."

"Well, that is all arranged—I have a regard for him, as I said before, and want to have him in a pleasant situation. His name is Asgeelo, but we are in the habit of calling him Cato—"

"Cato! a very good name. Where is he now?"

"At the hotel. I will send him to you at once," said Brandon, rising.

"The sooner the better," returned Potts.

"By-the-way, my junior speaks very encouragingly about the prospects of the Brandon Bank—"

"Does he?" cried Potts, gleefully. "Well, I do believe we're going ahead of every thing."

"That's right. Boldness is the true way to success."

"Oh, never fear. We are bold enough."

"Good. But I am hurried, and I must go. I will send Asgeelo up, and give him a letter."

With these words Brandon bowed an adieu and departed. Before evening Asgeelo was installed as one of the servants.

CHAPTER XLII.

LANGHETTI'S ATTEMPT.

Two days after Brandon's visit to Potts, Langhetti reached the village.

A searching examination in London had led him to believe that Beatrice might now be sought for at Brandon Hall. The police could do nothing for him. He had no right to her. If she was of age, she was her own mistress, and must make application herself for her safety and deliverance; if she was under age, then she must show that she was treated with cruelty. None of these things could be done, and Langhetti despaired of accomplishing any thing.

The idea of her being once more in the power of a man like Potts was frightful to him. This idea filled his mind continually, to the exclusion of all other thoughts. His opera was forgotten. One great horror stood before him, and all else became of no account. The only thing for him to do was to try to save her. He could find no way, and therefore determined to go and see Potts himself.

It was a desperate undertaking. From Beatrice's descriptions he had an idea of the life from which she had fled, and other things had given him a true idea of the character of Potts. He knew that there was scarcely any hope before him. Yet he went, to satisfy himself by making a last effort.

He was hardly the man to deal with one like Potts. Sensitive, high-toned, passionate, impetuous in his feelings, he could not command that calmness which was the first essential in such an interview. Besides, he was broken down by anxiety and want of sleep. His sorrow for Beatrice had disturbed all his thoughts. Food and sleep were alike abominable to him. His fine-strung nerves and delicate organization, in which every feeling had been rendered more acute by his mode of life, were of that kind which could feel intensely wherever the affections were concerned. His material frame was too weak for the presence of such an ardent soul. Whenever any emotion of unusual power appeared he sank rapidly.

So now, feverish, emaciated, excited to an intense degree, he appeared in Brandon to confront a cool, unemotional villain, who scarcely ever lost his presence of mind. Such a contest could scarcely be an equal one. What could he bring forward which could in any way affect such a man? He had some ideas in his own mind which he imagined might be of service, and trusted more to impulse than any thing else. He went up early in the morning to Brandon Hall.

Potts was at home, and did not keep Langhetti long waiting.

There was a vast contrast between these two men—the one coarse, fat, vulgar, and strong; the other refined, slender, spiritual, and delicate, with his large eyes burning in their deep sockets, and a strange mystery in his face.

"I am Paolo Langhetti," said he, abruptly—"the manager of the Covent Garden Theatre."

"You are, are you?" answered Potts, rudely; "then the sooner you get out of this the better. The devil himself couldn't be more impudent. I have just saved my daughter from your clutches, and I'm going to pay you off, too, my fine fellow, before long."

"Your daughter!" said Langhetti. "What she is, and who she is, you very well know. If the dead could speak they would tell a different story."

"What the devil do you mean," cried Potts, "by the dead? At any rate you are a fool; for very naturally the dead can't speak; but what concern that has with my daughter I don't know. Mind, you are playing a dangerous game in trying to bully me."

Potts spoke fiercely and menacingly. Langhetti's impetuous soul kindled to a new fervor at this insulting language. He stretched out his long, thin hand toward Potts, and said:

"I hold your life and fortune in my hand. Give up that girl whom you call your daughter."

Potts stood for a moment staring.

"The devil you do!" he cried, at last. "Come, I call that good, rich, racy! Will your sublime Excellency have the kindness to explain yourself? If my life is in your hand it's in a devilish lean and weak one. It strikes me you've got some kink in your brain—some notion or other. Out with it, and let us see what you're driving at!"

"Do you know a man named Cigole?" said Langhetti.

"Cigole!" replied Potts, after a pause, in which he had stared hard at Langhetti; "well, what if I do? Perhaps I do, and perhaps I don't."

"He is in my power," said Langhetti, vehemently.

"Much good may he do you then, for I'm sure when he was in my power he never did any good to me."

"He will do good in this case, at any rate," said Langhetti, with an effort at calmness. "He was connected with you in a deed which you must remember, and can tell to the world what he knows."

"Well, what if he does?" said Potts.

"He will tell," cried Langhetti, excitedly, "the true story of the Despard murder."

"Ah!" said Potts, "now the murder's out. That's what I thought. Don't you suppose I saw through you when you first began to speak so mysteriously? I knew that you had learned some wonderful story, and that you were going to trot it out at the right time. But if you think you're going to bully me you'll find it hard work."

"Cigole is in my power," said Langhetti, fiercely.

"And so you think I am, too?" sneered Potts.

"Partly so."

"Why?"

"Because he was an accomplice of yours in the Despard murder."

"So he says, no doubt; but who'll believe him?"

"He is going to turn Queen's evidence!" said Langhetti, solemnly.

"Queen's evidence!" returned Potts, contemptuously, "and what's his evidence worth—the evidence of a man like that against a gentleman of unblemished character?"

"He will be able to show what the character of that gentleman is," rejoined Langhetti.

"Who will believe him?"

"No one can help it."

"You believe him, no doubt. You and he are both Italians—both dear friends—and both enemies of mine; but suppose I prove to the world conclusively that Cigole is such a scoundrel that his testimony is worthless?"

"You can't," cried Langhetti, furiously.

Potts cast a look of contempt at him—

"Can't I!" He resumed: "How very simple, how confiding you must be, my dear Langhetti! Let me explain my meaning. You get up a wild charge against a gentleman of character and position about a murder. In the first place, you seem to forget that the real murderer has long since been punished. That miserable devil of a Malay was very properly convicted at Manila, and hanged there. It was twenty years ago. What English court would consider the case again after a calm and impartial Spanish court has settled it finally, and punished the criminal?"

"They did so at the time when the case was fresh, and I came forth honored and triumphant. You now bring forward a man who, you hint, will make statements against me. Suppose he does? What then? Why, I will show what this man is. And you, my dear Langhetti, will be the first one whom I will bring up against him. I will bring you up under oath, and make you tell how this Cigole—this man who testifies against me—once made a certain testimony in Sicily against a certain Langhetti senior, by which that certain Langhetti senior was betrayed to the Government, and was saved only by the folly of two Englishmen, one of whom was this same Despard. I will show that this Langhetti senior was your father, and that the son, instead of avenging, or, at any rate resenting his father's wrong, is now a bosom friend of his father's intended murderer—that he has urged him on against me. I will show, my dear Langhetti, how you have led a roving life, and, when a drum-major at Hong Kong, won the affections of my daughter; how you followed her here, and seduced her away from a kind father; how at infinite risk I regained her; how you came to me with audacious threats; and how only the dread of further scandal, and my own anxious love for my daughter, prevented me from handing you over to the authorities. I will prove you to be a scoundrel of the vilest description, and, after such proof as this, what do you think would be the verdict of an English jury, or of any judge in any land; and what do you think would be your own fate? Answer me that."

Potts spoke with savage vehemence. The frightful truth flashed at once across Langhetti's mind that Potts had it in his power here to show all this to the world. He was overwhelmed. He had never conceived the possibility of this. Potts watched him silently, with a sneer on his face.

"Don't you think that you had better go and comfort yourself with your dear friend Cigole, your father's intended murderer?" said he at length. "Cigole told me all about this long ago. He told me many things about his life which would be slightly damaging to his character as a witness, but I don't mind telling you that the worst thing against him in English eyes is his betrayal of your father. But this seems to have been a very slight matter to you. It's odd too; I've always supposed that Italians understood what vengeance means."

Langhetti's face bore an expression of agony which he could not conceal. Every word of Potts stung him to the soul. He stood for some time in silence. At last, without a word, he walked out of the room.

His brain reeled. He staggered rather than walked. Potts looked after him with a smile of triumph. He left the Hall and returned to the village.

MISS EMMA HUNT.

THE accompanying illustration is copied by permission from a photograph of Miss EMMA HUNT, who has recently been appointed Chief Enrolling Clerk of the Kansas House of Representatives—an office never before held by a woman. Mr. H. B. Norton, the Associate Principal of the Kansas State Normal School, says of the young lady: "Miss Hunt was for two years an able and faithful pupil in the Normal School, where she showed eminent capacity for doing clerical work. She has given complete satisfaction in the discharge of her duties, and rules her five male and female clerks in a way which shows that she is not entirely outside the pale of 'Woman's Sphere.'"

It is gratifying to chronicle such instances of the gradual expansion of woman's field of labor. There is no reason indeed why women should not fill similar governmental posts as conscientiously and effectively as men. New occupations are opening for them every where. Indeed, it is fast coming to be acknowledged that there is nothing within reason which a woman may not do, provided that she does it thoroughly well, and, withal, in a womanly manner.

MISS EMMA HUNT, CHIEF ENROLLING CLERK OF THE KANSAS HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

HARRY'S HORSE.

THE baby lies in her mother's arms,
Quiet and pale and thin;
But the little head is once more raised
As Harry comes bounding in.

A wooden horse in his hand he holds,
Dark gray, with a long black mane;
And an eager, longing look lights up
The pale little face again.

"No, baby dear, I will hold it close,
But I can not give it to you;
I'm afraid you would let it fall, and break
My horse, so pretty and new."

But the pale little eager face still pleads,
Outstretched is the small hand still;
He stands for a moment, then holds it out,
"I'll lend it baby, I will!"....

That day is past, and he finds it again
Where the baby had thrown it aside;
Her coral red, with its silver bells,
Still fast to the bridle tied.

There's a touch of paint off the bright green stick,
And a chip off the horse's ear;
But, oh! not that to the boy's blue eye
Brings the quickly gathering tear!

And while Harry lives he will still be glad
That he lent her his horse that day;
For the baby has gone where never again
Can she ask with his toys to play.

THE BEST OF THE BALL.

At last! oh, sensation delicious!
At last, it is here, it is here!
That moment supremely auspicious
In the jolliest ball of the year.

It is all as I dreamed it would happen—
The rooms grown oppressive with heat,
And my darling, alarmed with the crowding,
Suggesting a timely retreat.

"Not there; not among the exotics;
I faint with that fragrance of theirs.
Let us go—it will be so refreshing—
And find out a seat on the stairs."

How dear are the lips that could utter Such exquisite music as this!
How I listened, my heart all a-flutter,
Assenting, transported with bliss!

All the house with the dancers is throbbing,
The music seems born of the air:
Oh, joy of all joy the extremest,
To sit, as I sit, on a stair!

To sit, and to gaze on my darling,
Enraptured in thrilling delight,
As I think "Never face would be fairer,
Nor eyes half so tenderly bright."

It is all as I knew it would happen,
Yet, no; there is something I miss—
The eloquent words I intended
To speak in a moment like this.

They were tender, and soft, and poetic,
And I thought, "As I timidly speak,
She will smile, and a blush sympathetic
Will crimson the rose in her cheek."

And now that we sit here together,
I only—do all that I can—
Converse on the ball and the weather,
While she opens and closes her fan.

What I thought to have said was audacious,
Her ear it would surely offend;
She would turn from me, no longer gracious,
And frown my delight to an end.

Far better to talk of the weather,
Or ponder in rapture supreme:
'Tis so joyous to sit here together,
So pleasant to wake and to dream!

THE EMPRESS EUGENIE AT THE LAST COURT BALL.

Contented, long hours we could measure,
Forgetting, forgotten by all;
Nor envy the dancers their pleasure,
For ours is the best of the ball.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

A tout seigneur tout honneur. We will speak first of all of the fourth and last ball at the Tuileries. It was without dispute the most brilliant one of the season; and, apropos of the subject, our readers may take some interest in the ceremonies observed in these great worldly solemnities.

It is in this wise: The invitations are personal cards, the color of which is changed for every ball. The invitation reads as follows:

"By order of the Emperor.

"The Grand Chamberlain [this year it is the Vicomte de La Ferrière, who takes the place of the absent Duc de Bassano] has the honor to inform M. X [or Madame X] that he [or she] is invited to pass the evening at the palace of the Tuileries, on Wednesday, at 9 P.M."

Gentlemen's cards also bear the inscription—
In uniform.

As early as eight o'clock the carriages begin to fall into line, and outsiders are forbidden to approach the palace. Hacks are not allowed to enter the court-yard of the Tuileries, to which private and liveried carriages are alone admitted. The guests alight in the peristyle of the Pavillon de l'Horloge. The grand staircase is magnificent; it is richly carpeted, and on each step, to the right and the left, stands one of the Cent Gardes, with his glittering silver breast-plate and golden casque with a white plume, as mute and motionless as a statue—not daring even to move his head.

The Salle des Maréchaux is the centre of the fête. A dais of velvet, with two easy-chairs, occupies the end of the room—it is the throne. To the right and left are arranged the seats of the Imperial family; then on each side the places reserved for the ladies and officers of the Emperor's household, and the members of the diplomatic corps. All the rest of the hall is for the ladies invited.

At ten o'clock their Majesties enter with their suite, and the ball begins. The Emperor always wears the uniform of General of a Division, and the grand cordon of the Legion of Honor. About midnight the Emperor and Empress go to the supper-room, to which the members of the diplomatic corps and a few privileged persons are alone admitted. The Emperor sups standing, like all the rest of the company. The supper is cold, with the exception of the potage. The dishes are very choice, and the wines excellent. The Empress rarely takes any supper, but walks about and converses with those whom she honors with her favor. The Emperor also talks with a number of persons. On leaving the supper-room he makes the circuit of the different rooms, and stops half an hour in the Diana Gallery, where two easy-chairs are likewise prepared for him and the Empress. At one o'clock their Majesties retire to their apartments; but the fête is usually prolonged till three or four in the morning for the rest of the guests.

At the last ball all the high functionaries, illustrious foreigners, and fashionable ladies were present. Amidst the host of decorations were recognized the gold belts of all the ministers. M. Pinard, who is the lion of the day (the lion of the official world), was the centre of attraction. Close by him were grouped M. Régault de Genouilly, the Minister of the Marine, the Marquis de Moustier, M. de Seebach, Rouher, etc. A lion of another kind was the young brother of the Tycoon, who, with his robe of sky-blue silk embroidered with gold, his tunic of black lampas, his long black hair braided and hanging behind, and his Chinese physiognomy, represented the exotic element amidst these Parisian splendors. It is said that this young man has just been appointed aid-de-camp on a general's staff, with twenty-five thousand francs pay. This is practicing hospitality on a large scale. Luckily, Japanese sub-lieutenants seldom remain long in the French army.

The dress of the Empress, of which we give an illustration, was strikingly magnificent and original. It was composed of two tulle skirts, the under one laminated with silver, and the over one with gold, in narrow stripes converging toward the waist and producing the effect of rays. In front of the skirt was a sort of little apron of white satin, fringed with marabout, and completely covered with peacocks' feathers, arranged in horizontal lines. The apron seemed held at the sides by bouquets of diamond flowers. Around the waist was a bertha of white satin, fringed with gold and marabout, and ornamented with a cordon of large emeralds, encircled with diamonds. The long Hungarian sleeves, of tulle, were spangled with gold. The belt was of gold, confined by a diamond agrafe. The Empress wore on her neck a simple black ribbon velvet, with long ends (dog's collar), studded with fine emeralds. Her head was adorned with a splendid green peacock's feather, thrown on one side across the back hair; a diamond crescent glittered in the middle of the forehead, and several small peacocks' feathers were mixed with the curls of her chignon behind. The effect was imperial and splendid; nevertheless we prefer the dress worn by her at the last ball, of pale green puffed tulle, with great clusters of white begonias, with their graceful foliage scattered profusely over the immense train; this toilette, so exquisite in its simplicity, set off to better advantage the truly sovereign grace of the Empress Eugénie.

Princess Mathilde wore a dress of white tulle, bouillonnée, with a very long tunic of blue terry velvet, looped up at the sides, à la Pompadour, and trimmed with wide English lace. Her hair was dressed in the Greek style, plain in front and curled behind, with a coronet of diamonds.

The absence of the Prince and Princess Napoleon was remarked; they seem to have voluntarily abstained from appearing at the Palace assemblies for some time past. Countess Gabrielle, née Bonaparte, wore a train of white satin, with tulle puffing, and an over-skirt of pink satin mixed with blonde. Princess d'Essling, the first lady of the Empress's household, wore a dress of mauve tulle, trimmed round the bottom with several rows of puffing, separated by white satin rouleaux. Over-skirt of mauve satin, very short in front, with square tabs behind, and trimmed with white blonde and white passementerie. Coiffure of white plumes and diamond diadem. This dress was exceedingly effective.

Princess Metternich, the Austrian Embassy, was attired in a splendidly original manner—dress of tulle, with fine silver stripes, and Polonaise tunic of green terry velvet, edged with a narrow strip of sable. The corsage was open in front in the shape of a heart, and was likewise edged with sable, disclosing a plastron of tulle spangled with silver. Short sleeves, edged with sable. Behind a sort of green velvet drapery crossed the back diagonally, and was caught on the left shoulder. Belt of diamonds; necklace of five or six rows of brilliants with pendants of pearls long enough to fall on the breast. Brilliant aigrette of diamonds in the hair. This toilette was fantastic and winning, but one must have the power like Princess Metternich to stamp every thing that she wears with her own individuality to dare to inaugurate such innovations.

Duchess Fernandina chose another method of displaying her magnificent jewels. She wore on her dress of heavy white-ribbed silk bows of white satin, covering the lower half of the front breadth. Plain corsage, crossed by a white watered cordon edged with violet, with a diamond A on an enamel medallion. On her head she wore a diadem, estimated at eighty thousand francs.

Madame Fleury, the beautiful wife of the General, was in white satin. Corsage plain, with basque, trimmed with pearl passementerie. Belt covered with fine pearls. Red rose in the waist, and red roses with diamond foliage in the hair. Madame Canrobert was in white tulle, striped with silver, and tastefully ornamented with tufts of blue feathers.

Mademoiselle de Koekler, the reader to the Empress, a stately and beautiful brunette, was attired with exquisite simplicity in plain white tulle, with blue sash. Her hair was without an ornament. Mademoiselle de Ruhemont, the daughter of the Senator, on the contrary, appeared in a most eccentric costume; a dress spangled with flame-colored tinsel and a wreath of lilies of the valley. Mademoiselle Camille Doucet, the daughter of the Academician, was in white poul de soie, with a wreath of gold leaves; Mademoiselle de Heckeren, the daughter of the Senator, in white tulle, and the Misses Beckwith in green tulle, with green satin tunics looped with clusters of white eglantine. But we can not describe every thing, and must content ourselves with these sketches, which will show the prevailing features of the present fashions, wherein almost any caprice is admissible. The tendency seems to be to effect a fusion between the fashions of the time of Louis XVI. and those of the First Empire. The Carnival was not marked by the great number of fancy dress balls which signalized this season last year. Countess Montgomery conceived the happy idea of requesting all her guests to appear in the shepherd's costume of the time of Louis XV. The effect was charming. Another great lady of the Faubourg St. Honoré asked all the gentlemen invited to her ball to appear in a false nose of pasteboard, which caused much merriment.

The last nights of the prima donna Adelina Patti were none the less brilliant on account of the Carnival. The receipts of the Théâtre Italien never fell below ten thousand francs when she sang. On the occasion of the reproduction of Don Giovanni the assembly was magnificent. In one of the imperial boxes was seen a lady resplendent with diamonds, who nevertheless was not a princess, while in a modest loge in the gallery were Prince Napoleon and Princess Clotilde, the latter in a white dress trimmed with pink ribbons, with a rose near the shoulder and a single rose in her hair—a caprice of the Princess, well suited to the gentle majesty which characterizes the daughter of the King of Italy.

ELIANE DE MARSY.

NICE GIRLS.

WE all know a nice girl the moment we meet her. That one word "nice" rises to our lips instinctively, we can hardly tell why; but it is the only word in the language that can be used under the circumstances, and it is fully expressive. Every one knows exactly what it means. It does not necessarily mean a beautiful girl, or an elegant or an accomplished girl, except to the extent that beauty, elegance, and accomplishments are essential to niceness. In a sense the nice girl always is, and should be, pretty. Yes; she ought to have nice features—a pure, clear face it should be; and she is certain to have nice eyes. No matter for the color; let them be blue, or hazel, or black; and, again, let them be large or small; but they are certain to have an expression about them absolutely charming. They will be kind eyes, sympathetic eyes, ready to brighten at another's happiness, and to grow brighter still with "tears that leave the lashes bright" over another's sorrows. The nice girl is sure to have a pretty mouth too. The mouth is of all the features that least under the control of the will. It is the truest index to the disposition. Eyes may gleam; smiles may dimple the cheeks; amiability may be simulated with infinite skill; but the mouth is less obliging than the "hollow hearts" of the poet. It will not "wear a mask;" and it is only by cultivating sweetness of disposition that a pretty mouth can be secured. The nice girl unconsciously finds out this secret, and with a sweet mouth and kind eyes she may be content: she has beauty enough.

The great charm about the nice girl is, that she is so good-tempered—which is a synonym for good-hearted—so amiable, so cheerful, and so clever, in the best sense of that word. She is the life and soul of home. Her presence is its sunshine. She makes it. She is indispensable to it. Says the Fairy in the Christmas tale, speaking of such a girl in humble life: "The hearth which, but for her, were only a few stones and bricks and rusty bars, is made through her the altar of the home." The same thing happens in higher circles, for the nice girl is found every where. One thing to be noted of her is, that she is always neat. You can not surprise her en déshabille. What a marvelous smoothness of hair she has! And what immaculate cuffs and collars, warranted never to rumple or soil! It is difficult to believe that her dresses are made; their fit is perfection, and they seem as natural to her as leaves to a flower. There is always a graceful flow about them; and as for color, she has an artist's instincts in respect to it. She uses a bright ribbon as a painter would do, but without knowing why. A poem might be written on a nice girl's boots. They are never of the showy kind—but how charming! Gloves, again; they are always perfection in fit, and, as a rule, of some neutral tint. Catch our nice girl appearing in gloves of positive yellow, or green, or, most hideous of all, red—that latest outrage on good taste!

The influence of a nice girl in a house is always felt, but it is not easy to say how it is exercised. Wherever she goes tidiness and neatness result. Her touch has a magic in it. She could not be slovenly if she tried. It would be impossible for her to arrange a flower, place a chair, loop up a curtain, or perform the commonest act of daily life in any but the right way. It is by no means necessary that the nice girl should be simply domestic; but she is sure to prize her home, and to be of use in it. Always gay, busy, and cheerful, happy in herself and devoted to those about her, she misses none of the refinements or genuine pleasures of life.

It is peculiarly pleasant to think of the nice girl in the sick-room. Leigh Hunt wrote a paper on the pleasures of being ill. Not very ill, you know; but sufficiently so to warrant you in keeping to the house, and having people concerned and interested about you. He rated it as one of the pleasures of life. This at least may be conceded, that it goes far to take it out of the category of the miseries of life when our pet is there, ready and willing to attend on us with loving devotion and unwearying patience. She is never afraid, never fatigued. Her footstep is not heard, her dress has no irritating rustle in it. She does not talk to you over-much, nor fidget you with suggestions or fussy attentions. An invalid suffers as much from being overnursed as from neglect. She sees that you want for nothing, but conceals from you how your wants are supplied. At your lowest she inspires you with confidence: as you mend her cheerfulness sustains you, and one look at her bright face is like a glimpse of heaven.

PETS OF JAPANESE LADIES.

ALL over the world dogs take the first position, when one wishes to speak of creatures of the animal kingdom selected as objects of care and interest by men and women.

The Japanese ladies possess a very choice breed of pet dog, supposed to be the same as that known in Europe as the Charles the Second spaniel. As some intercourse was still kept up with Japan by England, through the East India Company, during the reign of the Merry Monarch, it is probable that these pets of his court were introduced to that country from the land of the Tycoon. These dogs are small, with beautiful silky hair, fringed paws, and pug-nose. So completely is this feature diverted from the purpose it ordinarily serves in dogs as a breathing passage, that it is difficult to believe the effect has not been artificially produced. It was not until we saw some very young puppies quite as deficient in useful noses as their parents, that we could believe the pretty little doggies were not cruelly used in their infancy, by their noses being in some way compressed. They are very delicate little creatures, and the utmost care is bestowed upon them by their mistresses, which they repay by manifesting much satisfaction when in female society, and selecting the long dresses to sleep on. Owing to the peculiar formation of the nose, they snuffle and snort during sleep, and the tongue hangs out from the left side of the mouth. We recollect once going to a dog-fancier's at Nagasaki, where numbers of these little animals were collected for the purposes of sale. They lived in elegant kennels, and at certain times were let out into a small dry court-yard for their morning airing, where they frisked, and barked, and sniffled together to their hearts' content, and then these dear little things, dear in more senses than one—for the price ranged from twenty-five to fifty dollars each—were fed on boiled rice and fish, and replaced in their domiciles.

Japanese cats are different from our tabbies, inasmuch as their tails are merely stumps. Pusy, without her long curved appendage, loses much of her grace of form and movement, and it is some time before the eye becomes accustomed to the deficiency. Cats are there, as here, the household pets, and are encouraged for the same services which they render to us, viz., that of preying on rats and mice.

A small pond containing gold, silver, and purple-spotted fish is often introduced into the gardens. These fish are, of course, privileged pets, and swim about in happy ignorance of the fish-devouring propensities of their mistresses. The fins and tails differ much from those of the species we are accustomed to; they are particularly large and diaphanous, and the fish appear to move through the water by the aid of delicate white lace sweeps. The head is square and large, and the prominent eyes give it a singular appearance. A particularly choice kind has a round white body, with a golden head, and tail divided into three.

Japan is the land of pheasants, and the denizens of its woods have been caught and caged, to charm, with their brilliant plumage, those who care for and tend them. That gem of birds, the golden pheasant, with its bright crest, elegantly-marked ruff, and rich orange-red breast, graces the aviaries, as well as the quieter silver pheasant, whose delicately penciled plumage has a quiet charm of its own. The purple-breasted and copper varieties are also found in them.

Sportsmen and battues are unknown in Japan, so that the happy pheasants do not number man among their natural and most dreaded enemies.

The wild-fowl around Yeddo—geese, ducks, teal, etc.—are never disturbed by the sound of fire-arms, it being contrary to the decrees of the Government to fire a gun within a certain distance (10 re.) of the Imperial city; so that they are perfectly tame, and the foreigner has some difficulty in believing that they are not domesticated birds. The bantams are particularly pretty—just such delicate-plumed little creatures that lovers of birds would choose for their pets. The tail of the cock bird is very curved and long, and quite sweeps the ground as he proudly struts about. The eggs are small and delicate in flavor, with very thin shells.

JAMES'S BANKRUPT LAW.

THE BANKRUPT LAW OF THE UNITED STATES.
1867. With Notes and a Collection of American and English Decisions upon the Principles and Practice of the Law of Bankruptcy. Adapted to the Use of the Lawyer and Merchant. By EDWIN JAMES, of the New York Bar, and one of the Framers of the recent English Bankruptcy Amendment Act. With copious Indexes, and an Appendix containing the General Orders and Forms promulgated by the United States Supreme Court. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $4 00; Sheep, $5 00.

The above is a new edition, containing the GENERAL ORDERS, together with the FORMS OF PROCEEDINGS IN BANKRUPTCY, AS PROMULGATED BY THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT, with a copious Analytical Index. This important work was prepared by Mr. James during the time the legislation in Congress on the subject was proceeding, the main provisions of the law having been carefully supervised by him. The novelty of the practice left American lawyers without experience in bankruptcy cases, and Mr. James has therefore endeavored to supply the practitioner with a treatise on the subject upon which he may confidently rely. His experience as one of the Commissioners for the amendment of the English Bankruptcy Law, and as an extensive London practitioner in Bankruptcy cases, has peculiarly fitted him for the task. The author has also endeavored, by the adoption of a clear and untechnical style, to render the work a guide to the merchant and the layman.

THE MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW. Preceded by a History of the Religious Wars in the Reign of Charles IX. By HENRY WHITE, M.A. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $1 75.

Mr. White has performed his task well. His arguments are every where conclusive, ably supported by the results of deep researches into the contemporary histories of the times of which he treats. His language is always forcible, and frequently rises to eloquence. His account of the state of France in the middle of the sixteenth century is admirable and exhaustive. The same praise may be allowed to his descriptions of the characters of the chief personages of the bloody drama which he recounts. We heartily commend the book for the tolerant spirit in which it is written. Remembering how hard it is even to think of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew without a thrill of indignation, we can not sufficiently praise this conspicuous merit of the volume.—London Review.

Of the state of France from the commencement of the century to the terrible day of St. Bartholomew Mr. White gives a masterly account. From numerous contemporary memoirs and state documents he has collected the details of a picture at once broad in its general effect and minute in its accessories—a picture full of life, color, character, and force. The massacre of Paris is of course the chief feature in the work. It is admirably described, without any pretense of pictorial writing, yet in such a way that the whole hideous tragedy passes vividly before our eyes, and we behold the grim old Paris of the sixteenth century in its spasm of blood and terror. Mr. White has produced a book full of research, conceived in the most conscientious and painstaking spirit, and written in a nervous and vigorous style, proper to the gravity of the events which it narrates and the principles which it affirms.—London Daily News.

Mr. White has exhibited great skill, great research, and considerable candor in executing his work, and readers of his clear narrative will readily bear testimony to the interest with which the story is kept up down to the awfully tragic close.—Glasgow Daily Herald.

FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS REWARD. A Novel. By a Barrister. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

It is full of spirit and cleverness: the style is good; it is extremely entertaining; the plot is novel; and the characters are drawn from the life. It is not often one meets with a thoroughly amusing novel, true in its main characteristics, whimsical without being a caricature, and fresh in the incidents and in the mode of handling them. It is decidedly a clever and amusing novel.—Athenaeum.

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643), N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.
Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are
BOGUS OR IMITATIONS.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.
Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.]

THE RISE AND FALL OF CRINOLINE.

XII.

THE DEATH OF CRINOLINE. 1867.—After fourteen years' residence upon this earth, crinoline at length expired. At least it died in the fashionable world. Fine ladies were once more seen at balls and parties in flowing robes, innocent of whalebone or steel supports; but among the masses crinoline still survived, and boasted of its vitality. The prevailing opinion, however, was that its reign was at an end, and the wits proposed that a monument should be erected by the fair sex, on which should be sculptured the well-known features of the departed, with the inverted torch, the symbol of death, while an inscription should describe the good qualities of the defunct fashion, record its earthly career, and express the confident hope of its early resurrection.

But no sooner had the whisper gone round that crinoline was really dead and buried for the present than it rose from its ashes like a new Phoenix; and now, in the year of grace 1868, after so lately honoring its obsequies, we are threatened with its revival in a new form. The panier, the stiffest and most ungraceful of all the forms ever assumed by this capricious fashion, has appeared at the court balls in Paris; and threatens to extend farther, and to be worn by both small and great. Heaven defend us from the infliction to which our eyes will doubtless become accustomed, and which in the end we shall find beautiful! Of all the caprices of the fickle goddess of fashion, none have been so marked and so strangely abrupt as those of the Protean crinoline.

FACETIE.

THE GOOD OLD TIMES.—Miss Amabel Heighington lays down her Shelley with a sigh, and thinks mankind must be greatly altered since the poet wrote,
"Nothing in the world is single."

NEIGHBORLY.—"Please, Sir," said a child to a guest, "who lives next door to you?" "Why, my little dear, do you ask?" said the guest. "Because mamma said you were next door to a brute," replied the child.

SHAKESPEARE IN ERROR.—King George of Hanover recently celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of his marriage, and among the presents he received were no fewer than 1573 cushions, worked by hand. Shakspeare must have been in error when he said,
"Uneasy lies the head which wears a crown."

At least there's plenty of room for King George's to lie easy enough.

SINCERITY.—Niece: "I'm writing to Clara Smith, aunt. Shall I say any thing from you?" Aunt: "You may give her my love, dear. How I do dislike that girl, to be sure!"

STRANGE.—By a strange coincidence, peace itself is, after all, the greatest "army contractor" in the world.

SISTERS OF CHARITY.—Faith and Hope.

BETTER LATE THAN EARLY.—If asked to dinner by one of the hippophagists, we must say that we should not much mind arriving "a day too late for the" fare!

Be temperate in diet. Our first parents ate themselves out of house and home.

MEN WHO TAKE THINGS AS THEY COME ALONG.—Pickpockets.

A GOOD JUDGE.—While a magistrate sat sipping his maraschino, a country lad arrived with a letter which required an immediate answer. The squire good-naturedly poured out a glass of maraschino for the lad, and set about writing a reply. Having finished his letter, he looked up, and was amazed to see that the bottle had been emptied. Turning to the boy he exclaimed, "Do you know, you imp, that that cost me sixteen shillings?" "Well, it's worth every penny on't, yer Honor," was the reply of the rustic.

SEPTUA: SEXA: QUINQUA: GESIMA.

GUSHING CAROLINE:

Dear Charles, why do such numbers marry in the three weeks preceding Lent?

GRUMPY COUSIN:

Because they know they'll soon want, Carry, A fitting season to repent.

THE ARTIST'S STATE.—Pencil-vania.

If seven days make one week, how many will make one strong?

DOMESTIC.—The cry of the day is the crisis: that of the night is the baby. Never give an infant a knife, in case it should cut its teeth. If a child is troublesome, send it to a nursery-garden: if the nursery-maid can not manage it, the nurseryman may. It is the father's duty to feed his children: remember that he is their pap-pa. Jars and broils should always be confined to jams and beef-steaks. If your wife asks for a shawl, give her one, especially if she says that she shawl have it. When the baby walks give it a perambulator. If your wife dresses your dinner nicely, let her dress herself as well. It is only the brute that beats his wife; therefore never countenance a husband having recourse to a club. The best check for the milliner's bill is a check for the amount. Domestic felicity consists in unbounded faith in cold meat and pickles.

A BORE.—"Sarah," said a young man the other day, "why don't you wear ear-rings?" "Because I haven't had my ears pierced." "I will bore them for you." "Thank you, you have done that enough."

Said a conscientious auctioneer, "Ladies and gentlemen, there is no sham about the carpets: they are genuine tapestry carpets—I bought them of old Tapestry himself."

THE WAY FOR BEAUX.—Galway.

Bertie: "Papa, when I grow up, may I be what I like?" Papa: "Yes, my boy, you may choose your own profession." Bertie: "Then I'll be a sweep, for I shall never have to wash my face."

SLIGHT OF HAND.—Refusing an offer of marriage.

WANTED.—A cover for bare suspicion; a veil for the face of nature: buttons for breaches of privilege; binding for a volume of smoke; cement for broken engagements.

DEARER THAN LIFE.—Fashionable funeral.

THE WINDS MERCHANTS PRAY FOR.—The trade winds.

A CHARMING REPTILE.—A serpent.

A poor woman called at a grocer's the other day, and asked for a quart of vinegar. It was measured off, and put into her gallon jug. She then asked for another quart to be put into the same vessel. "And why not ask for a half a gallon, and done with it?" said the grocer. "Och, bless your little bit of a soul!" answered she, "it's for two persons."

IMPORTUNATE.—Boring the earth for water.

"UP IN ARMS."—The baby.

An English gentleman once fell from a horse and injured his thumb. The pain increasing he was obliged to send for a surgeon. One day the doctor was unable to visit his patient, and therefore sent his son instead. "Have you visited the Englishman?" said the father in the evening. "Yes," replied the young man, "and I have drawn out a thorn, which I found to be the chief cause of his agony." "Fool!" exclaimed the father, "I trusted you had more sense: now there is an end to the job!"

A DANGEROUS PLACE.—Bom-bay.

MARRIAGE.—Marriage is like a silk purse, most agreeable to bear when there is plenty of money in it. Marriage is like a mouse-trap, once get into it, and you are in for it, with a very slim chance for getting out. Marriage, among fools, is like a boiled calf's head, without the accompaniment of brains. Marriage is like a roast leg of mutton on Sunday, served up cold on Monday, ditto, with pickles, on Tuesday, and hashed up on Wednesday.

An old toper was heard the other day to advise a young man to get married, "because then, my boy, you'll have somebody to pull off your boots when you go home drunk."

A little fellow was partaking pretty largely of the good things of this life at the dinner-table, immediately on his return from Sabbath-school. His brother, after eying him for some time, said: "Charlie, if you were to eat much more, and it should kill you, you would weigh so much that the angels could not carry you to heaven." Little six-year-old hesitated for a moment, and then, looking up, replied: "Well, if they couldn't do it alone, God would send Samson down to help them."

A LEAP-YEAR LAY.

BY A PROPHETIC SOUL.

Oh, ladies! who the privilege
Obtain this year of "popping,"
Pray ponder ere across the hedge
Of prudence you are hopping:
For Sixty-Eight perchance may be
A dear, and not a cheap year,
Unless you take advice from me,
And "look before you Leap"—Year!

Of course, I know, a single lot
Is singularly dreary—
But very many wives, I wot,
Are only doubly weary.
Their lives are simply sums of grief,
On wretched year they heap year
To make a burden past relief:
So "look before you Leap"—Year!

That "looking after Number One"
A proverb is, quite true is;
But that I doubt if rightly done
By finding Number Two is!
I know that life soon runs to waste,
That quick on year will creep year:
And yet 'tis ill to wed in haste,
So "look before you Leap"—Year!

JOHN ANDERSON and his good-wife
In fair and stormy weather,
(The song says) down the hill of life
Went hand in hand together.
Their years were but a gentle slope—
This year may prove a steep year
Should you try marriage: so I hope
You'll "look before you Leap"—Year!

You dream of wedded happiness—
A junction sans collisions!
Your matrimonial views, I guess,
Are very baseless visions.
Be warned! and do not this year make
Your "waking-out-of-sleep" year.
Dream on: my friendly warning take,
And "look before you Leap"—Year!

Well! 'spite of me, you would, I see,
A worse half annex still—
Be man and wife! Oh, don't you be Bis-sex't till next Bissextile!
A lottery all marriage is,
But this is the worst Sweep-year!
So take the tip I offer: 'tis
"Pray, look before you Leap"—Year!

CONSOLATORY.—There's always one consolation, whatever our misfortune—it might be worse. Were life hanging on a thread, it would be a comfort to think that it was not hanging on a rope.

NIGHT LIGHTS.—Glow-worms.

The advertisement of a doctor who undertakes the cure of madness begins thus: "Worthy the attention of the insane."

In a shop-window, in an obscure part of London, is this announcement: "Goods removed, messages taken, carpets beaten, and poetry composed on any subject."

QUERIES FOR FISHERMEN.

Can the "skate" be ever considered any thing but a n-ice fish?

Did "herrings" originally come from Erin's Isle? and, if so, could they by any chance have been the first "funny uns?"

Can "whipping" a stream account in any way for the walls of the ocean, or the sighs of the sea?

Would speculating in the "Bank" of Newfoundland be necessarily a fishy transaction?

In numbering the "ova" of some fish at millions, is not their fecundity rather "ova-rated?"

Say that—as is often the case—fish were utilized as manure, would it take only 160 "perch" for an acre of land?

Is it a matter of surprise that a whale generally ends in "blubber?"

Are fishes' scales subject to the supervision of the Inspector of Weights and Measures, and are their "gills" of imperial measure?

Is the ultimate "fin" of a fish called the "finis?"

Give reasons for the existence of the very binding "claws" in the Crab and Lobster Fishery Act?

How is it that the "net" takings of the fisherman are always in reality his "gross" takings?

Fig. 1.—Dress of changeable brown poult de soie, simply edged round the bottom with a heavy silk cord. Large Cashmere chlamys; blue ground with rich Oriental figures, and fringe to match. White tulle bonnet, trimmed with apple blossoms; scarf strings, edged with folds of white satin.

Fig. 2.—Dress of silver-gray faye, trimmed with three bias folds of gray velvet, which border the bottom and run up the front on each side of a row of large gray velvet buttons. The same trimming ornaments the pockets and forms a square bertha on the waist. Cashmere chlamys; white ground, with large Persian figures, lined with cherry silk, with fringe to match. Bonnet of black dotted lace, with scarf strings fastened under the chin by a jet medallion; bandeau diadem of black velvet, with five jet medallions. Parasol to match the dress, lined with white silk. Fawn-colored kid gloves, with three buttons.

APRIL.

SHE has come once more, with her purple train
Of violets following after,
Fair in a fabric of twinkling rain,
Or sunny with glorious laughter;
She has journeyed again o'er the western main
On guardian winds that waft her.

A velvet of dewy verdure steals
Where her foot on the cold sward presses;
The brook in the pasture merrily peals
Through lengthening ferns and cresses,
And the sombre mound in the grave-yard feels
The balm of her flowerful tresses!

And here as her jubilant cuckoo's song,
And the breath of her early roses,
Float into the room while we sadly throng
Where our dying friend reposes,
These eyes which have yearned for her greeting so long,
'Tis her own fond kiss that closes!

THE PIANO PLAGUE.

IT would be difficult to estimate the aggregate number of pianos in the United States, but we are told on apparently good authority that over twenty-five thousand are annually furnished, by the hundred and fifty large native manufacturers, to keep up the supply. The number must be immense, for they seem omnipresent, and their twang is heard from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. There is hardly a family that has got a start, however small—and what American family has not?—beyond the mere satisfaction of its daily wants, but contrives to buy, hire, or borrow a piano. There may be a scarcity of beds, so that the members of the whole household have to lie packed together like so many herrings, but this noisy piece of furniture, deemed indispensable, is sure to have an honored place.

The Americans, however, are not by any means the most musical of people; and if they were they could gratify their taste by the cultivation of the voice and the use of a thousand other less cumbersome and expensive instruments.

The love of music has, we fancy, little to do with it. Our countrywomen have somehow or other got the idea that the piano is a symbol of gentility, and must have one to prove their own claims or to establish those of their daughters thereto. It is astonishing how devoted mothers are to the musical part of the education of their children. Sarah Jane may spell dog with two g's, know as little about a dumpling as George III., who was puzzled to discover how the apple got in, and be ignorant of all other duties, literary or domestic, and yet her mother takes no care to have her better instructed. But mark how the watchfulness and the patience of the anxious parent come into play when the piano-lesson is to be learned. However absorbed in her household duties—whether tormenting tough dough into pliable pie-crust, or busy with any other housewifely duty—she does not forget daily to remind her daughter of "practicing" time. She takes care, moreover, to be sure by personal watchfulness that the hour (or two hours, perhaps) is faithfully thrummed through. The tenderest mothers are then proof against all appeals to their indulgence, and will extort from the most unwilling child every second of the prescribed lesson. And, after all, what does all this maternal care and severity amount to? The object of it, with no natural taste for music, will in nine cases out of ten never be any thing but a thrummer, who will make the piano, long since a wearisomeness to herself, a nuisance to others. If half the time devoted by mothers to keeping the weary fingers of their daughters popping up and down hour after hour on the slippery keys of the piano was spent in teaching them their household duties, or in taking care that they studied their spelling-books and dictionaries, they would be certainly more useful, and not less ornamental. Music ought undoubtedly to be a part of all education, but it should be kept subordinate, except in cases of strong natural taste, to other branches of learning.

It may be desirable for each family that can afford it to have its piano, and well for every female member to go through a daily course of thrumming on it, but there is no reason why the whole world should be annoyed by the discord. The piano, from its supposed gentility, has always a position in the chief apartment, and thus the visitor is exposed on entering each house to a harsh greeting from the "practicing" daughter of it. The piano should be banished with the baby to the nursery or to the school-room, at any rate; or in the dwellings of the rich there might be two instruments, one kept in the drawing-room for those who know how to play on it, and the other for those who are learning, in some remote quarter where its painful discords would be muffled by distance. We protest strenuously against the furnishing of hotels and steamers with pianos, unless good players, who shall have the exclusive use of them, be also supplied. There is no nuisance in this country so trying to the patience of the traveler as the universal presence of this instrument, open to all the world, and noisily banged upon by every comer. In Europe it is never found in places of public resort, whose proprietors would no more think of offering to their guests the indiscriminate use of a piano than that of a bugle or a drum. They have too much regard for the general comfort.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Mrs. Diamond.

MY DEAR MADAME,—I have long wished to write to you, although my acquaintance with you is rather of observation and reflection than of actual knowledge. You are one of the persons whom I constantly meet, of whom I constantly hear, whom it is profitable rather than pleasant to study, and who really fill a very different place in the world from that which they suppose themselves to fill. It was my first fancy, upon beginning this letter to you, to address you as Mrs. Lighthouse; but upon consideration I thought that you might possibly misinterpret my intention, and imagine that I meant a play upon your name, as a source of light and brilliancy. Nothing could be farther from my purpose than such a use of the word. A light-house is a solemn beacon—"a pillar of cloud by day, of fire by night"—to warn the mariner of rocks and quicksands.

When you are at the sea-side in summer, say at Newport, do you ever catch a glimpse in the evening of the light at Beaver-tail? Do you think merely how bright and dazzling it is, and how prettily it looks in the darkness? Or do you remember that it is a warning finger tipped with flame, and that the sailor as he sees it knows that it beckons him away, and is the sign of deadly dangers to be avoided? Even so, Madame, I look at you in the evenings, when I see you flashing and brilliant, and I say to my companion, "Do you see that light-house yonder? how striking it is, how it illuminates the space around it, how easily its splendor might inspire poets!—well, avoid it as you would ruin." Very often, if my companion is young and inexperienced, she says, after looking for a moment, and in a tone of half-amused vexation, "La! Mr. Bachelor, how queer you are! I don't see any thing but Mrs. Diamond, and how superb she looks to-night!"

Now, my dear Madame, I will tell you why you seem to me a light-house, a beacon, and a warning. It is because you are the young mother of young children, and yet seem to have no idea of any duty or responsibility; and, indeed, instead of being a negative, you are the most positive injury to them. Why did you marry, if you were not ready and willing to give up your headlong pursuit of society? Suppose Diamond is rich, suppose you can hire as many nurses and governesses as you choose, and provide as many carriages and footmen as heart can wish—can you hire mothers, and the morals and manners which only the constant care of a mother can impart? You do not care to understand what somehow your maternal instinct has failed to teach you, what a child is. You seem to suppose that it is either a doll or a reasonable creature. Dear Madame, it is neither. It is just a child, very much an animal, and loving dirt and disorder.

If you had ever chosen to spare time enough from your own amusements to observe it, you would have seen that your young child always passes by the pictures of people and landscapes for those of animals. You would have seen that it is the roaring lion lashing his tail, or the crouching Bengal tiger, or the horse in a thousand forms, that really interests and enchants the child. He plays horse. He plays hunting. He is the hyena, or the deer, or the dog, or the giraffe; and his toys are of the same kind. The baby's first pet is the woolly rabbit—then comes the Noah's ark in which there are only three or four miserable little human bipeds among all the inscrutable variety of quadrupeds and birds and creeping things. It is with the sound of animals, with the voices of the barnyard, the crowing cock, the clucking hen, the quacking duck, the neighing pony, the braying donkey, the barking dog, the mewing cat, the cooing pigeon, the bleating calf, the baa-ing sheep, with all possible noises of all conceivable animals upon the earth that you entertain the "father of the man"—that is to say, I beg your pardon, Madame, the child.

As I say, if you will only think of it, all this is both upon your part—supposing you to be such a mother as you are not—and upon the child's, instinctive. And it is instinctive because, as I said, he is chiefly an animal. He has all the habits and tastes of an animal. His senses open the great game of conscious life for him—by-and-by the soul and the mind follow. But they will not follow, or they will come limping in, or the great game will be utterly spoiled if you abuse the escort and chastise the fore-runners. That is to say, if you don't remember that he is an animal, and let him be an animal, and if you try to torture him into behaving like a reasonable human being, you will thwart and bewilder and disgust him, and the abortive man will be the monument of the abused child.

My dear Mrs. Diamond, if you have read my letter so far, I can see you smiling disdainfully, and asking "By what right does this impudent Mr. Bachelor, whom I scarcely know, presume to lecture me about my maternal duties: how does he know any thing of children?" Merely by keeping my eyes open. I am one of Nature's failures, Madame. She meant me evidently to be the father of a large family. But she reconsidered, and I turn out to be merely an uncle. Madame, if you ever read books, I should remind you of that most pathetic and exquisite line in Charles Lamb's "Dream Children"—"The children of Alice call Bartram father." You are yourself a tragedy, Mrs. Diamond, but you do not understand tragedies. So I say that I know about children because I keep my eyes and my mind open. I don't expect roses in March, nor new apples in April. To every thing its season. Why can't you understand the wisdom of these words? They mean childhood for children—not manhood or womanhood, not reason and politeness and tranquillity, but selfishness, quarrelsomeness, noise, dirt, and, if your serene elegance will permit the phrase, Old Ned generally.

I remember that I went once, when I was a young man, on some kind of business to Samaria Four Corners; and one of the best and loveliest women in the world asked me to stay at her house. She had a child of four years old, and she was not one of the children whose biographies were written in tracts, but a very willful, resolute, and obstreperous child. Every morning at the breakfast-table she had "a turn." Now, it seems that on the morning after my arrival it occurred to the young mother that she was to have me, a total stranger and a bachelor, probably hating children, at her table, and that her child would certainly behave as usual. The prospect was frightful to her, for she knew that there was no alternative. If she tried to persuade the child to stay up stairs there would be a tremendous storm, and if she came as usual to the table the tempest was equally inevitable. But with the vague hope that the presence of a stranger might be a moderating influence, the child was brought to the table. I came in wholly unconscious of the trials and fears of my hostess—who told me the story afterward—and sat down to breakfast. By-and-by the child began, and the trouble of the mother was so evident that I said, to reassure her, and in perfect good faith:

"I am glad to see that other children trouble their mammies as much as my sister's at home trouble her."

That little remark was an infinite consolation to my kind hostess, for it showed her that I knew that children were no more perfect than their parents. Of course they are not. They will not half wash their faces, nor keep their rooms in order, nor come down stairs softly. They will look at people who ask them questions without answering. They will whistle and whoop and bang about the house. They will slide upon the balusters, and come crashing down stairs like a troop of cavalry. They will not behave beautifully at table, and they will take an incalculable amount of scolding and exhortation without showing the least improvement. They will do at dinner what they were reprovved for doing at breakfast, and they will repeat it at tea in a much more aggravated form. They prefer mud to gravel, and will be content with dust if no mud is to be found. They will smear their clothes and tear them, and twitch off the buttons, and in summer, if they have clean white trousers, they will grind the knees into hopeless greenness upon the grass. They will tease each other, and play horrible practical jokes, and frighten the worthy parent beyond expression. They will bring the mother and the father to the verge of saying, a hundred times, "Dear me, children are more of a pest than a pleasure! John, how many times have I told you not to sit in the coal-scuttle? Jane, stop putting the kitten to bed in the window-curtains!"

How ridiculous to treat these little people as if they were something else than they are! Yet you, as I say, scarcely treat them at all. You put them off with nurses, French women who wear caps and are called bonnes, and who can teach them to talk French—that being the chief end of human existence. You will not have them in the drawing-room because they "muss" every thing. You will not have them at table, because they are positively outrageous. You do not walk out with them, for they have their nurses and you have your own affairs. The nursery is their domain, and you pay flying visits to it; but the pervasive, moulding presence and influence is the French bonne. When the children descend for a little while after dinner carefully dressed, you receive them as dolls. You study the elaborate toilette, the careful hair-dressing. They are agreeable to you in the degree that they represent French puppets. They are little ceremonious acquaintances paying a short call. But they must not "tumble" you nor themselves. They must be very prim and polite. They must affect the courteous arts of their elders; and what do you know of the other arts of their elders which they are learning in the nursery?

Next summer, Madame, when you go to Newport, buy the Recollections of Newport, sixty and seventy years ago, by Mr. George Channing. In that book you will read that the children of that time used to bow and kiss their hands when they came into the presence of their parents; but, for all that, they were flogged with cowhides at school for bad conduct. Since you have children, pray try to understand them. Reflect that their coming is a warning to you that your duties are defined and urgent, and that the character of your pleasures must change. When you were a child in your father's house, your life was properly one thing, now that you are a mother in your own house, it is quite another.

Dear Mrs. Diamond, you are a very pretty and a very resolute woman; but you can not serve God and mammon. Don't try. I have seen the effort lamentably often, and it always fails. Don't be a warning—be a model. And if I seem to speak with feeling, it is only because of my intense sympathy with the dear little people who are so much our victims, and whom I learned to know so intimately when I lived in the family of my sister Emily, who married the late Mr. Smith. You see my children are not the usual model "children of old bachelors," and if you receive this letter graciously, I shall certainly preach a little further from the delightful text. Meanwhile,

I am your well-wisher,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

DRESS GOODS.

DURING the present intermediate season when winter wrappings have become too heavy and unlined silks and laces are too light, the short street suits, with an extra lining that may be used or removed at pleasure, become indispensable. We have spoken before of some of the materials used for these street costumes, and fresh importations are constantly adding to the list. The fancy woolen serge imported for spring has a silk diagonal reps that gives it a bright lustre, and a much more dressy appearance than the all-wool serge worn during the winter. We have seen it in pin-head checks and in small oval-like globules, but the plain gray twills are preferred. The price ranges from $1.37½ a yard to $1.75.

Granite poplin is very well described by the name it bears. It is, however, of several qualities. The ordinary granite is a dark-gray mottled goods, very much in appearance like the rock for which it is named. This is serviceable but not attractive. A finer quality is lustrous and smooth, and will rank favorably among the materials for walking suits.

A new mixture of wool and Lisle thread, which reminds one of winsey, is called wash poplin. It is in mottled and chené patterns and plain grounds, in which a white thread crosses a brown or black. All the requisites for a serviceable traveling dress are found in this goods, as it is reversible, is not easily torn, and will wash without fading or shrinking. It is three-quarters of a yard wide and sold at ninety cents a yard.

A pretty combination of silk and linen is called poplinette. It resembles the summer silks in lustre and in its patterns of small checks and blocks, but is more durable and does not wrinkle so easily. Seven-eighths of a yard is the usual width, and the price is $1.50 a yard. Plain colored poplinettes, or silvery-gray grounds with black or white penciled stripes, are brought out in a wider goods of a trifle better quality at $2 a yard. Dress-makers, however, prefer to use material seven-eighths wide, as it cuts to better advantage. The wide poplinettes are almost as handsome as an Irish poplin.

Epingle, an all-wool poplin of heavy reps, is not new, but is displayed in all the fashionable shades of light-brown, gray, and green. $2 a yard is the price. The robed mohairs are prettily brocaded in wreaths around the skirt with smaller vines for sleeves and corsage. Sea-side poplin is a suggestive name for a quiet pretty material that has a wiry stiffness about it which makes it hang well, and which it is said moisture will not destroy. Of the same order of goods is China cloth, a new mohair with a glazed surface that looks like enamel. The colors, dove and buff, are too light for the present season, and too delicate to make a very serviceable dress at any time. Fifty-five cents a yard is the price asked.

THIN GOODS.

Importations of summer goods are unusually late. A few organdies are shown in striped patterns, and in wreaths and clusters of flowers on a white ground. A dark Sultan red stripe is beside a white one on which are cashmere figures, or a white ground is striped with black relieved by brilliantly colored palm leaves, or wreaths of wood-violets, or squares and blocks of the fashionable tint of pale amber.

Robes of gossamer grenadine are marked $75. A lovely pattern has the principal part of the dress of solid blue and white stripes an inch wide, bordered at the sides and bottom of the skirt with a vine of flowers of most gorgeous hues on a white ground. Narrower vines are provided for the sleeves and waist. Another dress has violet stripes instead of blue. A different style is a dark ground with a wide stripe of gay colors down the centre of each width. Among the grenadines sold by the yard those with black grounds are most admired. On many of these there is merely a white satin stripe, while on others, strewn at intervals, are bunches of rose geranium, or a cluster of small flowers of every shade, forming a tiny nosegay, tied together with a cordon of gilt; and again there are wood-colored stripes with pale yellow primroses or with butter-cups between. In all these there are thick satin stripes. The material is very fine and worth the price, $4 a yard. Plain quality with small set figures is $2.

Chambray gauze for evening dresses is brought out in solid colors. The popular shades are all represented, butter-cup, Sultan, Metternich green and violet. This is one of the most beautiful transparents that can be worn over silk or satin. The white grounds are also very attractive with thick medallions and dashes of rich colors. One specially admired has a white velvet square on which is a beautifully shaded moss rose-bud.

CHAMELEONS.

The chameleon silks for evening dresses display most beautifully blended colors, forming soft neutral tints that require gas-light to bring out their beauty. We had blue and orange years ago, when changeable silks were in vogue, but the pure azure called Mexico and a pale amber when together enter into a perfect union with each other, forming a harmony of shade widely different from that made by attempting to combine two colors in such positive contrast, as Mazarine blue and gold. Straw color and green assimilate naturally, making pistache when viewed in front, presenting each shade distinct yet slightly modified each by the other when a side view is taken. Lilac and maize combine prettily; dove color and green form a grayish hue; blonde and white make the merest shadow of rose color on white, and orange shaded with pink forms salmon.

Illusion, tulle, and the merest films of lace are appropriate trimmings for these delicate silks. There are fichus and barbes and sashes of fairy-like texture that might have been designed for them.

MORNING DRESSES.

A pretty style of morning dress is a princesse robe buttoned slanting from the throat to the hem in the redingote fashion. Coat-sleeves with a deep cuff turned back, simulated by trimming. Large flat linen buttons. Narrow pocket flaps are placed lengthwise of the skirt. An appliqué vine of blue or pink leaves of French Chambray, braided at the edge, or feather-stitched with white, is a pretty trimming for plain white piqué. Rows of points formed by folding a square of muslin are also used on either side of bias folds and bands. If the folds are cut perfectly on the bias, and the points folded smoothly, this trimming is easily ironed and will be found well adapted to wash materials. These new hand-made trimmings require time and patience, and consequently increase the dress-makers' bills. With a little practice ladies can make them neatly at home in the leisure moments that have hitherto been devoted to crocheting.

Solid colored brilliants, figured cambrics, and the cool, white linens with narrow stripes of black are loosely gored with body and skirt in one, and surrounded with a deep flounce beginning at the knee. A cord and tassel is worn at the waist, or a belt of the same. Instead of the rosette so long worn in front of the belt, a pretty fashion is to point the end that laps, and place a strap of the material over the front of the belt, giving the appearance of a buckle.

A graceful morning dress of sheer nansook is a loose Gabrielle with Hamburg insertion down the front and above the hem. Narrow Valenciennes is on both sides of the insertion and at the edge of the skirt. Price $40. Another at the same price has a robe trimming formed of the Hamburg insertion with a row of muslin points on the lower side of it. The trimming begins at the back of the shoulder, extends down the body and front, and curves around the side to the back of the dress above the hem. Wide flowing sleeves with a close under-sleeve. Twelve yards of nansook is required for this dress. The train is long and full.

A jaconet Gabrielle is trimmed with puffs up each seam and over the shoulder. Around the skirt are two puffs with a cluster of tucks between.

PETTICOATS.

Muslin skirts to be worn under short dresses are gored flat at the front and sides, and trimmed with three fluted ruffles, or with a group of tucks and one ruffle. With trained dresses the petticoat worn next the dress should be trained also, and be but little shorter than the dress. A wide flounce set on at the knee, with the skirt proper gored plain, makes a graceful skirt. A better trimming is three ruffles of graduated widths, narrow in front, and deep behind.

Pretty Balmorals of thick white serge have dark blue and brown medallion borders. The gored design is marked on the widths. These are $7. Very heavy piqué is also stamped for petticoats, with a vine of flowers and leaves in black, or a broad Greek border. These are sold at $4.

COLLARS, COLLARETTES, AND CUFFS.

Medallions of needle-work and Valenciennes are attached to the front of linen collars, and hang pendent like a locket. Cuffs to match have similar medallions that are to be fastened over on the outside of a coat-sleeve. Sets of this kind are exceedingly pretty for demi-toilettes, and suit especially the neat summer silks and poplinettes used for home dresses. Another style of morning collar has alternate points of narrow Valenciennes and of linen, with wide square cuffs, on which are as many as eight rows of Valenciennes, forming a deep vandyke between plain linen points. Tiny bows of embroidery and lace, with blue ribbon beneath them, are worn at the throat. Straight bands, exquisitely needle-worked on one side, are to be worn either as standing or turned-down collars. Some of the handsomest sets have collarettes with them, long falls of lace, to be worn with the open surplice and revers dresses now fashionable. These are from $20 to $25.

VARIETIES.

A new sortie de bal or evening wrapping, now in favor with Parisian ladies, is a round cloak of cashmere, called, in honor of a classic garment, the chlamys. It resembles the talma in shape, and is of the finest cashmere; a white and blue ground or a dark rich color is bordered with palm leaves and other Oriental designs in gay and brilliant colors. The garment is surrounded by a fringe made of the fleece of the cashmere goat, in which is blended all the varied colors of the border. It is lined with soft silk.

A stylish dress for mourning has just been made of that most valuable fabric, iron grenadine, a solid black without a particle of lustre. The long-trained skirt, gored at the sides, is trimmed with box-pleated quillings, cut on the bias, and hemmed on each side, and ornamented with a narrow, flat braid. Three graduated quillings extend around the hem to the front widths, where they are arranged in a crescent shape. Above these narrower quillings simulate a tunic with an apron fall on the front width. Coat-sleeves and tight-fitting corsage with small basques attached.

A silk Gabrielle of Mexico blue has a long skirt with a wide bias flounce on all the widths but the front. Three narrow folds of satin, piped at each edge, are above this flounce. The pipings are continued up the side seams and on the corsage with a row of silk scallops, each one made separately and bound with satin. The buttons only extend to the waist, and the front seam, without which it is impossible to make a Gabrielle, is concealed with pipings and scallops. Short sleeves, with a fall of wide Valenciennes. When the close coat-sleeves that accompany the dress are worn, the short sleeves form caps.

A walking dress of violet serge has three narrow vandyked flounces on the lower skirt, with rouleaux of satin above them. The upper skirt similarly trimmed is festooned high in the back, and caught up at the back in full puffs. A half-adjusted, sleeveless basquine worn over these was very short at the back with long pointed ends in front, lapped to show both points. Satin rouleaux surrounded the sacque.

Scarfs of gay plaid silk are worn by foreign ladies, with black silk walking dresses. They are straight and long, and are folded on the breast and tied behind.

Aprons of plaid silk made with bibs, or with high bodices, are worn both by ladies and children.

Quite young ladies now wear coquettish little caps for morning dress. This is a German fashion, becoming and home-like.

A pretty round hat for spring has a high Spanish crown with a pompon of feathers in front, and black net scarfs falling from the back, crossed on the breast and loosely tied in the back.

Cravat of buff silk, loosely tied. Shirt with standing collar. Demi tight pantaloon of a lighter shade than the coat, in small plaids with broad black stripe at the side.

PERSONAL.

THE PRINCESS SALM SALM, who seems to be browsing in the most royal of clover in Austria, where the Imperial family have taken her under protection and given her a competence, as an acknowledgment of the heroism displayed by her for MAXIMILIAN, in Mexico, was a ballet-dancer in Canada at the time she became Mrs. Prince S. S. As the rough, Western man observes, she has "pi-rooted" to some purpose.

Happy must Mrs. DISRAELI have been when the QUEEN called upon her husband to succeed Lord DERBY. She had been in poor health, but is now quite restored. "To think," was the good lady's remark, not long ago, "that three months since I should not have been expected to live, and that I have to-day walked with my husband, Prime Minister of England, from my house to Cadogan Place." And for a lady who will scarcely see seventy again, the amount of pedestrian exercise—not far off three miles—taken under the circumstances it was, might well furnish material for gratifying reflection.

The Bazar begs leave to introduce to its lady-readers Colonel PORTE CRAYON, one of the oldest and most valued of the contributors to Harper's Monthly and Weekly, of whom, as SHAKESPEARE saith, "good exclamation" is thus made by a gentleman who recently saw him in the undress of home, at his residence in Berkeley Springs:

"He is a grizzled, lean man, of perhaps forty-five years of age, with a martial carriage, and his life has been spent in scholarly rambles through both hemispheres, with the greater episode of the civil war making its latter end. He belongs to a series of eminent Virginia families; and, despite a good deal of badinage, I think it is something to be proud of, to be of a good old Virginia family—General DAVID HUNTER being his uncle (his own name being DAVID HUNTER STROTHER), and a close descendant of JOHN RANDOLPH married his sister. He is related to the families of General R. E. LEE, JAMES MASON, and other leading Virginians. He himself was a Unionist of gallant record, having served through the war as a hard-working aid-de-camp to the best generals. The sketches that he is publishing in Harper's Magazine are very nearly literal records from diaries kept during the war. His eye-sight is fast failing. PORTE CRAYON possesses the only series of contemporary sketches extant of JOHN BROWN's raid, from its beginning to its conclusion. As historical data they are almost invaluable. He has depicted BROWN in twenty different crises, with literal truthfulness that greatly assists us to comprehend the weird old ranger. He and Mr. RANDOLPH are proprietors of the noble summer resort of Berkeley Springs, the favorite haunt of WASHINGTON, JEFFERSON, MADISON, and MONROE, all of whom fought chicken cocks and raced horses there with so much devotion that we never refer to it in juvenile histories. We do tell of the cherry-tree about which WASHINGTON could not tell a lie, father! but we never represent that glorious chief betting his 'alf sovereign on the speckled bantam."

The Rev. ALBERT BARNES is about to give to the world his last work, in the shape of "Notes on the Psalms." In the preface to the forthcoming volume he says: "These Notes on the Book of Psalms complete my labors in endeavoring to explain and illustrate the sacred Scriptures. At my time of life, with the partial failure of vision with which I have been afflicted for more than twelve years, with the other cares and burdens resting on me, and with the moral certainty that the infirmities of age, if I am spared, must soon come upon me, I could hope to accomplish no more, and I shall attempt no more."

ISABELLA II., of Spain, is the only remaining Bourbon sovereign in Europe. She is thirty-eight years old; is married to her cousin, DON FRANCISCO D'ASSIS. The result of this union has been five children; but the queen doesn't agree very well with her husband, so they worret each other. Nevertheless, Spain has gone ahead considerably in internal improvements and general prosperity during her reign.

WILLARD SMALL, who writes over the signature of Oliver Optic, is a notable linguist, reading thirty-one languages and speaking eight fluently. He makes it a rule to learn one new language every year. He is thirty-six years old, stands six feet two inches in his stockings, and weighs two hundred and thirty pounds. In the field he leads the hands; can lift five hundred pounds; sleeps only five hours a day, is strictly temperate, and never uses liquor or tobacco. Is married and has a daughter, nine years old, who speaks French, German, Italian, and Spanish.

That very musical person, GOTTSCHALK, writes to friends in the States that when about to give a concert in Santiago he called upon the military bands of that place for assistance, but found to his horror that they could not read a note of music. His fears of failure were, however, turned into astonishment when he ascertained that they were familiar with whole operas, and could play the most difficult pieces after hearing them once. Their musical taste is exquisite, and a person called skillful here would be there set down as second-rate. This, at all events, is what GOTTSCHALK says, and we suppose the readers of the Bazar must allow it to be true.

There are three lady editors in Iowa—Messdames MONEY, READ, and HARTSHORN—wealthy, literary, and pungent.

Prince LUCIEN LOUIS JOSEPH NAPOLEON BONAPARTE has just been made a Cardinal. He is the son of CHARLES LUCIEN BONAPARTE, who was son of LUCIEN, brother of NAPOLEON I. The new Cardinal was born November 15, 1823.

Another of the family, Madame BONAPARTE, widow of JEROME, resides in Baltimore. It is whispered that she preserves her face from wrinkles by abstaining from both laughter and tears. She also nightly encases her taper fingers in metallic thimbles, and has done so for the last forty years. "Consequently," says JENKINS, "her hand retains much of its original symmetry, and the decay of her charms is as sweet and faultless as the falling leaves of the rose."

Mrs. E. H. REED, of New Orleans, has written a life of Dr. A. P. DOSTIE, late of that city, which promises to throw much light on the stirring events of the last five years in that region. Mrs. REED is thoroughly conversant with the events treated of in her book, including the massacre of July 30, 1866, and, from being the intimate friend of Dr. DOSTIE, is admirably qualified for the important task of historian of one who gave his life to the cause he believed to be right.

Among the witty people who have been in Washington looking over the notables and making notes of things in that funny, funny place, is Mr. CHARLES H. WEBB; and he is the malefactor who exploits the following droll scene said to have occurred between Mr. SEWARD and Mr. THORNTON, the new representative of the British Lion. It came to Mr. W. from an authentic source, and is to be relied upon: "Mr. THORNTON, in company with Mr. FORD, Secretary of the Legation, called on Mr. SEWARD, it seems, previous to his formal presentation to the President. It was an informal call, of course, connected with diplomacy by only a slender thread, and Mr. SEWARD sought to make it as pleasant as possible, remarking, in the course of conversation, that he trusted their relations would be pleasant, as indeed there was no occasion for them to be otherwise, with the exception of the Alabama claims, about which, however, he anticipated no trouble, as they could very easily be settled, and in an amicable way, or words to that effect—whereupon Mr. THORNTON arose in a most dignified and ridiculous manner, and took his hat in hand, emphatically declaring that the question was of too serious a character to be treated in a manner so light, and that it would form the subject of grave correspondence—he did not propose to touch upon it then! and, accompanied by Mr. FORD, away he trotted, back, ears, and tail up, like the ass of old in the lion's skin. Now, why did he go and make a stupid of himself after that fashion? That's what I want to know."

PAUL MORPHY must be losing position as the first of chess players. Out of four games recently played in Paris with Mr. STEINTZ, he lost one, and three were drawn.

Next to the QUEEN the PRINCESS OF WALES may be said to stand in the affectionate respect of the people of England. During her illness of more than a year she has been very present to the thoughts of the men and women of that country. She has just reappeared in public, and we learn from a London journal that her presence, recently, at Drury Lane Theatre was the signal for a perfect ovation. To another place besides those of amusement, the Princess, so recently suffering herself, has carried the consolation of her presence, and kind looks, and gracious words. In the beginning of the week she paid a lengthened visit to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, and went over the wards, speaking to the patients, but most of all giving attention to the numerous sufferers who are still in the hospital as a result of the Clerkenwell explosion. This most womanly act of kindness tends still further to secure for the Princess that place which she has already taken in the hearts of the people.

The ASTORS of to-day form the subject of a paragraph from a writer in this city to the Boston Journal, and describes their routine of daily life and the way in which the great fortune of the family is rapidly being rolled up: "The Astors will probably hold their property for many generations to come. WILLIAM B. was trained by his father to the style of business which had gained his fortune and increased it. Since the death of JOHN JACOB ASTOR the business has been continued in the same style that marked it before he died. WILLIAM B. ASTOR has two sons, JOHN JACOB and WILLIAM B., Jun. They have been carefully trained to the same style of business that distinguished their father and grandfather. In the little one-story brick building on Prince Street, looking like a small jail with the iron bars in front, the father and two sons can be seen daily taking care of their immense estate. The sons are quiet and reticent like their father. No bank clerk goes to his business more steadily than do they. At a given hour in the morning they enter their office. At a given hour, arm in arm, they walk down Broadway to Wall Street. Between two and three they can be seen returning from their down-town office. They are seldom separated. They are capable, industrious, economical, and pre-eminently devoted to business. Should their father die tomorrow every thing would be taken up just where he left it, and all his plans would be carried out, nor would any change be made in the mode of doing things during their lifetime. The utmost care was taken of their uncle JOHN JACOB, who died the other day. Every wish of his father in regard to him was scrupulously carried out. His fine residence on Fourteenth Street, with its garden occupying a whole square, with his coaches and horses, were preserved to him to the last. It is rare that three generations of men exhibit such characteristics. Thrown into offices, its commanding situation would make the Astor House a source of revenue such as it can never become as a hotel. But the wishes of its founder, though dead, still prevail, and a hotel it will be, probably, during the lifetime of its present owner."

CROCHET YARN AND WORSTED BASKET.

TABLE-COVER SEEN ON THE TABLE.

BOX WITH PIN-CUSHION.

Crochet Yarn Basket.

This basket is designed to keep yarn or worsted clean while knitting, for which purpose the basket-cover has a hole in the centre through which the thread is drawn. The original is in imitation of a basket in plaited straw, and is worked in yellow and brown twisted silk over a foundation of fine straw braid. Begin the basket in the centre of the under part with the yellow silk, making a foundation of five stitches; join these in a round, and crochet over the foundation of straw braid 8 sc. (single crochet) in the five foundation stitches; in this, as in the following rounds, 1 ch. (chain stitch) after every sc. In the next round, in which enough stitches are added to make it count 15 sc. and the same number of ch., splice on the brown silk, and work five times, alternating 1 brown sc., 2 yellow sc. The sc. of this, as of the following rows, are always worked around pensed with (each wedge-shaped yellow section numbers in the original 12 sc. in the last round); then in the next round, the first round of the side two inches high (in the original this has eighteen rounds), begins in the middle of every wedge-shaped section another brown stripe, the three stitches of which are worked around the middle chain stitch of the wedge, so that the side counts in all ten brown stripes. The finishing of the side consists of a row of sc. worked in brown silk. The cover is worked so as to correspond with the size of the under part, only somewhat larger, that it may slide over. Begin the cover in the centre with ten foundation stitches, join these in a ring, and work over the straw braid 1 sc. in each foundation stitch, and between each 1 ch. In the 2d round the brown stripes begin as on the under side. The side of the cover is 1 1/2 inch high. It is also finished by a round of brown the ch. of the preceding row. In working the brown sc., crochet the ch. immediately preceding with the brown silk; the brown sc., however, must be worked with the yellow silk. In the next round, which must count 30 sc., work three similar stitches in every brown stitch. From this time work no ch. in the brown stripe. The several brown stripes, each composed of three stitches, are separated each by 3 sc and the required number of ch. between, worked with yellow silk. The brown stripes continue radiated, each in a straight line; the widening takes place between them, so that the yellow foundation takes the form of wedges, and the whole forms a flat, round surface. When the under part has reached a diameter of three inches, further widening may be dis-

sc. Having finished the crochet work, prepare two circular pieces of pasteboard, of the same size as the cover and of the under part, cover these on one side with silk, and paste them inside to the under part and cover of the basket. The pasteboard of the cover contains a hole in the centre, to correspond with that in the crochet work, through which the thread may be drawn.

Manner of winding a Ball of Yarn so that the Thread may be drawn out from within.

By unwinding the thread from the inside of a ball of yarn or worsted, the thread, and therefore the work, remains clean until it is finished. The manner of winding such a ball may be learned from the accompanying illustrations. For the beginning wind a strand of 70-80 threads (Fig. 1) over the fingers of the left hand, which should be held somewhat spreading; then take this from the hand, lay it flat together, and wind around the middle for the space of an inch, always in the same direction, until it has reached an inch in diameter, but it must be wound so loosely that it may be slid backward and forward on the foundation strand. Now wind diagonally around this middle portion, as shown by a few threads in Fig. 2, in doing which, turn the strand around slowly, so that the winding may be regular and may cross, as shown in Fig. 3. Care must, however, be taken that no thread of the middle strand shall become entangled with the winding thread; the ball should always be turned from left to right, or toward the holder. When the ball has reached the required size wind it around a few times in the opposite direction, as shown by Fig. 3; fasten the end thread and draw out the middle strand carefully and slowly. Fig. 4 shows the ball without the middle strand. This last is used first.

MATERIALS: A round pasteboard box and cover, an inch and a half high by three inches diameter, cucumber seeds, large black beads, blue velvet, very narrow gold braid, wadding, stiff paper, varnish.

This box is intended for the reception of small articles of jewelry. The cover is wadded on the upper side, and covered with blue velvet, as is also the box. The edge of the cover is finished with a strip of velvet, pasted on stiff paper and cut as shown in the pattern, the edges being bordered with gold braid. The flaps extend beyond the edge of the cover. The bottom and sides are finished with a cover of cucumber seeds, which is prepared in one piece. We remark in the beginning that in stringing the seeds the needle must be put only through the ends, and also that after having finished a row the thread must not be cut off, but run through the last seed of the row just finished to the end which is still free, and the new row must be commenced at this point. Begin the covering in the centre of the bottom of the box by stringing 10 seeds on a thread, pressing them close together, and fastening the thread. In the second row string two new seeds between every two seeds of the last row. The third row is like the second. In the fourth row, put the needle through each of the two newly strung seeds of the last row, and string on two seeds each time. In the fifth row two new seeds between every two seeds of the former row. * Now run the needle through the next two newly strung seeds of the fifth row, string on a black bead, passing over the next two seeds of the former row, and repeat from * till the row is finished. This row forms the under-projecting row of the covering. Now work in connection with the bottom the covering for the sides of the box by first running the thread through the two seeds of the fifth row which were passed over, and stringing on two new seeds between every two of these. In the following row string always three new seeds after every two of the former row. Then work a row with two seeds after every three of the last row. The row which now follows is the last, and forms the upper projecting row of the covering. String three new seeds between every two of the last row; after this run the thread through the other end of the seeds, stringing on a bead between every three seeds. The covering, which is now finished, is fastened on the box by means of a few stitches.

Table-Cover in Application and Satin Stitch.

See illustration, page 389.

This pretty cover is made of gray cloth and brown velvet, ornamented with rich embroidery, tassels, and bells, and lined with brown lustring. Take, first, a circular piece of lustring of about eighty-two inches diameter, and arrange on this, according to the pattern, six straight velvet strips of about four inches in width, and six wedge-shaped pieces of cloth, so that they shall come together in the centre. The cover is rounded off on the outer edge as shown in the illustration, the cloth part being cut out in small scallops. The scallops must lie loosely over the velvet strips. The centre of the cover is finished by a star in black velvet, about twenty-four inches diameter, on which is embroidered a bouquet in satin stitch, worked with chenille and gold thread. Gold cord, gray silk braid, and gray silk cord border the star; the braid is worked over in point russe with gray silk, and the cord is arranged in loops. In arranging the star care must be taken that each point be laid exactly in the middle of a cloth piece. A similarly arranged medallion, nine inches in width by ten in height, is arranged in appliqué on each of the six cloth pieces; the outer edge is composed of gold cord, braid, and a narrow border worked in point russe, simulating black lace. The arabesque surrounding the medallions is partly of brown velvet bordered with gold cord, and partly worked in satin and chain stitch with gray and green silk. Besides this, the outer edges of the cloth sections are finished by a border of gray silk braid and point russe worked in black silk; these are arranged in waving lines. The braid is fastened by means of button-hole stitch, and on the point of each point russe scallop is a small bouquet worked in satin stitch with flossile silk. On the outer edge a small scallop of brown velvet is set under each place where the cloth is cut away; these are ornamented with fringe bells. Each of the velvet strips that lie between the cloth sections is finished with a heavy brown silk tassel and bells. The cover may be made in a simpler manner by omitting the satin stitch embroidery, and using two shades of the same color of the cloth.

"THIS HOUSE TO LET."

"THIS HOUSE TO LET."

That was what the bill said, neatly pasted on the front of the house! And it still adhered resolutely to the same story, neither more nor less, although Charles Wayne read it over three times, as he slowly ascended the flight of broad stone steps, carpet-bag in hand.

"To Let, eh?" muttered our hero, abstractedly, as he applied his latch-key to the door. "I wonder what's up now?"

Nobody in the parlor—no children's voices ringing in the halls—no familiar footstep on the stairs! What did it all mean? Had the house changed into an Enchanted Palace?

Marveling much, albeit he was of the phlegmatic model which is very apt to preserve its self-possession under any and all circumstances. Mr. Wayne went straight up to his own room—a cheerful little den, with south windows draped in crimson damask, and a crimson carpet, dotted all over with pearl-gray shells.

"I shall find the key to this mystery somewhere," said Mr. Wayne—and he was right. The key lay on his own desk, in the shape of a hastily written note, in his sister's caligraphy:

"DEAR CHARLEY.—Don't be surprised when you find the house deserted. We are called suddenly up into the country by Aunt Deborah's alarming and unexpected illness; but shall probably be back in a day or two. I have been obliged to take Bridget with me to take care of the children; but you can have your meals sent in from a restaurant."

"P.S.—I forgot to mention that as the landlord has seen fit to raise exorbitantly on the rent George has given up the house. If any one calls to see it, just show them over the premises; the more promptly the house is let, the sooner our trouble is over."

Charley Wayne deliberately refolded the letter and laid it on his desk.

"Here's a pretty greeting for a fellow, after a week's absence," he muttered. "Let me see—the note is dated this morning—consequently this is but the beginning of my troubles. I'm a Robinson Crusoe on his desert island—no I'm not; I am the solitary defender of a citadel, besieged by a swarm of house-hunters. And, as for having my meals sent in from a restaurant, I wonder what Mary takes me for; as if I couldn't cook better than half the women now! To be sure I have never had any experience; but any idiot going could cook a beef-steak and make a cup of coffee—and that reminds me that I am desperately hungry."

Mr. Wayne proceeded down to the kitchen on a foraging expedition, secretly chuckling at this opportunity for displaying his undeveloped culinary powers.

"No beef-steak, eh?" he muttered, looking into the depths of the refrigerator, "nothing but a fossilized chicken! Well, I'll have a roast! Fire's out in the range, of course. Then I must build another one, that's all there is to it."

And, diligently gathering treasures from the shaving bin and charcoal barrel, our hero soon succeeded in literally covering himself with dust and ashes!

"This won't do," said Charley, eying his garments with a discomfited air. "I'll tie on Bridget's checked apron—very thoughtful of her to leave it behind the door!"

"No sooner said than done—but the fire absolutely refused to burn. It smoked—it smoldered—it sulked—it shot up in evanescent brightness, only to die out into charred brands—in short, it conducted itself after the manner of fires possessed by evil spirits! One by one Charley Wayne pulled out all the dampers and thrust them in again, but apparently to no purpose—he blew under the grate until his cheeks looked like those of Raphael's cherubs—he poked diligently and nearly knocked his brains out, trying to look up the chimney; when, all of a sudden, the deceitful fire blazed up in the most cheerful manner imaginable! Charley's sooty face brightened to correspond—he promptly tied a string to the leg of his chicken and suspended it before the blaze with a twirl.

"I'll have my breakfast in no time at all," said he, burying two huge potatoes in the ashes below, and literally bestowing a double handful of the "very best Java coffee" in the tall tin pot which he had found on the shelf over the sink. "Meals from a restaurant, indeed!"

Just as he was washing his hands the bell sounded, sharp and sudden.

"Hullo!" soliloquized Mr. Wayne, "house-hunter Number One! Well, here goes for it."

Two maiden ladies stood on the door-step, prim, neatly dressed, and bearing the unmistakable stamp of single-blessedness in every feature of their starched countenance.

"Is this house to let?" inquired one, formally.

"Yes, ma'am," said Charley, wondering why they stared so, and following the direction of their eyes until his own rested on the checked apron which he had forgotten to remove!

"Can we inspect the premises?"

"Y-yes, ma'am," said Charley, covertly giving the apron a twitch. But instead of untying the obstinate knot only drew itself up tighter and persistently refused to be unloosed! And an apron worn over the left hip is not much of an improvement on an apron worn in front!

"Please to walk in," said our hero, hurriedly, still jerking at the refractory knot. "It's a very good house, indeed—capital balcony for smoking—jolly big parlors for a dance—ahem!" he checked himself abruptly as he caught the ascetic expression in the countenance of both sisters. "Rent only eighteen hundred, and gas-fixtures included!"

Having chattered off his lesson like a parrot, Mr. Wayne fell back on his apron strings.

The elder sister looked apprehensively at the younger, the younger returned the glance with even heightened expression.

"I—I don't think the house will suit us," said the former. "Come, Mehitabel!"

And as they descended the front steps Charley heard her say:

"Deranged, beyond a doubt; poor young man! And where could his friends have been? Really, we have had a narrow escape!"

"Any thing but a pack of old maids," said Charley, elevating his nose. But as he passed the little oval mirror in the hall hat-rack he caught a passing glimpse of his countenance.

No wonder they had fancied him unsettled in mind! A tattooed South Sea Islander could hardly have presented a face of more varied hues! Ashes and charcoal, with the healthy glow of exercise beneath and a curly pine shaving in his hair—this, together with the checked apron, and his incoherence of speech and manner, might well have inspired a doubt of his sanity.

A muttered exclamation broke from his lips, as he broke the strings of the offending garment, and retired to try the efficacy of old brown Windsor and double damask toweling.

Just as he had finished his ablutions another ring pealed on his startled ears—it was a careworn-looking matron this time with two little girls drawn up on either side of her, and two boys engaged in single combat on the threshold of the vestibule.

"I want to look at the house," said this modern Cornelia, abruptly. "George, if you don't let Henry Augustus alone I'll—"

"Yes, Madam—walk in," said Mr. Wayne. On which the youths desisted temporarily, and shuffled in after their mother and the two little girls, still muttering threats of dire vengeance against each other.

"Eighteen hundred dollars, eh?" said the matron, when she heard the rent. "George, come away from that piece o' statuary, quick! Henry Augustus, keep your fingers off the books! I never see such a meddler! That's a big rent, Sir! My family ain't large—only seven children, and we calculate to board the boys from the store—"

"I don't think the landlord would be willing to let it to a family of that size," said Charley, rather appalled at the light gymnastics in which Henry Augustus and the doughty George were indulging.

"Oh, well!" said the lady, with a toss of her head, "I'll look at the house!"

"Up stairs and down stairs" she went, like the character in nursery rhymes, opening every closet door, inspecting every nook and corner.

"Tain't much of a house, after all," was her ungracious comment. "Children, come! I do wish you would ever behave yourself five minutes at a time."

For Henry Augustus, disdainful of the ordinary method of locomotion, had slid nimbly down the balusters, leaving the furrowed impress of the brass buttons on his coat all the way down.

Charley Wayne breathed an internal thanksgiving as he closed the door behind this hopeful family group.

The next arrival was a tall, discontented-looking woman, with a very little husband, who made a point of finding fault with every thing. The door-handles were ungilded; the ceilings were not frescoed; the bath-room was inconvenient; nothing suited her—and meanwhile the little husband trotted after her, like a faithful dog, his hands in his pockets, and echoed her every sentiment.

"There's one alternative, ma'am," said Charley, beginning to get very much out of patience.

The tall lady looked expectant.

"If you don't like the house you're not obliged to take it."

The lady took her husband under her arm and departed in high dudgeon, much to our hero's relief.

"I wonder how my breakfast is getting along," he thought. "Upon my word I'm half famished."

Down stairs he went, two steps at a time. The fire had burned out; the chicken hung by its motionless string, one side charred the other quite raw. The potatoes were as hard as ever they were, and the coffee had apparently never conceived the idea of boiling.

Charley whistled, low and long—the mystic art of cookery was acquiring a new complication in his eyes.

"I'll have to begin over again," said Charley, with a deep sigh as he remembered the charcoal and ashes, "for—"

The bell again—the bell, jingling as maliciously as if its wires were instinct with some evil genius.

This time it was a cozy old lady with an umbrella, wherewith she gesticulated as she talked.

"Is this house to let?"

"It is," returned our hero, laconically.

"Well, I'd like to look at it. Our landlord has put an extra two hundred on our house, and my husband says, says he, 'Melindy, tain't worth while to pay no more in such a poor location.' It's a to'able nice house; I hain't nothin' to say against the house—"

"No, ma'am. These are the parlors; the extension-room—"

"But," went on the old lady, apparently quite regardless of the interruption, "there's two grocery stores opposite, and a stable next door but one, and my husband says to me, says he—"

"Hot and cold water; a superior range; and bells all over the house," interrupted Charley, resolved to have his say. But the old lady was irrepressible.

"Melindy," says he, 'we may as well pull up stakes, for we've lived here seven year come next May, and though three removes is as bad as a fire, still tain't in human nature to put up with the landlords nowadays, and if I've said once I've said forty times—'"

"Dumb-waiter in the dining-room and chandeliers included—rent only eighteen hundred dollars!"

"Eighteen hundred dollars!" ejaculated the old lady, piercingly. "Why we only pay eight, and my husband—he is in the commission business—he says to me, 'Melindy—'"

"Then you won't care to see the rooms, ma'am," said Charley, skillfully avoiding the point of the waving umbrella.

"Not at that price, for my husband—"

Charley was edging her skillfully toward the door.

"My husband—"

"Take care of the steps, ma'am—they are slippery—all right—good-morning!"

And he closed the door precipitately. Applicant after applicant arrived, inspected the house, and expressed a variety of opinions, none of them complimentary. Charley began to think himself it was a little strange he had lived so long in the mansion without discovering its many drawbacks, inconveniences, and bad features.

"On the whole I'm rather glad we're going to leave it!" he thought, uncomfortably.

He was beginning seriously to contemplate the idea of packing his valise, slipping out at the area door, and leaving the house to its fate, as an alternative to the perpetual stream of house-hunters who were gradually badgering all energy, life, and spirit out of him, when the bell sounded again, softly.

"I'll answer it this once," thought Charley. "and then I'll take out the wires and tear down the bill. Human nature can't stand this sort of thing much longer!"

"Two ladies again—but how unlike the two who had first disturbed the current of his culinary reflections! They were dressed in deep mourning, and veiled; and the voice in which the taller spoke to him was soft as flute or dulcimer."

"Will you allow us to look at this house, Sir?"

As Charley bowed them in, somehow receiving the impression—how, he could scarce tell himself—that they were reduced ladies, with but little money and fewer friends, the younger threw aside her veil, revealing a sweet little apple-blossom of a face, with eyes like the dewy cups of blue-bells, and a wistful mouth.

"Charles! Charles Wayne!"

He started at the soft, strangely-familiar voice. Surely it was not little Kate Berrian, with whom he had had that flirtation—or was it something more than a flirtation?—two years ago, at the Springs, and whose dried roses were still scenting with their weird fragrance the corner of his dressing-box up stairs!

(Ah, how plainly the sound of her voice brought back the brief episode, with its sun-bright mornings and its delicious purple twilights, the light touch of Kate's hand in his, and the slight misunderstanding, almost intangible at first, that widened into such cruel separation, with its not yet healed pangs!)

"Miss Berrian, excuse me—but through your veil—"

Kate colored and sighed.

"I am not Miss Berrian. I am a widow now—Mrs. Elsworth—and this is my sister. We are very poor, Charles Wayne, and—and I am going to try to open a boarding-house. I should like to see the rooms, if you please."

And with this quietly-uttered speech Kate seemed resolutely to put from her all the old memories and softening associations, and to return, as it were, to the dry, dusty thoroughfare of everyday life. There were no more pleasant little by-paths for her—no shadowy nooks, with madrigals of birds, and sunbeams, and falling waters; her feet were on the arid pathway now, and blistered and weary though they might be, there was no help or mercy for them!

"But, Kate—Miss Berrian—I mean Mrs. Elsworth!" stammered our hero, "a boarding-house—I don't understand; surely you are not—"

"My means are quite limited," said the young widow, with the softest shadow of rose stealing over her cheek. "I must work for my daily bread. This house seems well adapted to the purpose, and—and—perhaps, Mr. Wayne, as we have but few acquaintances in the city, and are strangers here, you could assist us in obtaining a few boarders."

"Kate!"

"You see I am cured of the pride which was once my besetting sin; I am not too haughty to sue humbly for favors now," she said, smiling, though the rose-tint was deepening every minute, and a dewy moisture sparkled on the drooping eyelashes.

Wayne silently turned, and led the way up stairs, the young widow and her sister following. How passing strange it seemed!

"I think I may venture to engage the house," said Mrs. Elsworth, timidly. "It is a great undertaking; but Jeannie and I stand alone now, and we must rely on ourselves. Can I trouble you for the landlord's address?"

"I—I will see him myself, and bring you his answer, if you will tell me where you live," said Wayne.

And Kate wrote the address, blushing as she did so at the pitiful obscurity of the street.

Charley tore down the bill with infinite satisfaction when the two slight figures in black had disappeared, locked the door, and rushed frantically round the corner to the nearest restaurant. It might have been unromantic; it might have been lacking in high-souled chivalry; but Charley was but mortal; he had not eaten since morning, and, as Owen Meredith so aptly observes, "Where is the man that can live without dining?"

"Thank goodness, the house is let!" mentally ejaculated our hero.

That evening Mr. Wayne's card was brought up to the room in the shabby tenement-house where Kate Elsworth sat at her needle-work. Jeannie was out, but Charley contrived to survive that disappointment with equanimity.

"You have brought me news of the house!" said Kate, eagerly. How sweet she looked in her little widow's cap, from beneath whose stiff border the ringlets would escape like misty spirals of gold!

"Yes," said Charley.

"I can have it?"

"No, you can not, Kate."

A shadow of disappointment came over the wistful face.

"Why not?"

"Somebody else has taken it. I have taken it, Kate."

"You, Mr. Wayne!"

"Yes; and if you want to open a boarding-house, with me for a boarder, you may have it. But I warn you you can only come there as my wife."

The needle dropped from her fingers—the blue eyes became softly luminous.

"Charles!"

"I think we loved each other once, Kate, before the envenomed tongue of slander separated us so widely. Let us forget the past, and live only in the future now. What do you say, Kate? Will you take the house in—Street on these terms, myself included?"

He had imprisoned both her hands in his, and was reading every fluttering change of her countenance.

"I—I'll think of it," she faltered. "Let go my hand, Charley, please—Jeannie is coming!"

And Jeannie, entering at the same moment, marveled much at the carmine brightness of her sister's cheek.

"Are you going to take the house, Kate?" questioned that young lady eagerly, as she laid aside her bonnet.

Charles Wayne listened intently for the answer. Would it be a confirmation of his hopes, or would it doom him to hopeless old-bachelorhood? And Kate, with downcast blue eyes and deepening bloom, answered:

"Yes!"

SPRING FASHIONS.

HAVE you seen the announcement, my dear Genevieve? Madame le Printemps—so says the Bazar—Has her "Opening" this week, and you can not conceive How perfectly lovely the Spring fashions are.

Now what do you think is to come up again? (Le Printemps has every thing just as she wills) Why GRASS, just as sure as I live! though 'tis plain The thing isn't new, but as old as the hills.

I asked her, "Dear Printemps, those bright yellow things That were worn all last season for trimmings—on grass, Shall they be revived?" "What! my birds without wings, My yellow-birds voiceless," she cried, "let them pass?"

"No, indeed, my fair lady, I never shall sever My grass and its flowers. This season shall see The bright dandelion as much worn as ever— It can't be old-fashioned while favored by me."

This settled the matter. And, talking of trimmings, Those exquisite fringes of crystal, they say— In fact, crystal trimmings at all—are beginning To be quite out of date, for they've melted away.

But we'll have in their stead, dear, the loveliest Daisies, And trailing Arbutus, and Violets too, And Jonquils and Columbine—good in their places, And lovely for trimming, though not very new.

There's a Jack-in-the-pulpit—grown bolder and bolder— Who says (the sarcastic old hater of form!) That the Hills shall no longer be stript on the shoulder, Nor the Trees go bare-armed, now the weather is warm.

And Printemps, they tell me, has gracefully yielded, Already their garments commencing to weave; So I made my new dress, dear (or, rather, Miss Neil did), Quite high in the neck, dear, and long in the sleeve.

A little bird told me (I'm glad birds are coming) That two of our very old families here, The Brooks and the Rills, are to waterfalls running— So the chignon's not quite out of fashion, my dear,

As for skirts, I'm delighted to say that the willows Will trail on the ground where the banks will allow: (Do you know, I'd much rather see stiff armadillos Parading Broadway than those suits they wear now.)

The sky, I'm informed, is to be azure blue (The same as last season), and worn pretty high, And bordered with gold where the sun's looking through, Or spangled with stars while the knight passes by.

And now, Genevieve—shall I tell you, my darling? These fashions of Spring make me ready to shout; For I'm not at all like Dean Laurence's stalling; I can get out, dear—I can get out!

THE CHARACTAGENT.

WHEN I spoke of "our shop," did I mention that it is a grocery? It is a corner-grocery, and if you should pass there you may see my name on the sign over it: P. Lumpkin. I mention it now, not because I am proud of it—to tell the truth, I confess to a certain base shame in the matter—but because the public interest requires it. That is, I do not know how to commence my story without admitting the fact, and rather than inflict such a loss on the readers of the Bazar as not to commence it at all, perish all personal considerations!

In the early hours of the afternoon occurs what I may call the ebb-tide of our trade, nothing coming up on our counter but a feeble wash of pennies, which I leave to my assistant Jo. Meantime I retire with a cigar to a sort of sanded bower formed by two hogsheds and a section of wall.

It was on such a time, and in this bower, that I first saw the charactagent. I was busy with a Lumpkin paper—On Woman, her Faults, Follies, and Failures; that is, I was tracing the outlines of the article in the smoke of my cigar, when there entered a comely young person carrying a peddler's basket filled with ladies' night-caps.

"No, we don't want any caps to-day," said I. "But these are not caps, Sir. They are charactagents," replied the young person, picking up one of the flimsy affairs and dangling it on her fingers. "No doubt you will have observed, Sir, that where there is a universal want the invention to supply that want is sure to be close at hand; and I suppose, Sir, there is no want more universal than that of women to suit the taste of the gentleman of the present day. It is getting really dreadful to take up a paper or a magazine and to read how foolish and extravagant and unpleasant all the ladies are, and how little good all the preaching and talking seems to do them."

This the young person delivered as a speech learned by rote, eying me the while and twirling the cap on her fingers; and having taken breath she began anew.

"Mr. Pool—that is the inventor, Sir—has thought for a long time that there was a remedy for the evils of ladies' dispositions, Sir, and that the old gentleman's notion about doing away with the bad bumps of a person's head, might not be so ridiculous as it looked, and in the 'charactagent,'" tapping the cap with her finger, "Mr. Pool thinks he has found it."

"But," said I, "that is a night-cap."

"Bless you, Sir! it is made with frills and puffs to catch a lady's eye. But here, you see, is what we call a 'system' of muslin bows, and under each of these bows is a pad, made on the principle of what the boys call a sucker. These pads are movable, and are applied in this way: The gentleman should have a chart of the lady's head for whom he desires the cap. He then arranges these pads to press on the bumps of her head that are objectionable. Say the lady is conceited. He slips the bow and the pad thus [rapid movement of the fingers]. The lady wears the cap quite unsuspecting [popping the cap in question on her head, and assuming an innocent expression]. All night there is this steady pressure. A prodigious pressure, you will remember, fifteen pounds to the square inch. In one night—"

"The lady's head would be crushed to a jelly," I suggested.

Something like a smile twinkled for an instant in the young person's eyes.

"Mr. Pool has devoted several years to experiments on the human skull," she replied, demurely, "and he finds the male skull invariably much softer than the female. Such a pressure might reduce your head to a jelly, Sir, while it would only produce a slight alteration in that of your wife's. If you like, Sir, I can show you several testimonials from hen-pecked husbands of wealth and distinction, whose wives have already been brought by the 'charactagent' from utter shrewishness to the most lamb-like dispositions, and without once suspecting the cause of the change."

I bought the caps. Half-a-dozen of them. Not that I am hen-pecked. But, then, what a text for my article on Woman would my experiments with Mrs. Lumpkin afford! and of course Mrs. Lumpkin has her peculiarities, like other women. I made a mental list of them at once. Over-fondness of dress—Mrs. Lumpkin had that. Slavish devotion to fashion—How often had I preached from that text! Love of gossip—One of Mrs. Lumpkin's weaknesses. Want of logic—Why, she continually exasperated me. Fretting—Could I ever hope to cure her of that? General frivolity of ideas and want of interest in serious and noble issues—Oh! there I really found a great gulf fixed between myself and my wife. Sentimental whims—Had I not often heard Mrs. Lumpkin declare that she did not live, she puddingized? Caprices—Certainly Mrs. Lumpkin had these! Ready for tears one day, brimming with fun the next; and neither she nor any other mortal knew the reason why!

I made a list of these failings, and resolved to take them in order.

No conspirator ever went about with a more awful sense of guilt and danger. Suppose I should drop the list from my pocket! Imagine my wife reading it to herself! "Want of logic!" "General frivolity!" "Great gulf fixed!" "Mr. Lumpkin, what is this?" What should I reply? Suppose she should discover the "charactagent!" Does any mortal doubt that she would not have compelled me to wear it myself?

But when my wife at last laid her head down on her pillow in that night-cap, and when she closed her eyes, with a "system" of pads pressing on all the peacock developments in her head at the rate of fifteen pounds to the square inch, my sensations were simply dreadful! How did I know whether I had a right to deprive her of one of her bumps? Who should assure me that it was not a crime to make her character lop-sided? What might the physical consequences be of such a moral revolution? When she laid quiet I found myself listening to hear if she still breathed; and once, thinking she was dead, I was about to break out in frantic adjurations, when she reassured me by a gentle snore.

Morning came, and with a horrible sense of guilt I watched her as she took off the charactagent. Was there a hollow in her round, well-shaped head? She certainly complained that she could not arrange both sides of her hair alike.

"It is of small consequence, however," she said, brushing it into a rough knot and catching up an old wrapper. "A hundred years hence who will know whether I looked well or ill on this particular morning?"

As this is one of my favorite sayings, I looked hard at her, to see whether she was quizzing me; but she met my gaze with an honest indifference of expression. The charm was working!

At dinner I was somewhat disconcerted to find her still in the wrapper and with her hair rough, as I have always been secretly proud of my wife's trim appearance. She explained "that she had been too busy to make a toilette, which, after all, was of no use to any body;" but she was so displeasing to my eyes that I began to waver. Should I listen to the great moral principle that a woman should not be fond of dress, or to my own personal weakness? and I can really hardly tell how I should have decided if I had not thought to ask myself what one of the ancient Romans (for whom I have always had a vast admiration) would do in my position. And of course, what could he do, if he desired to make a paragraph in history, except what I did?—apply the "charactagent" a second time.

The following day was Sunday. Not having spring clothes, my wife had decided not to attend church; but she now appeared in velvet bonnet, winter cloak, and a huge hoop, having most unfortunately broken one of more modern shape.

"As long as my clothes are whole," she said, emphatically, "what difference need it make if other women are wearing light colors, and thin stuffs? There is no law commanding me to do likewise."

Of course, I had nothing to say to this. Here was that common-sense displayed in wearing what she had, to which I had so often exhorted her. The "charactagent" was working wonders. Still, the weather was June weather. Mrs. Lumpkin puffed and perspired. People looked curiously at her and me, and I thought as much as possible about the ancient Romans.

That night I examined my list; found "love of gossip" next in order, and applied the "charactagent" accordingly.

That day, unfortunately, Uncle Paget came to town, and lunched, as is his custom, with my wife. Like every other family of any note, we have a fine family quarrel, involving Uncle Paget and a considerable sum of money. Therefore after these visits of my uncle my wife has always had on hand a very pretty stock of "he said" and "they said," including the incredible things Hannah and Mrs. Davidson had done last, in all of which I confess I am considerably interested. So, hearing that Uncle Paget had been there, I waited for the news. My wife sat mum; and when I asked for the news from home, "They are all well, I believe," she answered indifferently, and began to talk of coals.

I was never more curious in my life, for when Uncle Paget came last Hannah had screamed after him, "You will repent it in two weeks' time," and I had now expected to hear whether he had repented, and why, in "two weeks' time." As I have always pished and pshawed at gossip, I was ashamed to ask directly, and waited, supposing that she could not long keep the tidings to herself. But the "charactagent" had taken care of that. And not only was I disappointed in this Paget business, but all those little rills of gossip that used to freshen our conversation, as what the grocer said about the lady who lived two doors on the left, and how Mr. Symonds took his failure, were cut off; which was the more provoking, as in spite of the scorn with which every sensible person must regard such information, I not unfrequently caught a hint which worked up very well in a Lumpkin paper.

The next want on my list was want of logic. As I have said, my wife continually exasperated me by this failing. Did I observe that the Reverend Gearing gave us a well-written sermon?

"I don't think so," cried my wife. "He is a bad man for all his gown."

"Very possibly, my dear; but bad men may write well."

"Now, Mr. Lumpkin, how can you say so, when any one can see how ill he treats his wife? The poor thing starts if he only looks her way."

And nothing could move Mrs. Lumpkin. Or, she expostulated with me because I would walk before breakfast; and when I insisted that I was the better for it—

"Oh yes! so poor Charlie Gray always said; and yet," she would add, with an air of triumph, "he died when he was only twenty-five."

And it made no sort of difference to Mrs. Lumpkin that he died because he was accidentally shot.

Can you blame me, then, for trying my next experiment on those unlucky bumps of prejudice, impulse, etc., that so disturbed the balance of her mind?

"My dear, what are you reading?" inquired Mrs. Lumpkin, the next morning, as I turned over the leaves of a thin pamphlet between the sips of my coffee.

"The prospectus of the Washoff Mining Company."

Now, in the old times, that is before the days of the "Charactagent," Mrs. Lumpkin would have pouted, which she does very prettily, and then she would have laughed, which she is fond of doing, because she has dimples, and then she would have cried petulantly, "The tiresome thing!" meaning the pamphlet, and presently I would find the "tiresome thing!" snatched from my hand and waved aloft in triumph. She has done it a hundred times. But now she simply said "Ah!" in a judicial tone, as if she were waiting for the rest of the evidence.

"Nash gave it to me," I explained, somewhat uneasily. "He says the mine is a good thing—"

"And wants you to take his share?" queried my wife, sharply.

"Why—yes! that is—"

"Why not keep it himself?"

"His business leaves him no time to attend to it."

"Oh! then, of course, Mr. Nash must find his regular business more profitable than the silver mine."

"I don't see that."

"I do, very clearly, Mr. Lumpkin. Mr. Nash is a business man. Business men stick to what will bring the most money. Mr. Nash sticks to ordinary trade. I would advise you to do the same."

"But, my dear, you do not understand these matters."

"I understand this much," answered my wife, stoutly. "Let us call Mr. Nash, or rather his business, A and yours B. Your profits are pretty nearly equal; so A=B. Let us call the silver mine x. Mr. Nash has tried x, and finds that x is less than B; so we have A-x. Now, as B=A, if you should try x, in my opinion you will find that the result will be B-x with you too."

There is no more severe test of a man's temper than to find that his wife has the best of the argument; but, to have her demonstrate it algebraically, why it is simply frightful!

Not knowing what else to say, "My dear," said I, slyly, "remember Mr. Williams and the Police report."

This had nothing to do with the case in point. It was simply a bit of domestic abracadabra, which no doubt all discerning husbands know how to use on occasion. The case of Mr. Williams was one in which my wife had been so woefully in the wrong that to mention it was, if the ladies will pardon me so vile a comparison, like shaking a red rag at a bull. My wife never failed to reden at once and argue the case all over again, involving herself finally in a tangle of explanations, and quite losing sight of the case in hand. Not so on this occasion.

"The dispute about Mr. Williams has no bearing on the case in point," she answered, coldly.

I went to my business puzzled and discontented. However little man may want here below, I doubt whether he is ever quite sure in his own mind what that little really is. How often had I pictured Mrs. Lumpkin to myself indifferent to fashion, scornful of gossip, and capable of an argument. But, now that she was possessed of these perfections, I found in myself no corresponding rapture, but something much more like sulkiness.

"Fretting" came next, and here I applied the "charactagent" without hesitation, for certainly no woman can be better for fretting; and my experiment proved just in time, for the following day was one of the unlucky days that occasionally afflict a household. A neighbor's dog stole our breakfast, little Ben scalded himself badly, the maid gave warning, and just as I came home spilled a bottle of ink on the parlor carpet.

"Confound it," said I. Mrs. Lumpkin said nothing, but began to wash the carpet. I stood looking at her, and the enormity of the maid's carelessness grew upon me the while.

"What did she want in here?" cried I, savagely. "She had no business in the parlor; and why should she go whisking about among the chairs and tables at all? And why was the ink here? I don't consider the parlor the place for bottles of ink."

And half a dozen times that afternoon I found myself growling about the maid, and declaring that the carpet was ruined. Consequently I was uncomfortable through the whole afternoon: whereas, if Mrs. Lumpkin had fretted, as in the days before the "charactagent," I should simply have said, "Come, come, my dear, scolding will not draw out the ink," and have thought nothing more about it: for there is no such sedative to your anger as the wrath of another.

Next on my list I found my wife's lack of interest in noble thoughts: but here I was at fault. The charactagent did not make bumps, but destroyed them. Besides, I had doubts. I began to see dimly that it might not be altogether desirable to raise Mrs. Lumpkin too nearly to my own level. Once there, she might find me out, for it is distance that lends enchantment to the view, you know. Finally, then, I had to deal with "sentimental whims" and "caprices;" but as I was arranging the pads I heard my wife on the stairs. I adjusted them hurriedly, and walked away from the dressing-table just as she entered the door.

As ill luck would have it I slept late, and was awakened by Bridget, trembling and crying.

"Oh, Murther Lumpkin," she sobbed, "coom quick. There's something quare with the mistress!"

As you may suppose, my first thought was of the "charactagent!" What had I done? I hurried down stairs. Mrs. Lumpkin was in the kitchen—Mrs. Lumpkin! no! She moved about the kitchen, broom in hand, but she moved by steam. Little jets of steam came out from her lips and nostrils; wheels jarred and clicked within her as she moved. She wore a dial-plate on her breast, and a key hung from her neck. With this key you would hear up; at the same time you moved the hands on the dial-plate to any figure, say seven. In that case she made seven revolutions about the room. On stopping, a little bell suspended from her ear rang vigorously. On examination I discovered also that she was an ingenious combination of the sewing-machine, the knitting-machine, the patent washer and wringer, and the new apple-parer. Under her chignon was a little door through which she was supplied with coal. My beloved wife was an automaton.

What had I done? In my flurry I had arranged the pads to press equally all over her head, and they had destroyed her individuality. Something, too, must have happened to the electric currents, and—well, I can not explain it; but there she was.

As I was surveying her with unutterable grief and dismay, the young person who had sold me the "charactagent" looked in at the door.

"Ah!" she cried, "did I not tell you? There is a success; there is the 'charactagent's' perfect work. There is the woman of the twentieth century. There is the only form under which she can exist as gentlemen would have her. She is neither silly, nor strong-minded, nor vain, nor slatternly, nor prudish, nor coquettish, nor learned, nor simple, nor weakly, nor masculine, nor jealous, nor a scold. And she hears nothing, sees nothing, says nothing, and costs nothing, and she can manage the house, and sew on buttons. She is perfection."

"Wretch!" I cried—and awoke.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

AN INQUIRER.—Organdy, grenadine, or Chambery gauze can be used for a summer wedding dress. White morning dresses are gored, with full train, and sloped to fasten at the side, like the redingote. Muslin house dresses may be made with a demi-train, but not short. Very small hoops are worn at present. There are indications that the tournure or bustle will be revived. An inch and a half is the usual width at the waist between the seams of the back, but this depends somewhat on the figure. The side seams should be directly under the arm. The gauging of the skirt reaches three or four inches. A medium belt is from an inch and a half to two inches wide. The "chemise Russe" is a kind of blouse, gathered into a belt; not so full as the Garibaldi. The military style of trimming is with graduated parallel lines of plain folds or of braid. Harper's Bazar is delivered to city subscribers on the prepayment of the postage, which is one cent per week.

A COUNTRY LADY.—The sash should be of the same material as the dress, for a plain dress, and should be made double or lined with soft silk. For the brown silk make the sash of the same and bind it with velvet, or trim it, en suite with the dress, with narrower velvet.

WOMEN AND THEIR WORK.

IT is only two or three decades ago—certainly within the generation—that woman's work was confined almost exclusively to the domestic duties of the household, and to needle-work for a certain class of manufacturers. We are speaking, in our allusion to dates, of woman's work in this country; but it is also true that the partial emancipation of woman from household drudgery, and her admission into the field of lighter manufactures, does not date very far back, even in the older countries of Europe. The revolution first began, practically, in France and Germany, where circumstances and the free habits, mercurial temperament, and liberal education of the people, united to produce it. The wars of NAPOLEON BONAPARTE had so greatly reduced the numbers of the men in both countries that it was found necessary to employ women in the fields and vineyards, then in all the lighter branches of manufactures, and ultimately as saleswomen in various departments of trade. Revolutions, as is very well known, never go backward—at least not such sensible ones as that which opened new fields of labor to the "sex of peculiar duties"—and at this time France and Germany are far in advance of the rest of civilized Europe in this regard. In a part of this country—New England and the Middle States—the rapid increase of manufactures and the large emigration to the West of the male population are causes which have combined to produce a similar result there; and the shop-girls in the stores of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, and the working-women in the manufacturing establishments of Lynn, Lowell, New York, and the thousand and one other productive cities of our Northeast, are as independent and thrifty, as respectable in character, as elegant in manners, and as beautiful in form and feature as any class of women in the world.

This revolution, though beginning later in this country, has moved with greater speed than in either France or Germany, and woman's liberty in this, as in every other social respect, is less contracted and more firmly established in the United States than in any other land. Not only are the trades and manufactures generally open to them, but also the professions, and they now enter into competition with the male sex in many fields of labor heretofore supposed to belong exclusively to men, and thought to be not only out of the province, but really beyond the comprehension of the gentler sex. Women are now not only sales and cash clerks, and even book-keepers for merchants—not only book-binders, type-setters, shoe-fitters, paper-box makers, milliners, mantua-makers, envelope-makers, florists, hair-dressers, umbrella-makers, photograph-mounters, toy-painters, hat-trimmers, silver-burnishers, fur-trimmers, amber-workers, jewelers, artificial-flower makers, skirt as well as shirt makers, etc., etc., for manufacturers—not only copyists for lawyers and others, secretaries for institutions, telegraph operators, etc., but also art-designers for silver-ware, furniture, and many other sorts of manufactures; wood-engravers, working from the designs of others, but as frequently from their own; painters, sculptors, singers, actresses, lecturers, school-teachers, physicians, and we have lately seen an account of the admission of a lady lawyer to the bar of one of the Western States, while another has still later been made the chief clerk of the Legislature of Kansas.

We have attempted, in visiting several of the representative establishments in this city, to get some data as the basis for a calculation of the numbers and the wages of the women now supporting themselves in New York city, but have found it impossible to give a positively accurate statement of the aggregate numbers employed in all branches of commerce and manufactures, though the average wages received can be definitely stated. It is a grave defect of our generally-admirable Census Reports, that, while giving minutely the statistics as to the occupations, wages, and condition in life of the male population of the country, they wholly omit any facts or figures regarding the female portion; and in view of the increased importance of the woman-labor question, and the great value to society of all statistics about itself, we urge upon Mr. KENNEDY and the other powers of the Census Bureau to take a lesson from the English and this hint from ourselves, and give us, as he readily can, in the Report for 1870, the full statistics on this interesting subject. We do not presume to give positive figures, but there remains no doubt that in the city of New York, at this time, one hundred thousand women and girls support themselves by working in the manufactories or acting as saleswomen in stores; and that of these at least forty thousand are "slaves of the needle." We can not vouch for the accuracy of these figures, and we shall be glad to have from better-informed persons any facts and figures which will more closely approximate the truth; but certainly the statement is not an exaggerated one; on the contrary, we should not be surprised to find that it is far below the aggregate, and that fully the larger number mentioned of the women of this metropolis have the good-sense and independence to turn to other means for support than that most precarious one of the needle.

Among the most interesting of these branches of labor for women is that of type-setting. There are some ten or twelve printing establishments in New York where female compositors are employed. The Independent, Scientific American, Daily World, Eagle, and other papers noted for their typographical appearance, are largely "set up" by females. They are largely employed in the Bible House, and many of the books issued from that and the houses of Messrs. APPLETON & CO., HARPER & BROTHERS, etc., etc., are the product of females. There are about 200 women, generally young, engaged in type-setting in

New York city. The trade is one which has been practically open to the sex only for five or six years, and as it requires some time to learn it few have entered it. They are paid by the "piece"—that is, according to the amount of work done, and at rates equal to about one-tenth less than that paid to men. Many of the more experienced type-setters make from $15 to $18 per week, and the average wages to all grades of female compositors is about $10 per week.

In the other branches of the publishing business women are employed as "folders," "gatherers," "sewers," "gold-layers," "binders," and in small numbers at the presses. There are in the city six or seven large establishments like that of Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS where about 50 folders, 50 sewers, 20 binders, 8 gold-layers, and 10 gatherers are regularly employed throughout the year, and a great many other smaller establishments which employ about 10 females each. At least 2500 women find employment in these several capacities, "folders" and "sewers" receiving about $8, and "gatherers," "binders," and "gold-layers" about $10 per week as average wages the year round.

A large number, 1400 or 1500 females, are employed in the manufacture of paper-boxes. These are mostly very young persons, and the average of wages paid is about $6 per week. The work is simple and requires little practical knowledge, and girls are worth as much to an employer in their second week as in their second year at this work.

In the making of paper collars fully as many girls are employed at perhaps lesser wages—about $5 per week is the average.

It is plainly apparent that women are rapidly superseding men as teachers in the public and private schools of the country, and it is estimated that over 100,000 females are thus employed at this time. Particularly so is this the case in Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and those States where education is most general. There are six times as many female as male teachers in Massachusetts; five times as many in Vermont; twelve times as many in the city of New York; and fifteen times as many in Philadelphia. There is no inducement for men to enter the profession, as women can be found who, working for less wages, are practically as good tutors.

It is stated—how reliably we can not say, but by a standard journal—that in Philadelphia six ladies who practice medicine have incomes ranging from $2000 to $10,000, $15,000 is the highest income of a female physician in New York. There are other women physicians of note in Boston, Utica, Rochester, Elmira, Ithaca, and Milwaukee.

In the search for our statistics we went through the "up town" establishment of Messrs. A. T. STEWART & CO., where almost every branch of manufacture besides those mentioned to which women are admitted, is carried on. Here we found at least 800 young ladies engaged in making every thing that is worn by humanity except boots and shoes. In the "Ladies' and Children's Department," to which an entire floor is devoted, and in which are made full suits for females of all ages, and embracing every thing from under-linen to bonnets (not forgetting the monogram of the customer if desired), regular employment is given the year round to about 400 women who make on an average $8 per week. Cutters and forewomen are paid from $12 to $15 per week; these have their assistants who receive from $10 to $12 per week; the operatives are paid by the "piece," and receive, according to their industry and intelligence, from $6 50 to $12 per week. In the "Cloak Department" are about 200 girls, who get about the same as the operative in the "Ladies' Department." In the "Shawl Department" various descriptions of shawls are made and repaired; and there we saw dextrous and nimble fingers repair splendid India shawls which had been worn threadbare at the folds in such a manner that the seam and patch could not be detected. The same fairy-like artisans removed from the same costly fabrics dark and unattractive shades and replaced them by colors which were in demand in the market, and that in such a way as to really improve the shawls. Here about 25 women are employed at about $8 per week each. Nearly as many find equally remunerative labor in the "Skirt Department." In the "Boys' Department" for the manufacture of youths' clothing the operatives to the number of 75 are paid by the week at an average of $9. About 60 women are constantly at work in the "Upholstery Department" in making curtains, mattresses, sheets, pillow-cases, napkins, towels—in short, all the furnishing goods for house, hotel, steamer, and sleeping-car. They get from $6 to $9 per week. In the "Fur Department" as many as 70 persons are employed in the busy season at wages averaging $8, but as the winter is just over we found only half-a-dozen employed in taking care of the stock. In the carpet room about 60 girls are employed, and make about $7 50 per week. On this floor, but intended for the benefit of other departments, we were surprised to come across about 35 washer-women, ironers, and fluters, engaged in making up and preparing for customers, and for display in the store, all sorts of linen and other goods. These are paid by the week at $7 50. This establishment at times employs as many as 1500 women, a good proportion of whom do not work in the building but at their own residences. Besides those enumerated above there are also to be found a few saleswomen, and young women with good figures who "try on" the patterns of cloaks, etc., etc., while neat and pleasant-looking telegraphic operators of the gentler sex are engaged constantly in communicating between the retail and the wholesale establishments.

Of course there are not many establishments which work on so large a scale as that of Messrs. STEWART & CO.; but it is believed that the New York houses, in the same line of business, give regular employment to 40,600 females at these remunerative rates.

We can give no idea of the numbers of women employed as saleswomen in the city. There seems to have been a reluctance on the part of merchants to employ women in this capacity, an equal reluctance of the sex to so engage, and a singular and unaccountable indisposition of the public to deal with female clerks. These are prejudices fast wearing away, and one that will soon entirely disappear. Mr. A. T. STEWART, who has done so much to prove the natural alliance of Capital and Labor, is about to give the death-blow to this senseless prejudice by so far reorganizing his system as to place saleswomen in certain appropriate departments of his establishment and male clerks in the others. This movement has already been begun, and saleswomen for the cloak, shawl, under-linen, and other departments where ladies' goods are sold, are now being engaged. This action of Mr. STEWART will be the breaking of the ice in this direction, and if his example is widely followed, as it doubtless will be, it will result in great good.

In our visits to the various establishments we were struck by three facts, not new or singular, and yet not generally appreciated. The first is that needle-work—the hardest labor performed by woman and the one for which she is popularly supposed to be most fitted—is the least remunerative. This is not in consequence of the oppression of the employers—a popular superstition based on a few undoubtedly truthful stories of hard-hearted employers. It is not in consequence of a short demand for needle-work—an argument falsely advanced by employers to explain the fact of small wages. It is in consequence of the vast numbers of such laborers. The supply is largely in excess of the demand; and the eager thousands anxiously supplicating for work underbid each other, and labor for life at work which does not support but kills. The moment a woman is reduced to want she turns to her needle for support instead of seeking it in less crowded channels. The natural consequence can be readily imagined, and is not untruthfully suggested in the centre picture of our group of engravings on pages 392 and 393.

The second fact is additional proof of the falsity of the idea that labor-saving machines destroy the laborer. The contrary is the case of sewing-machines and similar inventions as well as of steam-engines and locomotives. The more machines employed the greater the force of operatives and the higher the wages paid. The introduction of newly-invented machinery into any business opens up new and hitherto unsuspected branches of that manufacture. Thus, we found in one establishment a newly-invented machine for making paper-boxes which had not only developed new styles of boxes and increased the demand for work-women, but in the manufacture of the machine itself a new industry had been discovered.

The third fact is, that whether working by the "piece" or on salary, the higher the degree of intelligence the higher the rate of wages. It is not merely true that those who are best acquainted with their particular trade make the most wages, but superior intelligence in general matters makes a great difference. A practically educated person not only learns a trade sooner, but learns it more thoroughly and is the more rapid worker. This partly explains, also, that troublesome problem as to why a man's labor is usually considered to be worth more than a woman's. The practical education and worldly knowledge of the man is commonly greater than that of the woman, and hence his increased value. Nature made the common male laborer more valuable than the common female laborer by making him stronger; custom—and a bad one at that—has made woman in all other fields of labor less valuable by restricting her practical education. Besides, few women ever wholly learn a trade by serving as men do a long apprenticeship at it, for it usually happens that by the time a female apprentice is beginning to understand her trade, and to become of actual value to her employer, she marries and relapses into the barbarism which condemns her again to needle-work.

Every protection possible is thrown around the women employed in the large establishments. That care is an interest as well as a duty; and as the reputation of his employees naturally affects the reputation of his establishment, every employer is careful to engage only highly recommended young women. And the male employees are made to understand that they are to be respected. "We would discharge a clerk," said a member of a firm largely employing girls, "much sooner for insulting one of our girls than for dishonesty." The logic is sound; a petty rascal may have some virtue, but the man who deliberately insults a modest girl can have no honesty in him. And this feeling and sentiment appears to prevail generally among all classes of merchants and manufacturers. It results in bringing together girls of moral character and refinement, and establishing, during the hours of employment, a social intercourse at once pleasant and improving. In the work-shops these girls are demure, silent, and industrious. They may be seen morning and evening going to their work, neatly, and often handsomely, though never gaudily dressed, and with that peculiar elegance of style which seems to belong only to the independent, energetic, strong, and healthy working-women.

They are seldom ashamed of their work, but take an honest pride in their labor and its chief result—independence. A former publisher of our acquaintance in passing up Broadway a few days since was surprised to see a handsome, elegantly dressed lady who was about to step into her carriage, which stood before a dry-goods palace, suddenly turn and call him by name, and then heartily shake his hand, at the same time eagerly asking, "How do you do? How do you do?" He did not know her, and hardly knew what to make of her demonstration. She saw his dilemma, and exclaimed, "Don't you know me? I'm Anna—. I used to work in your bindery when I was young, years ago. Don't you remember? I married Mr.—, the banker;" and she named a Wall Street gentleman of opulence, who had seen, admired, and married the pretty and independent little binder, and who, like herself, was too independent to be foolishly ashamed of having the fact referred to. The same spirit animates most of the working-girls of this day; and it is not the least of the benefits arising from this revolution in woman's work that it develops in their minds an honest pride in their honest labor.

PARIS FASHIONS.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

PARIS is never at rest. In this city of pleasures every thing must take the form of pleasure. After the follies of the carnival come what may be called the amusements of Lent. People busy themselves with their salvation without on that account renouncing beautiful toilettes.

Charity is a good fairy that makes use of every means to attain her ends—sermons and theatres, balls and lotteries, begging and selling. It is under this last form that she does her work this week. The splendid salons of the Minister of Foreign Affairs have been transformed into a great bazar, wherein were opened numerous stalls, presided over by the lady patronesses of the hospital for poor Germans, which it is designed to found in Paris. The elite of elegant society for three days have thronged without ceasing around the zealous benefactresses of the poor Germans.

Among the vendors at the stalls were remarked the Princess Metternich, the Princess Ypsilanti, the Baroness Schickler, the Marchioness de Gallifet, the Countess de Pourtales, the Baroness de Rothschild, etc. The Princess Metternich sold stationery the first day, to which, on the last two days, she added bonnets, coiffures, and various stuffs. Her two pretty little girls, the elder of whom is about ten years old, ran about offering bouquets of violets to the spectators at ten sous each. Nothing prettier could be imagined than their dress—over a white muslin skirt, edged with a deep piped flounce, a short polonaise of sky-blue poplin, looped up here and there with blue silk cords, with loops and tassels. The polonaise was heart-shaped in front, and disclosed a high plastron of muslin and Valenciennes. Their luxuriant, flowing ringlets were confined by a blue ribbon, with hanging ends. A broad blue sash with long ends completed the toilette.

The Princess was very simply dressed in black gros grain, with a short skirt full at the sides en paniers, over which was a black lace paletot, with a single lapel in front, forming, as it were, a sort of tab on one side only of the skirt. Her head was bare, with the hair simply rolled in a net. The Princess played her part of saleswoman with zest, and pressed her rich China silks on the buyers with a grace which ought to have insured a ready sale.

The Marchioness de Gallifet (née Lafitte) presided over a stall filled with small fancy articles, porcelain figures, miniature bronzes, statuettes, drawings, albums, and the whole series of articles de Paris. Her blonde beauty was set off by her costume of sky-blue satin; short skirt, with pleated flounce, and plain waist, adorned with black embroidery. Over the skirt was a tunic of black velvet, trimmed with chinchilla. Her hair was exquisitely arranged in the Watteau style, curled in front. For the street this costume was completed by a short paletot of black velvet, trimmed with chinchilla, with a fanchon bonnet with mantilla-veil of black lace, and a rose at the side, and a broad blue sash, tied round the waist, with long ends reaching below the paletot, which had the peculiarity of being full at the sides, en paniers, like the tunic.

Madame de Pourtales wore a robe of black gros grain, full at the la Louis XVI., over a skirt of violet velvet; this skirt was trimmed with a broad bias fold of black gros grain, dotted with small bows of the same, edged with satin.

Madame Goetting, the beautiful wife of the Minister of Finance, wore a dress of iris gros grain; train skirt, with flounces; and chataleine waist; that is to say, with a basque, round in front and falling very low in the form of a spoon; and trimmed with iris satin rouleaux, forming brandenburgs from the top downward.

Her sister, Mademoiselle Elissen, was dressed in sky-blue gros grain; corsage à la bretonne, that is to say, cut out in front, with the opening rounding at the bottom, and edged with black velvet, embroidered with white pearls. The same trimming was set on the top and bottom of the sleeves. Plastron of point de Venise.

A great many weddings take place in the first half of Lent; and still more after Easter. We attended one yesterday. The bride, a young girl of ravishing beauty, was attired with exquisite simplicity; dress of white satin, with long train; plain corsage without trimming; very broad scarf-cinture, fringed in the stuff, and fastened behind by a fan-shaped bow. On the shoulders and at the bottom of the sleeves were satin coques, separated by small sprays of orange blossoms. The veil fell over the face and was put on over the wreath. Small sprays of orange flowers were twined among the puffs of the chignon. This was all; and it was in good taste. Ornaments have no place in bridal toilettes at Paris.

A word about suppers. It is the fashion now to give Lenten fare. The Princess Metternich, whose receptions are on Thursday evening, with supper after midnight, and consequently on Friday, serves up to her guests exquisite Lenten repasts. The difficulty of varying the dishes being very great admirable cooks are needed for these entertainments, which are considered by gourmets much more dainty than meat suppers. The fashionable potage is potage aux foies de lottes. Another very delicate dish which is much used in Lent is filets de soles au beurre d'écrevisses.

A custom has been introduced at the close of unceremonious dinners, where the guests are few in number, which gives rise to much merriment. At dessert huge papillottes of gilt paper are brought in and handed round. These papillottes contain each a cap of fine, colored tissue paper, and the guests are obliged to wear what falls to their share. All kinds of caps are found therein—policemen's, fools', and clowns' caps, cocked hats, toques, grenadiers' caps, shepherds' hats, and even bridal coiffures. Fancy a grave Senator crowned with a wreath of orange blossoms and long ribbons floating behind!

The amusements of Lent are varied by private theatricals. Comedies of the time of Louis XV. are especially successful, for the reason that they admit of powder. The present fashions so closely resemble those of the time of Louis XV. that the dress in which a lady acts a farce of that time can be worn in society the next evening. The following dress, for instance, invented by a talented modiste, Madame Elise, is so original that it seems a costume. It is of sky-blue poul de soie, glacé with white, with an immense train, trimmed round the bottom with a deep Marie Antoinette flounce, round which are set bows of blue taffetas, with a pink rose-bud in the centre. Over this train-skirt is a second skirt, greatly elevated by the panier, opening en tablier in front, and confined in the middle by a broad scarf-cincture of similar taffetas, with a bow behind and a trailing spray of roses. Low corsage, cut square, with a quilling of glacé silk, and edged all round with a narrow ruche of illusion. A tulie fichu may be worn for occasions not requiring such full dress. A second belt, with broad, short ends, encircles the waist, and a bouquet of roses is fastened at the left, in the ruche of the corsage. It is only necessary to add powder and patches to be a marchioness of the eighteenth century; while, by taking them away, you are in modern evening dress.

With these toilettes à paniers the whole cage is not worn, but only a hair-cloth skirt, puffed at the top. The bottom of the dress is supported by a muslin skirt with a deep flounce, several other flounces being set on behind. The dress is very short in front, so as to show the feet. The boots are of the same stuff as the dress, with mother-of-pearl buttons; or, if preferred, Pompadour slippers of glacé silk, with high heels, and a bow and rose-bud in front, like those of the dress. Silk stockings are worn, as a matter of course. Open-worked and clocked colored silk stockings are sold that harmonize well with the Louis XV. toilettes.

Boots are made of the same color, and often of the same material as the dress. Gray poplin boots, with gray mother-of-pearl buttons, will be much in favor this spring. They are sometimes tipped with undressed or reddish-brown kid, embroidered with white. Tassels are no longer worn on gaiters, but a small rosette is placed on the instep.

ELIANE DE MARSY.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE famous Norwegian violinist, Ole Bull, who, some twenty or thirty years ago, made a triumphant musical tour through the country, has again won the admiration of friends, old and new. The great charm of his playing is its wonderful pathos, touching all the emotional nature of his hearers. Ole Bull left the university of Christiana, where he was studying for the church, and began his career as an artist at the age of 19. To escape the consequences of a duel, in which his antagonist was mortally wounded, he fled to Paris. There he was robbed of every thing he had, even of his violin, and in his despair threw himself into the Seine. Being rescued, he attracted the notice of a rich lady who had recently lost her son, and who fancied that she traced in the young violinist's features a resemblance to her dead child. She took him home, provided for his wants, and enabled him to make a professional tour. His life has been one of various adventures.

"John Brown Smith"—whoever he may be—in lamenting upon the painful changes apparent in a demoralized community, in regard to the subject of Woman's Rights, expresses himself in the following touching language:

"My wife formerly was eminently feminine in her tastes, conduct, and employments. She was yielding, pliable, flexible, mobile, soft. She was like the unobtrusive violet which is all the sweeter for being trodden upon. How beautifully a kind Providence has adapted the nature of woman (unperverted) to the opposite nature of man! Woman loves to suffer—man to gratify her desire. Woman loves obedience—man authority; woman loves work—man to be worked for; woman to love and cherish—man to be loved and cherished. Mrs. Smith used to anticipate my slightest wish, and took my gratitude for granted. It gave me infinite pleasure to allow her to infer from my silence how much I appreciated her. I sometimes even received her favors in a somewhat surly manner, that she might enjoy in the most exquisite manner my implied thankfulness. She never contradicted me. At my suggestion she confined her reading to the cook-book and an entertaining work on domestic medical practice. She never formed opinions on any subject. I think I am correct in saying she avoided, prayerfully, all forms of intellectual exercise as unsuited to the female mind. But Mrs. Smith is changed. She has acquired a most unfeminine disposition to thought. Woman was not made for thought; she was made for feeling. Thought unsexes her. Thought is indelicate. It dissipates the exquisite bloom, the—the—the fine, indefinite something—the subtle, ineffable, impalpable essence of femininity. This bloom—this something—this essence—is not so perceptible in my wife's character as it used to be. In fact, Mrs. Smith is less a violet than she was of yore. No longer ago than yesterday she had the temerity to venture upon an argument with me about the practicability of sending our eldest girl to college!"

Poor Mr. Smith nearly ruptured a blood-vessel in his agitating argument! But he thinks he conquered at last!

The following Parisian story teaches certain conjugal lessons, as well as some of a general nature: The other day a Parisian and his wife went to Brussels. The first thought of the lady was naturally to visit all the shops, and especially those renowned for lace. She met with some marvelous bargains, gave a glowing account of them to her husband, and proposed to take a quantity of the lace home, smuggled under her dress. The husband, like a husband, resisted. It would be incurring too great a risk; he would not consent. The lady agreed that she would, like a good wife, go without the lace. And so the pair started for Paris, monsieur well pleased that he had avoided this new extravagance. At the frontier they were met as usual with the demand, "Any thing to declare?" They said, "No." It was enough, and they were allowed to pass. Now, here begins to show itself the folly of men. The lady gave her husband a look, and the husband began to foresee the bitter reproaches of his tender spouse. It was evident that she might have passed the lace without danger. She would certainly take vengeance in a good lecture. To avoid this horror it was necessary to convince the wife that there really was danger. So monsieur whispers to one of the Customs officers that he imagines the lady at his side has some lace hidden about her person. She was immediately taken aside, and in a few minutes the officer returned, his face beaming with satisfaction, to inform the gentleman, with a profusion of thanks, that his supposition was well founded. The lady had at least 10,000 francs' worth of lace hidden among the folds of her dress.

Now that a new bonnet "season" has arrived, it may not be uninteresting to glance at a life-picture which was exhibited not long ago in an entertaining volume. Some may have seen it, some not; but a good picture may be studied. We do not pretend to give it full-sized; but even reduced the prominent points may be recognized. She deliberately took off her own bonnet and commenced trying those that were on the saloon table. One after another she took them up and put them on her head until she had tried on thirty. She viewed herself in five mirrors, and in all the various lights she could command. One thing or another was the fault in every one of them. She asked the price of all, and cheapened them each to the lowest possible fraction. She then went to the side-table, and performed the same operation with fifteen or twenty more. None exactly suited. "Haven't you some put away in drawers?" she asked. When those were exhausted she pointed to the window, and asked for two handsome bonnets that were hanging there. The milliner, whose attention had been consumed for something like two hours, considering patience no longer a virtue, remarked: "If you really wish to buy a bonnet, I will get them; but I fear they will suit you no better than the others have done." And perceiving that her amusement was ended, the incorrigible shopper, with the most inimitable coolness and unconcern, replied: "I don't wish to buy a bonnet. I bought mine last week."

An earnest appeal has been made to the public, by Mr. J. E. H. Skinner, for relief to be sent to the Cretans who are wounded in the struggle now going on between them and their Turkish oppressors. Mr. Skinner has himself been in Crete during the war, and has had his sympathies stirred in view of the agony which many brave men endure on the battle-field for want of necessary care. It is proposed to send medical stores, and to organize an ambulance system, so that the wounded, who are now often left exposed to the burning rays of the sun and to the inhumanities of a barbarous foe, can readily be removed to places of safety.

Every newspaper is ready to take up the follies of "fashionable ladies," and berate them; but only occasionally is a similar course pursued in regard to other fashionables. A Detroit paper, however, is merciless, and treats the young gentlemen of New York with no more consideration than if they were ladies. It declares that they resemble the lilies in the field in that they toil not neither do they spin—that they have never known what it is to put forth a mental or physical exertion—and that they dawdle their hours away with every means to kill time except work or thought. The tie of a cravat is invested with such importance that sixteen different ways are on the record. The cut of a coat is a still more important study; and a few hours are spent every day lounging in the parlors of the tailors, and discussing style. The fashionable young man breakfasts at 11 o'clock, which is as early as his hours of rising will permit. He then spends a season of chatting at some fashionable tailor's where he meets a few associates. In the afternoon he promenades the Fifth Avenue or lounges over the newspaper at the club. After dinner he makes a few fashionable calls and discusses the opera or the last party, while at night he is found in some crowded saloon, assisting in the glories of a splendid reception. How unkind it is thus to attack a class who never "put forth a mental exertion," and of course are quite helpless! Charity should incline us to be lenient toward the weak and feeble! Young men should have their rights; they have just as good a right to do nothing, and be fashionable about it, as women have. There is no question about it. Only some people are so critical as to think it unmanly for the sterner sex to indulge in these so-called "follies" themselves, and then scold at ladies, and laugh about them for doing the same things! But that is a matter of opinion!

The following simple method of cleaning gold chains is said to be excellent: Put the chain into a small glass bottle, with warm water or eau de Cologne, a little camphorated chalk (or tooth-powder), and scrape in some soap. Cork the bottle, and shake it well. The friction against the glass polishes the gold, and the soap and chalk extract every particle of grease and dirt from the interstices of a chain of the most intricate pattern. On taking it out of the bottle rinse it in clear cold water, wipe it with a towel, and when all the damp has been allowed to evaporate the polish will be brilliant.

In a certain country town, not very far from London—so the story goes—a man has just sold his wife for one pound, and the bill of sale has been printed. More recently, a lady was won at cribbage, in steady-going London. The incident was dramatic. The lady wagered her eyes that she would win one of the games. She lost. Her opponent then suggested that, as he should not like to deprive her of her eyes, he would wager them against her altogether. The bet was made—the lady lost.

CORD AND CREESE; OR, THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XLIII.

THE STRANGER.

A FEW weeks after Langhetti's visit Potts had a new visitor at the bank. The stranger entered the bank parlor noiselessly, and stood quietly waiting for Potts to be disengaged. That worthy was making some entries in a small memorandum-book. Turning his head, he saw the newcomer. Potts looked surprised, and the stranger said, in a peculiar voice, somewhat gruff and hesitating,

"Mr. Potts?"

"Yes," said Potts, looking hard at his visitor. He was a man of singular aspect. His hair was long, parted in the middle, and straight. He wore dark colored spectacles. A thick, black beard ran under his chin. His linen was not over-clean, and he wore a long surcoat coat.

"I belong to the firm of Bigelow, Higginson, & Co., Solicitors, London—I am the Co."

"Well!"

"The business about which I have come is one of some importance. Are we secure from interruption?"

"Yes," said Potts, "as much as I care about being. I don't know anything in particular that I care about locking the doors for."

"Well, you know best," said the stranger. "The business upon which I have come concerns you somewhat, but your son principally."

Potts started, and looked with eager inquiry at the stranger.

"It is such a serious case," said the latter, "that my seniors thought, before taking any steps in the matter, it would be best to consult you privately."

"Well," returned Potts, with a frown, "what is this wonderful case?"

"Forgery," said the stranger.

Potts started to his feet with a ghastly face, and stood speechless for some time.

"Do you know who you're talking to?" said he, at last.

"John Potts, of Brandon Hall, I presume," said the stranger, coolly. "My business concerns him somewhat, but his son still more."

"What the devil do you mean?" growled Potts, in a savage tone.

"Forgery," said the stranger. "It is an English word, I believe. Forgery, in which your son was chief agent. Have I made myself understood?"

Potts looked at him again, and then slowly went to the door, locked it, and put the key in his pocket.

"That's right," said the stranger, quietly.

"You appear to take things easy," rejoined Potts, angrily; "but let me tell you, if you come to bully me you've got into the wrong shop."

"You appear somewhat heated. You must be calm, or else we can not get to business; and in that case I shall have to leave."

"I don't see how that would be any affliction," said Potts, with a sneer.

"That's because you don't understand my position, or the state of the present business. For if I leave it will be the signal for a number of interested parties to make a combined attack on you."

"An attack?"

"Yes."

"Who is there?" said Potts, defiantly.

"Giovanni Cavallo, for one; my seniors, Messrs. Bigelow & Higginson, and several others."

"Never heard of any of them before."

"Perhaps not. But if you write to Smithers & Co. they will tell you that Bigelow, Higginson, & Co. are their solicitors, and do their confidential business."

"Smithers & Co.?" said Potts, aghast.

"Yes. It would not be for your interest for Bigelow, Higginson, & Co. to show Smithers & Co. the proofs which they have against you, would it?"

Potts was silent. An expression of consternation came over his face. He plunged his hands deep in his pockets and bowed his head frowningly.

"It's all bosh," said he, at last, raising his head. "Let them show and be d—d. What have they got to show?"

"I will answer your question regularly," said the stranger, "in accordance with my instructions"—and, drawing a pocket-book from his pocket, he began to read from some memoranda written there.

"1st. The notes to which the name of Ralph Brandon is attached, 150 in number, amounting to £93,500."

"Pooh!" said Potts.

"These forgeries were known to several besides your son and yourself, and one of these men will testify against you. Others who know Brandon's signature swear that this lacks an important point of distinction common to all the Brandon signatures handed down from father to son. You were foolish to leave these notes afloat. They have all been bought up on a speculation by those who wished to make the Brandon property a little dearer."

"I don't think they'll make a fortune out of the speculation," said Potts, who was stifling with rage. "D—n them! who are they?"

"Well, there are several witnesses who are men of such character that if my seniors sent them to Smithers & Co. Smithers & Co. would believe that you were guilty. In a court of law you would have no better chance. One of these witnesses says he can prove that your true name is Briggs."

At this Potts bounded from his chair and stepped forward with a terrific oath.

"You see, your son's neck is in very considerable danger."

"Yours is in greater," said Potts, with menacing eyes.

"Not at all. Even supposing that you were absurd enough to offer violence to an humble subordinate like me, it would not interfere with the policy of Messrs. Bigelow, Higginson, & Co., who are determined to make money out of this transaction. So you see it's absurd to talk of violence."

The stranger took no further notice of Potts, but looked again at his memoranda; while the latter, whose face was now terrific from the furious passions which it exhibited, stood like a wild beast in a cage, "willing to wound, but yet afraid to strike."

"The next case," said the stranger, "is the Thornton forgery."

"Thornton!" exclaimed Potts with greater agitation.

"Yes," said the stranger. "In connection with the Despard murder there were two sets of forgeries; one being the Thornton correspondence, and the other your correspondence with the Bank of Good Hope."

"Heavens! what's all this?" cried Potts. "Where have you been unearthing this rubbish?"

"First," said the stranger, without noticing Potts's exclamation, "there are the letters to Thornton, Senior, twenty years ago, in which an attempt was made to obtain Colonel Despard's money for yourself. One Clark, an accomplice of yours, presented the letter. The forgery was at once detected. Clark might have escaped, but he made an effort at burglary, was caught, and condemned to transportation. He had been already out once before, and this time received a new brand in addition to the old ones."

Potts did not say a word, but sat stupefied.

"Thornton, Junior, is connected with us, and his testimony is valuable, as he was the one who detected the forgery. He also was the one who went to the Cape of Good Hope, where he had the pleasure of meeting with you. This brings me to the third case," continued the stranger.

"Letters were sent to the Cape of Good Hope, ordering money to be paid to John Potts. Thornton, Senior, fearing from the first attempt that a similar one would be made at the Cape, where the deceased had funds, sent his son there. Young Thornton reached the place just before you did, and would have arrested you, but the proof was not sufficient."

"Aha!" cried Potts, grasping at this—"not sufficient proof! I should think not." His voice was husky and his manner nervous.

"I said 'was not'—but Messrs. Bigelow, Higginson, & Co. have informed me that there are parties now in communication with them who can prove how, when, where, and by whom the forgeries were executed."

"It's a d—d infernal lie!" roared Potts, in a fresh burst of anger.

"I only repeat what they state. The man has already written out a statement in full, and is only waiting for my return to sign it before a magistrate. This will be a death-warrant for your son; for Messrs. Bigelow, Higginson, & Co. will have him arrested at once. You are aware that he has no chance of escape. The amount is too enormous, and the proof is too strong."

"Proof!" cried Potts, desperately; "who would believe any thing against a man like me, John Potts—a man of the county?"

"English law is no respecter of persons," said the stranger. "Rank goes for nothing. But if it did make class distinctions, the witnesses about these documents are of great influence. There is Thornton of Holby, and Colonel Henry Despard at the Cape of Good Hope, with whom Messrs. Bigelow, Higginson, & Co. have had correspondence. There are also others."

"It's all a lie!" exclaimed Potts, in a voice which was a little tremulous. "Who is this fool who has been making out papers?"

"His name is Philips; true name Lawton. He tells a very extraordinary story; very extraordinary indeed."

The stranger's peculiar voice was now intensified in its odd, harsh intonations. The effect on Potts was overwhelming. For a moment he was unable to speak.

"Philips!" he gasped, at length.

"Yes. You sent him on business to Smithers & Co. He has not yet returned. He does not intend to, for he was found out by Messrs. Bigelow, Higginson, & Co., and you know how timid he is. They have succeeded in extracting the truth from him. As I am in a hurry, and you, too, must be busy," continued the stranger, with unchanged accents, "I will now come to the point. These forged papers involve an amount to the extent of—Brandon forgeries, £93,500; Thornton papers, £5000; Bank of Good Hope, £4000; being in all £102,500. Messrs. Bigelow, Higginson, & Co. have instructed me to say that they will sell these papers to you at their face without charging interest. They will hand them over to you and you can destroy them, in which case, of course, the charge must be dropped."

"Philips!" cried Potts. "I'll have that devil's blood!"

"That would be murder," said the stranger, with a peculiar emphasis.

His tone stung Potts to the quick.

"You appear to take me for a born fool," he cried, striding up and down.

"Not at all. I am only an agent carrying out the instructions of others."

Potts suddenly stopped in his walk.

"Have you all those papers about you?" he hissed.

"All."

Potts looked all around. The door was locked. They were alone. The stranger easily read his thought.

"No use," said he, calmly. "Messrs. Bigelow, Higginson, & Co. would miss me if any thing happened. Besides, I may as well tell you that I am armed."

The stranger rose up and faced Potts, while from behind his dark spectacles, his eyes seemed to glow like fire. Potts retreated with a curse.

"Messrs. Bigelow, Higginson, & Co. instructed me to say that if I am not back with the money by to-morrow night, they will at once begin action, and have your son arrested. They will also inform Smithers & Co., to whom they say you are indebted for over £600,000. So that Smithers & Co. will at once come down upon you for payment."

"Do Smithers & Co. know any thing about this?" asked Potts, in a voice of intense anxiety.

"They do business with you the same as ever, do they not?"

"Yes."

"How do you suppose they can know it?"

"They would never believe it."

"They would believe any statement made by Messrs. Bigelow, Higginson, & Co. My seniors have been on your track for a long time, and have come into connection with various parties. One man who is an Italian they consider important. They authorize me to state to you that this man can also prove the forgeries."

"Who?" gasped Potts.

"His name is Cigole."

"Cigole!"

"Yes."

"D— him!"

"You may damn him, but that won't silence him," remarked the other, mildly.

"Well, what are you going to do?" growled Potts.

"Present you the offer of Messrs. Bigelow, Higginson, & Co.," said the other, with calm pertinacity. "Upon it depend your fortune and your son's life."

"How long are you going to wait?"

"Till evening. I leave to-night. Perhaps you would like to think this over. I'll give you till three o'clock. If you decide to accept, all well; if not, I go back."

The stranger rose, and Potts unlocked the door for him.

After he left Potts sat down, buried in his own reflections. In about an hour Clark came in.

"Well, Johnnie!" said he, "what's up? You look down—any trouble?"

At this Potts told Clark the story of the recent interview. Clark looked grave, and shook his head several times.

"Bad! bad! bad!" said he, slowly, when Potts had ended. "You're in a tight place, lad, and I don't see what you've got to do but to knock under."

A long silence followed.

"When did that chap say he would leave?"

"To-night."

Another silence.

"I suppose," said Clark, "we can find out how he goes?"

"I suppose so," returned Potts, gloomily.

"Somebody might go with him or follow him," said Clark, darkly.

Potts looked at him. The two exchanged glances of intelligence.

"You see, you pay your money, and get your papers back. It would be foolish to let this man get away with so much money. One hundred and two thousand five hundred isn't to be picked up every day. Let us pick it up this time, or try to. I can drop down to the inn this evening, and see the cut of the man. I don't like what he said about me. I call it backbiting."

"You take a proper view of the matter," said Potts. "He's dangerous. He'll be down on you next. What I don't like about him is his cold-bloodedness."

"It does come hard."

"Well, we'll arrange it that way, shall we?"

"Yes, you pay over, and get your documents, and I'll try my hand at getting the money back. I've done harder things than that in my time, and so have you—hey, lad!"

"I remember a few."

"I wonder if this man knows any of them."

"No," said Potts, confidently. "He would have said something."

"Don't be too sure. The fact is, I've been troubled ever since that girl came out so strong on us. What are you going to do with her?"

"Don't know," growled Potts. "Keep her still somehow."

"Give her to me."

"What'll you do with her?" asked Potts, in surprise.

"Take her as my wife," said Clark, with a grin. "I think I'll follow your example and set up housekeeping. The girl's plucky; and I'd like to take her down."

"We'll do it; and the sooner the better. You don't want a minister, do you?"

"Well, I think I'll have it done up ship-shape: marriage in high life; papers all full of it; lovely appearance of the bride—ha, ha, ha! I'll save you all further trouble about her—a husband is better than a father in such a case. If that Italian comes round it'll be his last round."

Some further conversation followed, in which Clark kept making perpetual references to his bride. The idea had taken hold of his mind completely.

At one o'clock Potts went to the inn, where he found the agent. He handed over the money in silence. The agent gave him the documents. Potts looked at them all carefully.

Then he departed.

CHAPTER XLIV. THE STRANGER'S STORY.

THAT evening a number of people were in the principal parlor of the Brandon Inn. It was a cool evening in October; and there was a fire near which the partner of Bigelow, Higginson, & Co. had seated himself.

Clark had come in at the first of the evening and had been there ever since, talking volubly and laughing boisterously. The others were more or less talkative, but none of them rivaled Clark. They were nearly all Brandon people; and in their treatment of Clark there was a certain restraint which the latter either did not wish or care to notice. As for the stranger he sat apart in silence without regarding any one in particular, and giving no indication whether he was listening to what was going on or was indifferent to it all. From time to time Clark threw glances in his direction, and once or twice he tried to draw some of the company out to make

"Oh, never mind the truth of it!" exclaimed Clark—"push along."

The stranger stepped up to the wall over the fire-place.

"Before I begin I wish to make a few marks, which I will explain in process of time. My story is connected with these."

He took his charcoal and made upon the wall the following marks:

He then turned, and stood for a moment in silence.

The effect upon Clark was appalling. His face turned livid, his arms clutched violently at the seat of his chair, his jaw fell, and his eyes were fixed on the marks as though fascinated by them.

The stranger appeared to take no notice of him.

"These marks," said he, "were, or rather are, upon the back of a friend of mine, about whom I am going to tell a little story:

"The first (↗) is the Queen's mark, put on back over a very rough country, and finally came to a river. Here they prepared to pass the night.

"On rising early on the following morning they saw something moving on the top of a hill on the opposite side of the river. On watching it narrowly they saw three men. They hurried on at once in pursuit. The fugitives kept well ahead, however, as was natural; and since they were running for life and freedom they made a better pace.

"But they were pretty well worn out. They had taken no provisions with them, and had not calculated on so close a pursuit. They kept ahead as best they could, and at last reached a narrow river that ran down between cliffs through a gully to the sea. The cliffs on each side were high and bold. But they had to cross it; so down on one side they went, and up the other.

"Clark and Stubbs got up first. Wilson was just reaching the top when the report of a gun was heard, and a bullet struck him in the arm. Groaning in his agony he rushed on trying to keep up with his companions.

"Fortunately for them night came on. They hurried on all night, scarcely knowing where they were going, Wilson in an agony trying to keep up with them. Toward morning they snatched a little rest under a rock near a brook and then hurried forward.

"For two days more they hastened on, keeping out of reach of their pursuers, yet still knowing that they were followed, or at least fearing it. They had gone over a wild country along the coast, and keeping a northward direction. At length, after four days of wandering, they came to a little creek by the sea-shore. There were three houses here belonging to fishermen. They rushed into the first hut and implored food and drink. The men were off to Sydney, but the kind-hearted women gave them what they had.

They were terrified at the aspect of these wretched men, whose natural ferocity had been heightened by hardship, famine, and suffering. Gaunt and grim as they were, they seemed more terrible than three wild beasts. The women knew that they were escaped convicts.

"There was a boat lying on the beach. To this the first thoughts of the fugitives were directed. They filled a cask of water and put it on board. They demanded some provisions from the fisherman's wife. The frightened woman gave them some fish and a few ship-biscuits. They were about to forage for themselves when Wilson, who had been watching, gave the alarm.

"Their pursuers were upon them. They had to run for it at once. They had barely time to rush to the boat and get out a little distance when the guard reached the beach. The latter fired a few shots after them, but the shots took no effect.

"The fugitives put out to sea in the open boat. They headed north, for they hoped to catch some Australian ship and be taken up. Their provisions were soon exhausted. Fortunately it was the rainy season, so that they had a plentiful supply of water, with which they managed to keep their cask filled; but that did not prevent them from suffering the agonies of famine. Clark and Stubbs soon began to look at Wilson with looks that made him quiver with terror. Naturally enough, gentlemen; you see they were starving. Wilson was the weakest of the three, and therefore was at their mercy. They tried, however, to catch fish. It was of no use. There seemed to be no fish in those seas, or else the bits of bread crumb which they put down were not an attractive bait.

"The two men began to look at Wilson with the eyes of fiends—eyes that flamed with foul desire, beaming from deep, hollow orbits which famine had made. The days passed. One morning Wilson lay dead."

The stranger paused for a moment, amidst an awful silence.

"The lives of these two were preserved a little longer," he added, in slow, measured tones.

"They sailed on. In a few days Clark and Stubbs began to look at one another. You will understand, gentlemen, that it was an awful thing for these men to cast at each other the same glances which they once cast on Wilson. Each one feared the other; each watched his chance, and each guarded against his companion.

"They could no longer row. The one sat in the bow, the other in the stern, glaring at one another. My friend Clark was a man of singular endurance. But why go into particulars? Enough; the boat drifted on, and at last only one was left.

"A ship was sailing from Australia, and the crew saw a boat drifting. A man was there. They stopped and picked him up. The boat was stained with blood. Tokens of what that blood was lay around. There were other things in the boat which chilled the blood of the sailors. They took Clark on board. He was mad at first, and raved in his delirium. They heard him tell of what he had done. During that voyage no one spoke to him. They touched at Cape Town, and put him ashore.

"My friend is yet alive and well. How do you like my story?"

The stranger sat down. A deep stillness followed, which was suddenly broken by something, half groan and half curse. It was Clark.

He lifted himself heavily from his chair, his face livid and his eyes bloodshot, and staggered out of the room.

"HE TOOK HIS CHARCOAL AND MADE UPON THE WALL THE FOLLOWING MARKS."

remarks about him; but the company seemed reluctant to touch upon the subject, and merely listened with patience.

Clark had evidently a desire in his mind to be very entertaining and lively. With this intent he told a number of stories, most of which were intermingled with allusions to the company present, together with the stranger. At last he gazed at the latter in silence for some little time, and then turned to the company.

"There's one among us that hasn't opened his mouth this evening. I call it unsociable. I move that the party proceed to open it forthwith. Who seconds the motion? Don't all speak at once."

The company looked at one another, but no one made any reply.

"What! no one speaks! All right; silence gives consent;" and with these words Clark advanced toward the stranger. The latter said nothing, but sat in a careless attitude.

"Friend!" said Clark, standing before the stranger, "we're all friends here—we wish to be sociable—we think you are too silent—will you be kind enough to open your mouth? If you won't tell a story, perhaps you will be good enough to sing us a song?"

The stranger sat upright.

"Well," said he, in the same peculiar harsh voice and slow tone with which he had spoken to Potts, "the request is a fair one, and I shall be happy to open my mouth. I regret to state that having no voice I shall be unable to give you a song, but I'll be glad to tell a story, if the company will listen."

"The company will feel honored," said Clark, in a mocking tone as he resumed his seat.

The stranger arose, and, going to the fire-place, picked up a piece of charcoal.

Clark sat in the midst of the circle, looking at him with a sneering smile.

"It's rather an odd story," said the stranger, "and I only heard it the other day; perhaps you won't believe it, but it's true."

certain prisoners out in Botany Bay, who are totally insubordinate.

"The second (R) signifies 'run away,' and is put on those who have attempted to escape.

"The third (+) indicates a murderous assault on the guards. When they don't hang the culprit they put this on, and those who are branded in this way have nothing but hard work, in chains, for life.

"These marks are on the back of a friend of mine, whose name I need not mention, but for convenience sake I will call him Clark."

Clark didn't even resent this, but sat mute, with a face of awful expectation.

"My friend Clark had led a life of strange vicissitudes," said the stranger, "having slipped through the meshes of the law very successfully a great number of times, but finally he was caught, and sent to Botany Bay. He served his time out, and left; but, finally, after a series of very extraordinary adventures in India, and some odd events in the Indian Ocean, he came to England. Bad luck followed him, however. He made an attempt at burglary, and was caught, convicted, and sent back again to his old station at Botany Bay.

"Of course he felt a strong reluctance to stay in such a place, and therefore began to plan an escape. He made one attempt, which was unsuccessful. He then laid a plot with two other notorious offenders. Each of these three had been branded with those letters which I have marked. One of these was named Stubbs, and another Wilson, the third was this Clark. No one knew how they met to make their arrangements, for the prison regulations are very strict; but they did meet, and managed to confer together. They contrived to get rid of the chains that were fastened around their ankles, and one stormy night they started off and made a run for it.

"The next day the guards were out in pursuit with dogs. They went all day long on their

FIRST FAVORITE.

FRESH as the early
Morn, rosy and pearly,
Swept by the breezes and bright with the dew,
Comes the delight of all,
Cheering the sight of all,
Glad from the slumbers that beauty renew.

Glossy hat, lightly
Set over the sprightly
Features that glow with the magic of youth!
Habit revealing
Grace 'e'en in concealing—
Robe a Diana befitting, in truth!

What shall we say of her?
Oh, the sweet way of her
Now that she crosses the lawn and—absurd!
Goes with face beaming,
And pearly teeth gleaming,
Only to notice and fondle a bird!

Birds may in plenty
Be had: there are twenty
Screaming away at this hour at the Zoo.
Harlequin screechers,
Mottled creatures,
Red, white, or green, dashed with orange or blue.

Birds! If together
—Came those of each feather,
Flights such as Audubon's eyes never saw:
Where in a mile is there
One worth her smile? Is there
Any deserving a word for a caw?

Yet as First Favorite
Poll still will crave a right,
And from his perch, as if that were his throne,
Glance with round berry-eye
Up at a merry eye
Ten times as bright and as brown as his own.

Privileged bird, to
Be mortals preferred to,
Clasping her finger and winning her heart;
Yet, by that rosy
Hand fondled, what knows he
Concerning the rapture a touch may impart?

Though with that beak of his Giving a tweak of his
At the white finger, pretending to tease:
Rapture he knows not,
At least we suppose not—
A morsel of sugar would equally please!

You may be clever,
But, Poll, you will never
Guess half her beauties who makes you her pride;
Guess at our emulous
Hearts, or the tremulous
Glances we raise as she stands by your side.

Face never fairer,
Form never rarer,
Equal delight and despair of us all!
Bright as Euphrosyne,
Even Mnemosyne
Could not a darling so precious recall!

Making her slaves of us,
What that she craves of us,
What that she bids, is there one could refuse?
Glove to the lions shown,
Cup to the whirlpool thrown—
Would some such test of our loves she would use.

But though caress'd of all,
Lauded and bless'd of all,
She to no breast will her secret impart:
Not one's prefer'd by her,
Though—as her bird by her—
She as First Favorite's held in each heart.

MADELINE'S PROMISE.

"I SHALL have a thousand thoughts about you in your absence, my child," said a fond mother to her only daughter, a bright but delicate-looking girl of some ten years old.

"You will have no young companions at Burford, your walks will be taken alone, and I do so fear you may lose your way in the country that, indeed, I must claim your promise not to go beyond any point from which the chimneys of your aunt's house can easily be seen. It stands in a lovely valley; you may ramble about the hills around it till you are tired without losing sight of the landmark. I must depend upon your keeping the tall chimney in view, and then I trust you will be safe."

Madeline promised instantly. She was too ready to promise, willingly obedient to her mother's slightest wish. Her promise and its performance were usually an easy and agreeable task; and so, without a second thought, her promise was unqualified.

"That I can easily do, dearest mamma," she said, with a loving kiss. "Why, aunt's garden is higher than the chimneys themselves; she told me so, and that I could see her house for miles away."

"Yes; but not without losing sight of it as you descended one hill or climbed another. I can not permit you to wander away, like the rough little ponies you will meet on the furzy common; you must be contented to ramble on the green slopes which surround the house, from which you can be seen at any time."

"Yes; I quite promise; you can depend upon my word, mamma;" and the blush of conscious pride tinted the pale cheek of Madeline.

"It is my happiness to know that I can trust you, darling; you won't go near that deep well; and you will be very careful not to overhear yourself; and—and—that is all. Here is the carriage. Good-by—good-by—my own love—for a fortnight!"

Long had her anticipated visit to Burford been a day-dream to Madeline; she loved the country; her sympathy was with nature, from the stateliest oak of the forest to the tiniest insect which cradled in the primrose in its shade; she had in imagination taken many a walk, and peopled it with adventures of her own fancy—seldom of higher emprise than the flight of a butterfly or the song of a bird.

She could not help a little creeping awe of Aunt Thorndale, as by courtesy she was called (although in truth her relation to Mrs. Merton was a distant one), for rumors of this lady's eccentricities had reached her, and, if it must be confessed, did cloud the sunshine of her thoughts a little.

With one maid-servant and a rheumatic gardener as her household establishment, Mrs. Thorndale led an isolated life in her charming valley home.

Some neighboring grounds joined her own luxuriant shrubberies, but houses were far distant, and one might have imagined that for a lady in the decline of life the place was dull and lonely.

Her peculiarities, however, were well known to the scattered inhabitants of the neighboring village; and the watchman's rattle, crossed by a fowling-piece, in her bedroom window, to say nothing of a large pistol, fired by her own hand at nightfall, was duly respected by them all.

She had been a lovely woman—for many years a widow. At the age of seventy she bore traces of a stately beauty; and as she stood beneath the clustering roses of her own portico to welcome Madeline, the little girl forgot her fears in the kind embrace she received.

Aunt Thorndale was fond of children: her nature had its sunny side, and the gay laugh of young people met with a quick response of ready sympathy; but for an imperious temper, when she was really put out (and this, I will confess, was by no means seldom), Aunt Thorndale was a delightful companion.

The setting sun was lighting the pretty drawing-room to which she conducted her guest, but somehow Madeline looked shyly up. Aunt Thorndale was so tall; her black silk dress fell in such ample proportions, there was something so decided in the clasp of the large hand, in which Madeline's trembling fingers were well-nigh lost, that she scarcely admired the sunbeams glancing in prismatic light upon the cut-glass lustres on the mantle-piece, shining on the quaint old china, and through the rushing steam of an urn which bubbled and spluttered an assurance that Aunt Thorndale liked her tea made with boiling water, and had it too. Perfume pervaded the whole house, whether from the vases of fresh flowers, or from that delicious scent of country air, so new to the town-imprisoned Madeline, she could not determine. Her hat carefully laid aside, and her boxes deposited in her sleeping-room, she tripped lightly down stairs to enjoy the cool-looking bread-and-butter, which, somehow or other, was always better at Burford than any where else. To-day a dish of ham, half shrouded in curling parsley, was provided for the visitor, and freshly-gathered currants made the selection of viands uncommonly difficult. Reassured by the kindly smile, our little girl was refreshed and happy, answered all questions about home with a demure propriety, and even ventured a remark or two upon the places passed on her journey.

"There will be just time for you to look at Don," said her aunt; "you must go to bed early here; but come with me, and you shall pat him." She led the way to the back of the house, where, seated on a large kennel, they found a magnificent yard dog, his deep bark changing to an imploring whine at the approach of his mistress.

"Go up to him; pat him, Madeline; he will not hurt you."

And Madeline advanced to lay her hand on the broad head held down in patronizing mood for her caress; but though he endured it at the command of his mistress, his look said plainly as look could speak, Why is that troublesome child come here, I wonder?

Never had Madeline's sleep been sweeter, and with a puzzled start she awoke to wonder where she could possibly be. The dazzling whiteness of the dimity around her, the perfumed breath of morning stealing in over the rich honey-suckles, which peeped upon the little citizen from the open casement, and that sweet song!

She listened, as a rich, melodious voice sang snatches of old ballads below her window, and, as the sweet notes melted in the breeze, heard her aunt talking to her favorite thrush.

"How do you like that, Tutti? pretty boy, pretty boy, now it's your turn; sing, Tutti, sing, and Tutti sang his loudest.

"Are you going to get up, Madeline?" she called. "Come, come, come; these town-hours will never do for me; it's seven o'clock, and I want my breakfast; I have been up since four gathering the roses before the dew is off; come, come, my dear; this is too glorious a morning to spend in bed!"

Madeline sprang to the window, pushed her young face between the towering woodbine, and beheld Mrs. Thorndale in a large, flowered dressing-gown, and a bonnet, of which the present Paris fashion is happily unconscious, perched upon the top of her head, its broad front shading her worn but handsome features.

"There you are," said she, nodding cheerfully; "that's right: dress yourself as quickly as may be; but mind every thing is neat—hair neatly brushed, teeth very clean—I am very particular about the teeth: leave your room in exact order. I shall come up presently to see; Nancy is going to dress me now, we shall meet in half an hour," and shaking a bunch of roses at Madeline, from which the cherished dew fell in a sparkling shower, her aunt went indoors.

It was with difficulty the little girl could obey her aunt's behest.

"The valley lay smiling before her," with its little tufts of verdure, its few trees, perfect woods to Madeline, while smooth grassy hills on every side were shadowed here and there by the light summer-clouds above them. It seemed like "fairy land;" but Madeline was habitually obedient, and with one good smell at the honey-suckle (which without permission she dared not gather) she proceeded with her toilette, and met Mrs. Thorndale at breakfast in a neatness of array which passed even her careful scrutiny.

"Now, my child, you may wander where you will; I am glad your mother sent your hat, 'tis better than a parasol; here is a basket with a piece of cake to eat when you are hungry. You don't want it? Ay! but you will when you have been in the pure air for an hour! Now which way will you go? not out of my sight till you are used to the place; I shall be about the garden, and can see you a quarter of a mile away."

"I should like to go up the hill, please, aunt," said Madeline. "Oh, it will be lovely! May Don go too?" she said, as she passed the kennel.

Don's imploring look, and the uncertain swing of his heavy tail, told that he understood and appreciated her request.

"Well! I don't mind for once, but stand aside while I unloose him, or he will knock you down."

His buoyant bound as the collar fell from his neck proved he had no intention of being her companion, but recalled by the stern voice of his mistress he did follow Madeline till they passed the gate, when he rushed away to find a neighbor at the great house to the proprietor of which the adjacent grounds belonged. Madeline never heeded him, every hill-side flower attracted her busy fingers, and looking down she could see the tall chimney, and hear her aunt's sweet voice as she sang to her birds.

On she wandered till the hill-top was reached, and a glorious wood, which covered its summit, looked tempting enough for the fairies to dwell in. A deep, dark avenue was before her, where the water-course, plover by some recent storm, had made a furrowed channel, and she could just see the bright green leaves of the wood-sorrel peeping among the brush-wood, but the avenue was the diminishing point of the chimney, and she turned away, thinking that Aunt Thorndale's idea of putting the cake in her basket was by no means a bad one.

She was tracing her way along the valley, when

"I SHOULD SO VERY MUCH LIKE TO TAKE THAT NOTE, ONLY I PROMISED MAMMA NEVER TO LOSE SIGHT OF THE CHIMNEYS."

Don came rushing past, and the short, chipping bark of his companion was heard on the other side of a little knoll of trees. They had put up a rabbit, which scudded by and darted into a hole by her side. This was an adventure beyond her calculations, and served to tell of when she reached the house, in the best possible humor with herself and all the world, especially the country.

"Now rest yourself, Madeline, while I get my nap; there is a book or two on the piano, and you may play if you like; I love music; I could sing up to double C myself when I was young; you will not disturb me, dear, play away!" And Aunt Thorndale settled herself upon the yielding sofa, threw a handkerchief over her head, and slept.

Madeline touched the notes lightly, for, spite of the assurance, she feared the music might disturb the sleeper; besides, she rather feared her want of skill, and felt timid at performing before a lady who could sing to double C, that being a note which had not entered into her experience in composition.

She did not know that Mrs. Thorndale was no practical musician; her wood-notes wild had been exquisite as the song of the nightingale, but they were the gift of the same gracious Power which tuned the throats of the warblers, and had never been subjected to rules.

"Take your work to the moss-house, dear, it's dull for a little girl to be sitting here with a sleepy old woman," murmured Aunt Thorndale, from beneath the handkerchief, and, glad of the permission, Madeline climbed the steep paths of the garden, and reached a summer-house, the sides and roof of which were lined with moss. Here she watched the wren come peeping in, and sit into her nest; looked at the distant landscape, and quite forgot to hem the handkerchief which lay idle in her lap.

Thus happily amused the hours sped away, and sleep fell like a summer-cloud around her, to be dispelled by the bright beams of another morning, not destined to be quite so agreeable.

When breakfast was finished Mrs. Thorndale put a note into Madeline's hand.

"I want you to take this, my dear, to Miss Smithers," she said.

"Yes, aunt. It is not out of sight of the house, is it?"

"To be sure it is; but I can direct you. You need not be frightened, Madeline; there are houses where you are going; the road is not a dull one; I wish to invite my friend to tea tomorrow—she plays delightfully, and you will enjoy it."

"Thank you, dear aunt. I should so very much like to take that note, only I promised mamma never to lose sight of the chimneys."

"Lose sight of a fiddlestick! You are with me now, and must do as I tell you! Your mother should not have made you promise; she intrusts you to my care, and should leave you to my direction. Don't tell me about such nonsense! Chimneys, indeed! If you wanted to see a May-day sweep I could understand it."

"Yes, aunt, only I promised mamma," repeated Madeline, with a pale face.

"I'm sick of hearing of promise, promise, promise for everlasting! You must do as I like, little lady! and as I choose you shall do," said aunt, with a raised voice, and a decided manner.

"If Nancy could only go with me," sighed Madeline, in despair. "I would help her when we come back. Oh! if Nancy could only come with me," she repeated, as the good-natured country-girl, who was clearing the breakfast-table, looked up compassionately.

"Nancy will do no such thing! she has her work to do. I will not be governed by a child! Go and put on your hat directly!" said Mrs. Thorndale, with an emphatic stroke upon the table.

"I don't believe you need lose sight of the kitchen chimney, Miss Madlin," said Nancy, confidentially, as she hastened to overtake Madeline, who was ascending the stairs with a heavy heart. "If you go along by the road, I do believe you can see it all the way to Mrs. Smithers."

"Oh! tell me the way, dear Nancy! I don't care where I go without breaking my promise," and her smiling face, as she returned to receive the letter, quite propitiated her aunt, who valued obedience to her own particular wishes exceedingly.

"That's a good girl!—never let me have a fuss again! Now, take the note across the foot of the hill. Come here to the door—don't brush the roses! Now, look! You go across the hill, past the old yew-tree with a seat round it, take the path into the road, go over the bridge, and the second house on the right-hand side you come to will be Miss Smithers'; ring the gate-bell, give her my note, with my love—Mrs. Thorndale's love—and wait for an answer. Do you understand, my dear?"

"Yes, quite, aunt. Shall I be able to see—?" She stopped, determined to accept Nancy's assurance rather than touch upon the forbidden subject. She started on her journey, carefully avoiding the well, where poor old "Jerry," the gardener, was winding up the bucket, with "three groans for the rheumatism."

Joyfully she tripped past the old yew-tree, gained the path, crossed the bridge, the chimneys still in view; but it was long before the first house on the right-hand side was gained, and a second was not to be seen.

She pushed rapidly on, then turned to look for the promised landmark. It was gone! The turn in the road she had of necessity taken had hidden it from sight.

What should she do in this divided duty? She could just see the end of her pilgrimage in the shape of a pretty white cottage now opening to the view. She had broken her promise—she should offend her aunt, perhaps be sent back again, if she failed in her errand now. It was a sad dilemma, and the poor child was very miserable. At last she darted off to the cottage, and rang nervously at the gate. The sound of the bell brought out a little yapping terrier, and the rather shrill voice of a lady at the flower-clad window desired her to put her finger through the hole and raise the latch.

The white gate yielded to her touch; and in an instant a sharp bite on the heel from the terrier aforesaid finished the struggle for propriety, and poor Madeline, as she delivered the note, burst into a flood of tears.

"What is the matter, my dear?" asked Miss Smithers, in a flutter.

"The—the—dog—has bitten me!" sobbed Madeline.

"Oh, dear, no! I am sure Pincher would never bite; you are only frightened. Pincher, little darling! you would not bite any body, would you? No, indeed," she continued, as she patted her favorite, and then proceeded to offer some wine and cake to comfort her visitor, while she replied to the letter which had given its gentle bearer so much trouble. "Are you rested now, love?" she said, kindly. "We will shut up this dear naughty Pincher, and we will look at the flowers."

She took infinite pains to show each treasured blossom, but, much as she loved to look upon them, Madeline would have given them all for one faint curl of smoke from that chimney she so longed to see.

"Good-morning, dear; you will have a nice walk home; good-by," and with many a "wreathed smile" Miss Smithers re-entered the cottage, and Madeline's light footsteps traced the road in a rapid run.

Now the smoke, telling of preparations for dinner, rose straight into the blue sky, the chimneys rose higher at every advancing step, the roof, the bedroom windows, and, as she reached the yew-tree, the whole front of the house, glowing in the morning sunshine, was before her.

Madeline threw herself, panting with fatigue, upon the seat under its shade; she had over-heated herself, broken another promise!

"Oh, how I wish dear mamma had not made me promise! but she did not think, I am sure, how very difficult it would be to keep it, and I ought to have said, I will do it, mamma, if I possibly can; I do wish I was at home! Mamma never asks me to do impossibilities," thought Madeline.

She was graciously received by Mrs. Thorndale, whose anger had passed away with the occasion, and the amusement of the day progressed as usual, but it was less bright to Madeline: she was dissatisfied with herself, fearful that the trial might be repeated; anxiety was throwing a veil over her pleasure.

A week passed on, without one request which interfered with her goings out or comings in, and Madeline had well-nigh ceased to fear a repetition of her trouble, when, one morning, Aunt Thorndale said, and in a tone which admitted of no refusal,

"Madeline, I want you to go to Mr. Waldens to order some butter; Nancy is helping the woman to wash, and can not be spared; you must go for me directly."

"Oh yes! dear aunt."

"Oh yes! dear aunt," repeated Mrs. Thorndale, mimicking the quick reply. "It will be 'Oh no!' dear aunt, I suppose, when I tell you that your old friend the kitchen chimney will not be visible; your walk to-day is in a different direction, so you must make up your mind to forget that nonsense."

"I can not forget my promise to mamma," said Madeline, firmly. "Indeed, dear aunt, I would do any thing else you ask me, but that would not be right."

"If I think it right, that is enough; if you stand there arguing for an hour, you shall do as I choose at last; go instantly."

The child stood her ground, however, for a second appeal, but with no better result, and with a push on the shoulder was sent from the room to prepare for the dreaded walk.

She reached her bedroom slowly, put on her hat, the sad face made dimly visible in the little looking-glass, through her fast-falling tears; must she break her promise, never be trusted again? It was not to be thought of, and to brave the displeasure of her aunt seemed needless audacity; there was no doubt of Mrs. Thorndale's determination or of her power to enforce it.

A gleam of joy flitted across her face. God would help her; He had promised to hear little children, and if she was careful to keep her word, how much more would He remember His!

In simple faith she sank upon her knees by the snowy counterpane, and with the eloquence of heart-felt entreaty poured forth an earnest prayer for guidance and support.

"Are you coming, Madeline?" cried Aunt Thorndale; "I'm waiting for you in the kitchen. Make a little haste—I can't wait all day!"

The little girl rose from her knees—a feeling that she was safe now, a certainty of help was over her, and in answer to the call she made her appearance at the kitchen-door.

Radiant with smiles her aunt advanced to meet her.

"Come to me, my sweet child! you are a dear good girl to keep your word; come and kiss me! you shall not go by yourself, for Mr. Butler—here is a gentleman just called in from his walk, he is going the same road, and he is so pleased that you will not disobey your mother that he will let you walk beside him; what do you think of that?"

"It is very kind," said Madeline; "but is he coming back again?"

"I will come back till we see the chimney, my dear," he said, with a smile; "so take your basket, give me your hand, and we will trudge off together."

Whether Mr. Butler's arguments in her favor had influenced her aunt Madeline never knew, but from that hour she was not required to go beyond the allotted precincts; but when the fortnight was ended, and once more by the side of that dear mother who ever shared her children's joy or sorrow, she related every happy incident of her visit, and then, in dark contrast, told of her sad difficulty and trouble, they both believed it was safer never to exact or give a promise without due consideration of the trials it might bring.

JAMES'S BANKRUPT LAW.

THE BANKRUPT LAW OF THE UNITED STATES. 1867. With Notes and a Collection of American and English Decisions upon the Principles and Practice of the Law of Bankruptcy. Adapted to the Use of the Lawyer and Merchant. By EDWIN JAMES, of the New York Bar, and one of the Framers of the recent English Bankruptcy Amendment Act. With copious Indexes, and an Appendix containing the General Orders and Forms promulgated by the United States Supreme Court. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $4 00; Sheep, $5 00.

The above is a new edition, containing the GENERAL ORDERS, together with the FORMS OF PROCEEDINGS IN BANKRUPTCY, AS PROMULGATED BY THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT, with a copious Analytical Index.

This important work was prepared by Mr. James during the time the legislation in Congress on the subject was proceeding, the main provisions of the law having been carefully supervised by him. The novelty of the practice left American lawyers without experience in bankruptcy cases, and Mr. James has therefore endeavored to supply the practitioner with a treatise on the subject upon which he may confidently rely. His experience as one of the Commissioners for the amendment of the English Bankruptcy Law, and as an extensive London practitioner in Bankruptcy cases, has peculiarly fitted him for the task. The author has also endeavored, by the adoption of a clear and untechnical style, to render the work a guide to the merchant and the layman.

KRUMMACHER'S DAVID, KING OF ISRAEL.

David, the King of Israel: a Portrait drawn from Bible History and the Book of Psalms. By FREDERICK WILLIAM KRUMMACHER, D.D., Author of "Elijah the Tishbite," &c. Translated under the express Sanction of the Author by the Rev. M. G. EASTON, M.A. With a Letter from Dr. Krummacher to his American Readers, and a Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

In such a field Dr. Krummacher's well-known powers of description, his chaste fancy, his well-balanced judgment, and enlightened piety were sure to find full scope; nor have our anticipations been disappointed. In these pages David passes before us in the various phases of his character as shepherd, psalmist, warrior, and monarch. There is no attempt at originality of view, no prosy solution of difficulties, no controversial sparring; the narrative flows on like a well-told story, and the art of the writer lies in the apt selection of salient points, and in the naturalness of his reflections.—British and Foreign Evangelical Review.

A lifelike picture of the prophet-king and his times.—Evangelical Christendom.

We would recommend this volume to the clergy as a storehouse of hints for pulpit use, and also as a valuable addition to our devotional literature.—Clerical Journal.

A very happy specimen of the style for which Dr. Krummacher is best known—at once vivid, imaginative, and experimental; and it exhibits more of the intellectual and robust than his earlier work.—Fremman.

A lifelike portrait of one who has ever been an object of deep interest to Christians.—Glasgow Herald. The story of the shepherd-king it tells in a way that combines both the pleasant and the profitable. Mr. Easton has succeeded in rendering his author into such transparent language as leads one to think of Krummacher rather than the translator, and this is just as it ought to be.—Reformed Pres. Magazine.

Ground Coffee, 20 cents, 25 cents, 30 cents, 35 cents; best, 40 cents per pound.
Hotels, saloons, boarding-house keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our

French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.
Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.
Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

Bogus or Imitations.
We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.
Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
Have just Published:

THE MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW: Preceded by a History of the Religious Wars in the Reign of Charles IX. By HENRY WHITE, M.A. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $1 75. Uniform with Smiles's History of the Huguenots.

The whole story has never, to our knowledge, been so clearly and satisfactorily related before, and no where else can an inquirer after the truth respecting this event more readily find what he is in search of than in this masterly exposition of the never-to-be-forgotten Massacre of St. Bartholomew.—Athenaeum.

Dr. White has told the story of the terrible St. Bartholomew's Day not only with great spirit, but with such unbroken impartiality and picturesque skill as to give a charm to all he says. His History of the Religious Wars in the Reign of Charles IX. are not mere dull chronicles of war, rapine, persecution, and bloodshed, but more or less graphic sketches of the great and troubled empire of France at that wild and stormy period.—Standard.

His arguments are every where conclusive, ably supported by the results of deep researches into the contemporary histories of the times of which he treats. His language is always forcible, and frequently rises to eloquence. His account of the state of France in the middle of the sixteenth century is admirable and exhaustive. The same praise may be allowed to his descriptions of the characters of the chief personages of the bloody drama which he recounts. We heartily commend the book for the tolerant spirit in which it is written.—London Review.

The author has taken much pains in collecting materials for this work. The story of the plot and its accomplishment is told with skill, and may be read with something of the interest corresponding to the terrible events described.—Saturday Review.

He has thrown light on some obscure passages in the story, and has given us an accurate and graphic narrative.—Nonconformist.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

FACETIÆ.

PEOPLE sometimes undertake to go ahead, and find they can't go a single foot.

THINGS I DON'T LIKE.
By A YOUNG LADY.

I don't like, if a girl sets her eyes upon a young gentleman for a minute, that he should imagine she has a crush on him for life.

I don't like to see two ladies conversing in an undertone in company, wearing a malicious look upon their faces, and directing their eyes frequently toward me.

I don't like those very young men whose thoughts are always centred on themselves, and whose fingers are always twirling their mustaches.

I don't like to be one of a wedding party where all the young ladies are expected to dump their lace handkerchiefs through sympathy with the weeping bride.

I don't like to see my beau flirting with another girl, and be obliged to look gay and unconcerned all the time, lest I be accused of jealousy.

I don't like those who will tell you they "are plain people who speak their minds," and make that a pretext for giving you all manner of impertinent home-blows.

I don't like, if a girl makes herself agreeable to a gentleman for half an hour, that he should go away and tell all his friends, in confidence, that she "is dying about him."

I don't like to be asked to play a little music for the gratification of the company and to find during the whole performance that every body prefers listening to the music of their own voices.

I don't like to see a pair of slippers that I worked at long and arduously to render beautiful, flourishing on the feet of another girl's husband whom I once expected to be my own.

I don't like, after conversing in an animated and sensible strain for five minutes, to hear at the end of it, "Pray excuse me, but what were you talking about?"

I don't like to be called "heartless" because I can not sigh over a withered rose-leaf, or weep over "An Elogy on a Dead Canary."

I don't like, on showing a charming new bonnet to a dear young lady friend, to be told by her, quite patronizingly, that it would do pretty well, only it is so frightfully unbecoming.

When was Desdemona like a ship in port?—When she was moored.

A letter passed through the postal car between Boston and New York a few days since with the following superscription, the name of the party addressed and post-office being in red ink, so that the destination of the letter could be seen at a glance:

This letter, David Henry White
Found it a pleasure to indite
To Mrs. MARY PALMER SANDS,
And hopes 'twill soon be in her hands.
In Raymond she resides, I ween,
In the fair County of Racine,
Which of Wisconsin forms a part,
As one may see by map or chart.
Part of her early maiden life,
Ere she became a happy wife,
In teaching common school she spent,
And was a teacher excellent.

If the waves threaten to engulf you, don't add by your tears to the amount of water.

Mr. Coble advertises his runaway apprentice, R. Strong, in the following style: "He can be identified by the fact that he has not combed his hair since New-Year's Day, and can not speak ten words at a time without uttering twenty falsehoods."

WHAT CHEER!—A young lady, whose acquaintance it is our good fortune to enjoy, is of so merry-hearted a disposition that she declines to play on any piano ornamented with "fret-work."

MISS FRUMP (Author of the "Ghost-haunted Grange," &c., &c., &c.). "Can your Little Boy read?"
MAMMA (modestly). "Not very well, as yet."
LITTLE BOY (proudly). "I can read better than you, Mamma."
MAMMA. "What do you mean, Child?"
LITTLE BOY. "Why, you said you couldn't read Miss Frump's new Book!"

[Awkward silence.]

How WE EAT.—There are five kinds of eaters: 1st. There is your dull man, who seems to eat merely from habit, mainly because his parents did so before him, and he expects his children will follow his example. 2d. Your impatient, fidgety being, who is all activity, and who falls to at once on the dish that happens to be before him. 3d. Your careless eater, without education, who considers so much time as lost that is passed at the table, puts all dishes on the same

4th. Next comes your ravenous animal, who thinks only of quantity, takes every thing that comes in his way, as if anxious to show the capacity of his stomach. 5th. Lastly, come the professors, men of taste, who cast a practiced eye over the table before they eat, use judgment in the choice of such dishes as suit their habits, and eat sparingly of each, that the palate may be gently excited by variety. These are the guests who are the best dinner-table talkers. And here we take the liberty of quoting a precept given by an ancient philosopher whose name we do not remember, neither is it of consequence, that the month is the vestibule of the soul, the gate of discourse, the portico of thought; of course nothing unclean (of course unpalatable) should go in or come out.

The mariner's compass has done some of the most important needle-work in the world.

A gentleman received his laundress's bill, made out in the style of spelling and handwriting peculiar to that class; but there was one item of 50 cents which defied even his practiced comprehension. It was for "skewering the stars." After wondering for some time how such a work could ever have been performed, and still more why it should have been executed particularly at his expense, the debtor sent for Mrs. Pearlsh, when the reading turned out to be for "scouring the stairs."

STREET CAR HINTS.

Gentlemen should stand as thick as possible on the rear platform, even if there is plenty of room inside. It leads strangers to think the cars are immensely patronized, and makes it so pleasant to ladies getting on board.

Don't put out your cigar, but get on the front platform with it and smoke furiously, particularly if the doors are open and a strong draft blowing through. A pipe, strong and old, is an improvement on the cigar.

Don't neglect to spit as often as possible on the matting. It looks independent. You "chaw," and don't care who knows it.

Crowd into a car that is full to overflowing, and then complain loudly of the railroad company for cramming their cars.

Look diligently out of the window when a woman enters with a baby in her arms. Some one will be weak enough to give her a seat. You needn't.

Find fault with the conductor if the track is obstructed by a stone or a wagon. Make him mad, and then threaten to report him if he talks back.

Talk politics in a loud voice; the ladies like it so much; and if any gentleman don't, it is because he differs with you, which is evidence enough that he is of no account.

Don't be backward in filling platforms and passageways with baskets, bundles, and boxes. That is what the platforms and passageways are made for. Besides, in doing it, you are dealing a blow at the expressmen, who are so grasping as to charge for hauling merchandise. The cars will do it for nothing.

In stepping off when the car is in motion, always do it with your face toward the rear of the car. It is such capital exercise for the legs.

Ladies desiring to take a street car should wait for one that is most crowded. It draws attention to them, and practices men in patience and deference to the sex.

If you are a lady, and in feeble health, don't fail to extend profoundest thanks to the hearty, strapping man who condescends to yield his seat to you. If you don't, he may cry about it for days after.

The rule is, that a car shall only stop on the further side of a crossing. Always expect it to stop on the wrong side, and find fault with the conductor because he don't break orders.

If a conductor observes your signal and stops his car for you, don't hurry any, even if you are a square or more away. The other passengers, whom you are delaying, will feel so pleasant toward you.

Never have the change ready instead of a dollar bill, and abuse the conductor because he hasn't. It teaches them their positions.

By carefully observing the above rules, street-car traveling will be rendered vastly more pleasant than at present.

It may be a fair question whether a man can be said to be wedded to celibacy.

RULES FOR THE PRESERVATION OF HEALTH.

Wash yourself now and then.

Change your inner garments occasionally.

Chew your meat; eschew greasy gravies.

Don't chew your tobacco.

Drink as little as you choose.

Don't eat much more than your stomach will hold.

Keep your temper.

Temper your keep.

Avoid falling out about trifles.

Fall out of windows as seldom as possible.

If your constitution requires you to sleep during the sermon, see that the sexton has an aired night-cap for you, and a hod of warm bricks to put to your feet.

Keep your mouth shut on dusty days.

Never open your mouth in frosty weather.

Close your mouth very tight when the wind blows from the east.

TATTING.

'Twas to a city suburb, where
In summer pleasant shade is,
I went from the paternal square
To visit maiden ladies.
I might have spent a charming week,
And yet I was prevented,
For one thing came to pale my cheek,
And make me discontented.

I am very fond of work, I own;
I don't repine at stitching;
A long hem never makes me groan,
And crochet is bewitching.
I've made poor children clothes to wear,
As tough as cocoa-matting;
But there's some work I can not bear—
That horrid work is tating!

Some people make the shuttle fly
With ease and no exertion;
Make yards of trimmings—always I
Abominate "insertion."
I don't know why I hate the work,
But, e'en in moderation,
All tating, as a rule, I shirk—
And here's the explanation:

In that suburban calm retreat,
Amid all nature's beauty,
One thing annoyed me, I repeat,
And that was tating duty.
At tating there we worked away,
From tating naught could sever
Those maiden ladies—night and day
They tatted on forever.

They tatted when the morning broke
In splendor through the sky-light,
I heard them tating when I woke,
They tatted in the twilight.
They tatted—it was much too bad—
In scorn of other matters;
I fled, or I should have gone mad
With those eternal tatters.

Spring and Summer Cloaks.

We give in this Number the patterns and minute descriptions of a score of spring and summer cloaks, thus affording ample variety to our readers, who are referred to our article on New York Fashions for full details concerning the materials which are most in vogue, and the prices thereof. As will be seen, these cloaks are somewhat longer than those worn last season; close-fitting styles are in favor, and scarcely any is complete without a fichu or a sash with bow and ends. Hand-made trimmings prevail, such as folds, pipings, quillings, loops, etc., chiefly made of the same material as the cloak, combined with satin. A great number of these will be found on page

405. Coat-sleeves are still mostly worn, though not so close as those of the winter; flowing sleeves, however, are frequently seen, as well as sleeveless paletots. In a word, the spring styles cover so wide a ground that no lady needs to go outside the fashion in order to find something becoming.

Foot-Stool with Crochet Cover.

MATERIALS: Black knitting wool, violet wool, black beads, black oil-cloth, gray linen, hair or moss.

The crochet cover of this cushion consists of eight single sections. The foundation is worked of black wool in a kind of Tunisian stitch, and is ornamented with crochet dentated stripes, rosettes, and leaves of violet wool. Fig. 69 gives the form of one of the eight sections of the foundation. Begin each part on the under side and crochet on a foundation of the requisite length, backward and forward, as follows:

1st round of the pattern row.—Make a loop out of every foundation stitch; throw the thread around after each loop.

2d (return) round of the pattern row.—Take off each loop together with the thread (made loop) immediately preceding it.

In the 1st round of the following pattern row make a loop in each loop of the last round. In this manner work each of the eight sections of the foundation, narrowing at the beginning and end of the rounds in the proportion shown by the pattern. Then trim the sloping sides of the single sections, according to the pattern, with a notched stripe, which is worked in violet wool as follows: * 5 ch. (chain stitch); then, passing over the last of these, 3 sc. (single crochet) in the following 3 stitches. Repeat from * until the notched stripe has reached the length of the sloping side; crochet back on this 1 sc. in the next ch. between 2 points, 4 ch., and passing over the last of these 3 sc. in the remaining ch. then 1 sc. in the same ch. between 2 points in which the former sc. was taken. Repeat from * to the end of the notched stripe. This finishes the stripe whereof the illustration shows a full-sized section. The leaf-like figure in the middle of each part of the foundation is worked as follows. Begin with the lower end of the stem, and crochet for that 4 ch.; then the first leaf of 2 ch., 7 p. (picots) each of 3 ch., and 1 sc. in the first of the 3 ch.; join the last p. to the first p. of the row with a sl. (slip stitch) by which the picot row is joined in a round; and on this crochet back, in each ch. in which a loop was taken in forming the picots; 1 sc.; then in the 2 ch. at the beginning of the leaf 2 sl. This finishes the leaf, which is shown of the full size in the illustration. Crochet 7 ch., then again a leaf, 7 ch., a leaf. Having finished this leaf, which forms the end of the branch, crochet 7 sl. in the next 7 ch. of the stem, then again a leaf, and again 7 sl. in the following 7 ch.; next the last leaf, after which slip stitches in the remaining ch. of the stem. One of these branches is sewed on each section of the foundation, as shown in the illustration; the middle of each leaf is finished by a few beads which imitate the middle veining. Now join from the back the sloping sides of the eight sections of the foundation, and ornament the outer edge with rosettes as shown in the pattern. For each of these rosettes work first a circular foundation, which must count 4 rounds of single crochet. On this foundation crochet, beginning at the centre, 4 rows of picots, as follows. Work first 1 sl. in the upper vein of the first stitch of the first round of the foundation; then 1 p., composed of 3 ch., then 1 sl. in the first of the 3 ch.; in the upper vein of the second following sc., 1 p.; 1 sl. in the upper vein of the second following stitch, etc. In the outer row of the rosette the sl. which comes between each 2 picots must be worked at once in both parallel flat veins of each stitch. The centre of each rosette is finished by a large black bead.

Having sewed the rosettes around the outer part of the cushion, border the edge with a crochet fringe, which is shown of the full size in the illustration. For this make first a foundation of a length corresponding to the circumference of the cover: * crochet 3 sl. in the next 3 foundation stitches, 2 ch.; 5 times alternately 1 p. (2 ch. 1 sl. in the first), 1 ch., then back on the picot row 2 sl. separated by a p. in every ch. lying between 2 p. of the preceding row; 2 sl. in the 2 ch. at the beginning of the double picot row. From * repeat.

The cover, being finished, is now put on a gray linen cushion of the requisite form and size, filled with hair or moss, and covered on the bottom with oil-cloth. Sew through the centre of the cushion with coarse twine, so that it shall be drawn into the shape shown in the illustration, and cover the stitches with a crochet rosette.

THE BEST THING SAID TO-NIGHT.

AROUND the fire, past midnight, when the girls were sleeping, let us hope their beauty-sleep, in nests of delicate fragrance, there remained just two or three to smoke that last cigar and taste the sweet of the night. Quoth one of us, Knocking the white ash indolently off, Lest it should fall upon his lounging-coat Like sudden snow upon a purple moor, "What was the best thing said to-night?" A flow of talk succeeded: one man's epigram, Another's pretty speech to ISABELL, The wild young poet's lyric oratory Half-way 'twixt the Agora and Colney Hatch, The impromptu in the style of Virian Grey About DISRAELI—these and fifty more The men discussed until discussion yawned And the last seltzer quenched the last cigar, And every body went to bed. But I, I knew full well the best thing said that night, When she who wore the buds of cyclamen Stood in the odoriferous twilight 'mid the flowers, While a caressing spray of some white bloom Over her rose-flushed shoulder fell. I knew, And wrote it down on a Vitellian leaf— A little tablet for love's lusive rhyme. Who will, may read.

I.
O darling eyelids' delicate droop!
O little sweet mouth, so red, so pure!
There in the twilight while I stoop,
Beautiful AMORIST looks demure.
There's a word to whisper: who can guess?
Will it be No, sweet? Will it be Yes?

II.
Listen the flowers that word to learn
Which the little sweet mouth might say to me;
Faintly it flutters the fairy fern:
What will it be? O what will it be?
Under the gleam in those eyes of light
As she says the best thing said to-night!

THE MOUTH.

AS far as appearance is concerned, it does not matter much what shape the male mouth may have, as, with the present style of wearing the mustache and beard, little of it can be seen. In the smooth face of woman, however, the form of the mouth has a great deal to do with its beauty or ugliness. The standard of taste in regard to this, as to other features, varies in different nations. The African not only prefers the flat nose, but the blubber lip, and Mungo Park, when traveling on the banks of the Niger, overheard a conclave of negro native matrons discussing the possibility of there being in any part of the world a woman capable of kissing such a shriveled mouth as his European one. Frightful, however, as were his thin lips, this did not prevent the African maiden from moistening them in their agony of fevered thirst with a draught of water from her refreshing gourd. Such was the triumph of woman's tenderness that it even overcame her natural disgust.

Though we are far from admiring the African mouth, we consider a certain fullness of the lips essential to female loveliness. The thin lip, making no show of a ruddy succulence, seems to indicate, with a meagreness and acridity of blood, a cold and sour disposition; and we are not surprised to read that the shrewish Xantippe, the incompatible spouse of Socrates, was lean-mouthed.

The most lovable of months is given to the bride by Suckling in his Ballad on a Wedding:

"Her lips were red, and one was thin
Compared to that was next her chin,
Some bee had stung it newly."

All the poets—and they are supposed to have the nicest sensibility to female as to other beauty—agree in bestowing a certain fullness and redness upon the lips of their ideal loves. The expanding rose-bud is, as is well known, the traditional comparison:

"Roses are her cheeks,
And a rose her mouth."

The more the line of the upper-lip resembles the form of the classical bow the more closely it approaches the ideal of beauty. This potent weapon of Apollo and Cupid, in fact, was modeled from the curve of the mouth, and symbolizes, in the eloquence of the one and the love of the other, the power of words, whether whispered in the ear of affection or thundered forth to the sympathy of a multitude.

There is no art potent enough to give the beauty of symmetry which nature may have refused to the lips. If they become unnaturally pale, more or less rouge mixed with beeswax will give them a deceitful and temporary gloss of nature. To this daubing our fashionable dames are constantly obliged to resort, for their exhausting lives of dissipation impoverish and decolorize the blood, and the effect is apparent at once in the blanched lip. A frequent usage, however, of the lip salve, as it is ingeniously called, but which is merely a red pigment in disguise, soon so inflames, thickens, and roughens, and gives such a peculiar tint to the mouth, that it has the look of the shriveled, purplish lips of a sick negress. The habit of biting the lips soon destroys any grace of form they may have originally possessed. Madame de Pompadour, while lamenting the decay of her charms, confessed that she first began to spoil at the mouth. She had early acquired the habit of biting her lips in order to conceal her emotion. "At thirty years," says an historian, "her mouth had lost all its striking brilliancy." She, too, began at a very early period to touch herself up with that paint so fatal to the duration of facial charms, and at court only dared to show herself by candle-light.

The mouth, supplied with a number of muscles quick to act at the vaguest command of the will, is very expressive of the disposition. There is one little one against whose action we would put our young damsels on their guard. It is the same as that which turns up the nostril at the least emotion of pride, envy, or disgust. It also at the same time, for it is connected with the mouth, pulls up its upper lip. The effect of the frequent exercise of all muscles of the face is to give a permanent expression according to the direction of their action. This is more marked in that of the mouth and nose, called by the ancients the musculus superbus, or proud muscle. If our pretty girls desire to grow old gracefully we would advise them to be chary of the use of this tell-tale messenger, for if his services should be often availed of, he will be sure to turn up the nose and lip in permanent disgust of his functions. It is the most distinctive and repulsive sign of an envious old maid or any other ill-tempered person.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

A Letter to Lucy Jessamine.

MY DEAR LUCY,—You must excuse the freedom of an old man, since it does not signify want of respect, but the most earnest interest in you and your welfare. It is my habit to stroll about the city, a student of manners, observing all the new-comers, as well as the old residents, and seeing what hints I may drop to help them. In fact, I am not unlike the policemen who used to jump upon the cars as they came into town—and perhaps still jump—to offer their services to the strangers, to tell them how to go to Barnum's or to Broadway, and to warn them against the friendliness of unknown persons whom they might encounter in horse-cars and omnibuses. The guardians of the peace reminded travelers that they had now reached a place in which they must be upon the most constant watch against sharpers of every kind—the great capital of fraud and falsehood, where eternal vigilance is the price of safety.

My dear Lucy, it is precisely so that I wish to warn you. When you lately arrived in town from your pleasant country home at the West, the dream of your youth was fulfilled. All your life you had heard of New York, and you longed to see it, as the good people in the country, of whom we read in old English plays and novels, used to long for London. I saw you upon your arrival, although I was quite invisible to you, and when I heard papa call for the Fifth Avenue Hotel coach, I knew who had insisted upon going to that delightful and fashionable house. And here let me say to your father, and to all other respectable gentlemen from the interior, that they choose wisely when they choose the Fifth Avenue Hotel; for it is in the hands of a skillful and self-respecting management, which had the wisdom, out of regard to the comfort of its guests, to turn the gentlemen of the evening gold-room out of doors. The gentlemen of the evening gold-room, my dear Lucy, are a noisy crew of gamblers from Wall Street, who insisted upon turning the Fifth Avenue Hotel into a Bedlam every evening, and the proprietors presently expelled them from the house. Then, with the malice of professional gamblers, they resolved to ruin what they could not rule, and swore horrible vengeance against the hotel. So I say to your father, that if he wishes to put up at a house which is not infested by gamblers, and whose peculiar praise is that that reckless and unprincipled class are hostile to it, let him come, and advise his neighbors and friends to come, to the Fifth Avenue. As for you, my dear, you know, and I know, that you begged him to come there, because you knew it was in the midst of every thing gay and fashionable and delightful; because you knew, from the most careful consideration of all that you had heard and read, that you could sit at its windows and see the huge city in every form pass by, as the Prince of Wales reviewed from its balcony the firemen's torch-light procession.

It is not very far from that pleasant hotel to the Opera-house and the theatres, as you at once proceeded to discover. I accompanied you, still invisible, when you went upon the first evening to the Opera, upon the second to Wal-lack's. I was your unknown cavalier when you made papa promenade with you up and down the Avenue; and I watched your eager eyes and fancied your ardent mind studying every object that was fashionable and fine. You saw the shining carriages, the bedizened drivers, the velvet and silken ladies inside. Not a bonnet, however invisible to papa's eyes and mine, escaped you. Not a new garment, nor a new wrinkle in an old one, nor the tie of a ribbon, nor the fall of a feather, eluded your sentinel eyes. Your first walk assured you what I might have walked a hundred times without discovering, that the queen color of the moment is a soft Metternich green. The sanguinary splendors of Solferino and Magenta with which the Avenue was wont to blaze but a very few years ago are now as absurdly old-fashioned as the genius of Louis Napoleon compared with that of Bismarck. Indeed, to speak truly, I doubt, my dear Lucy, if a young poet regards the poem of a rising rival with such absorbing attention as that with which you apprehended every point in every toilette that passed you upon your promenade. Do you remember what the policeman said? No, you are right—he said nothing, but asked you if he could be of service. But do you remember why he was there? To put you on your guard. Beware, he said or suggested, beware of sharpers who will pick your pockets. But, my dear Lucy, what if he had said, beware of sharpers who will pluck away your simplicity and peace?

At the Opera I beheld you scarcely regarding the stage, but busily looking at the audience. Your eyes clung at last to a gay cluster of richly-dressed persons, and I saw you asking papa who they could be. I doubt if papa knew that it was Mrs. Tilbury and her party. But it was; and they chatted, and smiled, and bowed, and were very gracious and sparkling to the gentlemen with white cravats and familiar manners, who flattered around them, and hummed, and skipped, and slid away. How carefully you watched them, dear Lucy; how they seemed to you princes and princesses of quite another sphere; how you thought no joy could be so transcendent as to dress in that way and be so surrounded; and how your imagination dwelt upon it and softly colored the vision with rosy hues of exquisite delight, even as poor Cinderella, sitting by the kitchen-fire, dreamed of the magnificent princes dancing with her sisters in pearls and diamonds. And did you think of the policeman and his silent warning against sharpers and confidence people?

Why, my dear Lucy, do you think that there are no confidence people but those who ride in the cars, and those who sell brass watches for gold in Peter Funk's auction-room, and those who pick your pockets in the street? I rather think papa would willingly compromise by letting you lose all the money he gave you when you came to town, if he could have saved your peace of mind. You and your friends and neighbors living every where in the country, thousands and hundreds of thousands of you, constantly try to model your lives upon what you suppose to be the lives and manners of a certain class of persons whom your foolish little fancies depict as the fashionable people of New York. Why, my dear, look at it. Here is Mr. Tilbury, who comes to town from the country and makes a great deal of money; and Mrs. Tilbury, who was precisely you, a dear little Lucy from the country, when she began as Tilbury's wife, managing and economizing for him, but who now begins to buy fine dresses, and to drive in her carriage, and to live in a sumptuous house, and to hire a train of servants. She goes to Europe, and when she returns all her dresses come from Paris, and they come constantly, and they are of all kinds, provided only that they are the most expensive.

On the other side of the Opera-house was Mrs. Stanhope, who is another of the same kind, and who will not be behind Mrs. Tilbury, and Mrs. Stanhope spends, and Mrs. Stanhope has wonderful dresses, and laces, and jewelry; and Mrs. Stanhope shines at the Opera, and gives marvelous lunches, and breakfasts, and Germans. Mrs. Tilbury comes out with a silver dinner-service, and Mrs. Stanhope tops it with gold. Mrs. Stanhope suddenly extinguishes Mrs. Tilbury with a splendid set of rubies; Mrs. Tilbury retorts by crushing Mrs. Stanhope with a necklace of opals, for which the Green Vaults of Dresden might have been robbed. These ridiculous women pelt each other with diamonds and pearls, with gold and silver dishes, with old laces and new velvets. They throw extravagant dinners and exquisite suppers at each other. They dare each other with the lowliness of their dresses and the license of their manners. They excel in nothing but mad extravagance, and if they merely harmed themselves by their absurd conduct, a man might be only a little merry and a great deal sorry; but when they ruin others, when the poisonous frenzy reaches away out to Lucy Jessamine, a simple-hearted girl in the country, and she begins to sigh to do as Mrs. Tilbury does and as Mrs. Stanhope does, a man becomes indignant, and begins to look upon these women more as criminals than as fools.

Now, my dear Lucy, the fine and fashionable society of which you read, and to which you constantly look, and by whose fancied manners you regulate your own, and give yourself those ludicrous airs in your native village, is Mrs. Tilbury and Mrs. Stanhope. Of course every body in it is not like those women. They have a crowd of futile imitators; and even those who are not like them, and who do not like them, still feel their influence, and find it hard to protest. They do not refuse to visit Mrs. Tilbury, and are not ashamed to invite Mrs. Stanhope. But until they do, they will pay the penalty. Until Mrs. Stanhope's extravagance and Mrs. Tilbury's rivalry of it, are treated as no less absurd, and vulgar, and immoral than the bad manners of the Jardin Mabille and the life of the demi-monde, just so long, as I tell all my married friends in town, their household expenses will be frightful; just so long Mrs. Tilbury will make them give the most ruinous parties, and Mrs. Stanhope will force them to buy the most costly jewels. When sensible people declare their independence of these women, and refuse to throw money away because this fast firm of Tilbury and Stanhope insist upon squandering it, we shall have better manners and better morals, and it will not require a fortune to live in the city.

Now, my dear Lucy, is it worth while for you to suppose such people princes and princesses, and to long to enjoy the life they live? I assure you that the life of this class of fashionable people in New York is neither so elegant, so tasteful, so witty, so fascinating, nor half so cheap as that of the demi-monde in Paris, from which it is copied. You might as well long to drink salt-water as to desire this life. The more you drink, the more unsatisfied and the more horribly thirsty you are. Ah me! and if you knew how the men who encourage these women to be "fast" speak of them when they are so! If you could only imagine how a man despises a woman who suffers him to insult her by the least word or act! I believe my indignation and contempt are lost in pity when I see Mrs. Tilbury and Mrs. Stanhope dressing, and dining, and dancing, and supping to pique each other, and please a set of young fools who laugh at them.

My dear Lucy Jessamine, if you must have idols, choose any but these.

Your faithful friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SACQUES, PELISSES, AND MANTILLAS.

BLACK faille, or unwatered moiré, is an elegant fabric much used for sacques and mantles. It is more lustrous than gros grain, and thicker and richer. A better gloss is given to gros grain this season, which not only improves it in appearance, but will, it is said, prevent it from turning rusty and brown, as black corded silks are so apt to do. Plain taffeta, with a glistening smooth surface, is not used.

We have spoken before of the fancy pleated trimmings introduced this spring. Later importations display them in new arrangements. There are reversed pleats with a button on each end; quilled pleats with piping in the centre; and fills with the narrow pleats all turned one way and secured at both edges. Bias folds, inserted points, cross-cut bands, piping, flutings, ruffles, rosettes, and butterfly bows, and an endless variety of hand-made ornaments have been provided to take the place of passementerie and the long time favorite jet. Laces, fringe, tassels, and a small bead of crocheted silk are also used in profusion.

It is scarcely possible to find any two garments shaped precisely alike—but basquines and half-fitting jackets predominate. Very few loose paleots are seen. French garments are either fitted to the form or left slightly loose and confined at the waist with a belt and sash. The fronts are longer than the back, with square mantilla ends, or they are rounded and crossed on the waist like a fichu. The back is made short, to disclose the skirt en paniers, and the sides are frequently open and filled in with lace. Another pretty style has the fronts pointed and lapped, with both points visible, as in the engraving of the "Undine" on another page.

Pelisses are buttoned down the entire front in a straight row, or are double-breasted, with a pointed lap on the left, and fastened diagonally down the skirt. They are smooth at the shoulders, and belted in at the waist. The skirts are looped up at the sides. The coat-sleeve is almost the only one used in imported patterns.

The scarf mantilla without sleeves is a most novel garment. It is light and cool, and peculiarly appropriate for muslin and grenadine dresses that are easily rumpled. The cut we give represents square fronts, but it is also made with lapped scarf ends like a fichu.

Of all the new styles introduced this season the Watteau seems to have met with most favor. It has already been described and illustrated in the Bazar, and we give another engraving of it this week. The peculiarity of this stylish wrapping consists in the fold at the back, which may be either one wide box-pleat, or two or even three smaller ones.

The old-fashioned mantilla falling low off the shoulders, with long, square, scarf-like fronts, is again revived. This is graceful and cool for summer wear, and may be made of the material of the dress for short suits.

A pelisse of black faille, reaching almost to the knee, is slightly loose, to be worn with a belt and sash. The front is lapped on the left breast, and diagonally down the skirt. The trimming is alternate points of silk and satin inserted at the edge. Butterfly bows are along the outline of the front and on the shoulder. Epaulets of thread lace over the coat-sleeve. A rosette is at the back of the belt and at the ends of the sash. Price $125.

The handsomest Watteau we have seen is marked $250. It is of heavy faille, trimmed with wide Maltese lace, in a pattern of pointed leaves, with a tassel between each point. The heading is a honey-comb of satin and faille. A wide box-pleat hangs loose from the neck, forming the fullness of the skirt. A belt passes beneath the back through the side-seams, and holds the full front in place. A Pompadour square bertha is outlined by the trimming. Vandyked points at the neck. Coat-sleeves with lace cuff. Large crocheted buttons up the entire front. The skirt is looped at the sides and held by buttons.

A very stylish basquine is short and tight behind with loose rounded fronts confined by a belt. A large square of thread lace forms the side-pieces under the arms. The back is slashed to imitate short sashes. The pretty but expensive trimming is made of thread lace, put on in box-pleats, with a satin button and loop of piping on each pleat. The belt is covered with this lace quilling. Bullion fringe on the fronts. Price $110.

The short huzzar jacket is tight-fitting and jaunty, and suitable for slender persons. It is square in front and short, but slopes off to a rounder back, which is pleated into the waist. Narrow folds beginning at the neck describe a Zouave front and are finished behind with a rosette and sash. Round medallions of silk braid are set on between narrow folds for trimming. A rosette and sash at the waist. Price $60.

A mantilla scarf, decidedly the novelty of the season, is without sleeves. The scarf fronts lap like a fichu. The back is short and square. Four rows of piping, and a wide fall of guipure lace surround it. The loops of the sash are above the belt, while the ends fall below the skirt. Price $100.

A kind of Talma paleot is of French faille. There are no sleeves to this garment, but long square wings like flowing sleeves fall over the arm. A box-pleat, narrow at the neck, gradually widens to the end of the back, where it is turned back en revers and faced with violet silk. The trimming is a cross-cut band of faille, piped with satin on both sides. At the edge a fringe is formed of flat silk braid, ornamented with crocheted beads and bullion tassels. Price $100.

A polonaise is tight-fitting, yet worn with a belt. The right side of the skirt is turned back to form revers. A low-necked bertha is fastened on the left shoulder by a rosette. The sash ends are trimmed with satin to form a beautiful effect. Loose coat-sleeves. Price $90.

A gros grain mantilla is rounded in the back with square tabs in front. It falls low off the shoulder. A fluted ruffle of the same surrounds it. Price $30.

Graceful burnous scarfs with mantilla fronts, all wool, are worn in honey-comb patterns in gay solid colors and in cashmere stripes on a white ground for evening mantles. A deep fringe surrounds them, and a silk cord and tassel, in which all the colors of the burnous are blended, is tied at the throat. Plain checks, black and white, or blue and black, are shown for morning wear and for extra carriage wraps. Prices range from $16 to $18.

INDIA CASHMERE SHAWLS.

The one article of feminine apparel that is in no danger of ever being discarded by fashion is an Indian shawl. In our fickle climate there is scarcely a month of the year in which they may not be called into requisition, and as an heirloom they are as much prized as gems. The most elegant velvets are cut up into cloaks that will only present a stylish appearance one season, or else they are made into circulars or loose shapes with an eye to remodeling them, so that when the velvet is new the style is bad, and only when the material is worn are they made into the prevailing mode. But an Indian cashmere is always fashionable, and the ambition to possess one of these marvels of Oriental luxuriance is not to be wondered at and is scarcely to be considered a vanity.

If a lady investigates the subject she will learn that, notwithstanding the popular conviction, there is no such material as camel's hair made into shawls. The fleece of the cashmere goat is the material used, and the embroidery is done in small scraps so beautifully needle-worked together that it is difficult to find the joins. The handsomest shawls are of course those that are most nearly covered with embroidery. A small, plain centre is, however, necessary, as the embroidered part is too thick to fold pleasantly about the neck. Calcutta shawls are preferred to those made in Delhi and Bombay, as the colors are better blended, and the cashmere surface more thoroughly worked up. Some shawls shown us were so drawn and puckered by the embroidery as to entirely destroy their beauty. The surface should be perfectly smooth.

Plain shawls with India borders are often arranged in America by cutting long shawls that are found to be unsalable into borders for squares of cashmere. In this case the figures of the border run around the shawls, while in those made in India the palm leaves are pointed toward the centre, the figures at the corners are symmetrical, and the colors are delicately but gradually shaded from the outer to the inner edge of the border. This may also be easily detected from the fact that American borders are chain stitched or embroidered on to the centres, while those from India are connected by needle-work so well done and intricate that it seems to be woven.

The brilliantly-colored shawls with a great deal of bright Magenta in them are favorites in Paris, but have never been admired here. One square shawl shown us is valued at $2500. There are many long shawls at that price, but a small square so expensive is seldom seen. It is said that India houses reserve those shawls that are of most perfect styles and coloring for this market. A long shawl was sold here this season for $4000; but those that find the readiest sale range from $500 to $2000.

WALKING SUITS.

A silk serge suit of the invisible green shade called "dying frog" is made with a Watteau sacque, the skirt looped at the side, and trimmed with folds and chenille fringe. The Metternich bonnet, with large crown and diadem front, is made of the material of the dress. The buttoned boots are also of serge. Kid gloves of the same shade, with silver studs on the back.

A light silk suit marked $110 is of narrow black and white stripes. On the lower skirt are three bias frills, bound on each edge, and sewn on an inch apart from each other. A narrow ruffle is left for a heading, and the sewing is concealed by a gray satin piping. A loose polonaise forms an upper skirt, which has a short square apron front, rounding toward the back. Three rows of piping trim the front. The back is bordered with a bias frill. A Marie Antoinette fichu worn over this is trimmed with piping and a ruffle. Coat-sleeves with deep cuff simulated by trimming.

A stylish suit of gray woolen serge, with a silk diagonal reps, has a plain under-skirt with an over-skirt made en paniers. Of the six widths in the upper skirt only the front one and those each side of it are gored. The three full back widths are almost as long as the under-skirt, and are caught up in a large panier puff by a draw-string extending across from the side-seams. The gored front breadths are cut out in deep points. The paleot is short in the back, with long rounded fronts, crossed on the breast with the two lapped ends visible. A belt and sash ends at the side. The paleot, upper skirt, and coat-sleeves are trimmed with fringe and satin folds. Price $100. Material is furnished for the waist.

VARIETIES.

An elegant wedding dress just completed is of white satin. The trained skirt is two and a half yards at the back, and one yard and an eighth in front. Around the skirt at the edge is a ruche of white Malines. The tulle of this ruche is double, and made so full that eight yards are quilled to form one of the trimming. A deep court train is outlined by a ruche of the same width. And a narrower trimming defines an apron front, from which it falls into three rounded sashes. Bouquets of orange flowers are on the sashes. Low round corsage with Grecian folds of Lyons tulle on the bust beneath which is a full of point d'Alençon headed by a thick satin quilling. Short puffed sleeves of reversed folds of satin with a ruche and orange flowers. The veil of tulle reaches almost to the end of the train, and is bordered with a wide ruche. Orange flowers form a tiara, with sprays drooping over the chignon.

This dress is to be worn over a "lace" hoop skirt with a pannier bustle. The price of these elegant skirts ranges from $18 to $22.

A very elaborate night-dress, shown us as part of a bridal outfit, is a loose Gabrielle of French nansook with a pointed yoke entirely formed of square medallions of Valenciennes alternating with others of needle-work. There are tiny appliquéd figures of embroidery on the lace. This trimming is extended in vandykes down each side of the front, forming diamonds of solid lace when the garment is fastened. Diamonds of Valenciennes are up the outer seam of the coat-sleeve. Chemise and drawers are made en suite.

A breakfast suit of sheer cambric is a short sacque over the trained petticoat that is worn beneath the wedding dress. Valenciennes lace and fine needle-work are arranged in waving shells around the skirt.

Thanks are due to Madame DIENEN; GEORGE A. HEARN; A. T. STEWART & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

THE Parisian beau monde has a sensation that meets its most fastidious taste; and so Parisian! Lord RADSTOCK, a peer of high degree, only 30 years old, is preaching, evenings, in the American and Wesleyan chapels, and once a week addresses a fashionable assembly in the elegant drawing-room of Lady COWPER. He belongs to the Plymouth brethren (not an offshoot of Brooklyn), a people who do not recognize the need of any ordained ministry—every Christian, in their view, being called to preach according to his gifts and opportunity.

—Lord CAIRNS is the first Irishman who has ever held the office of Lord Chancellor of England, and he attains it at a much younger age than any of his predecessors since the time of Lord HARDWICKE. Lord C. is 49 years old; at 33 he went to Parliament; at 37 was made Queen's Counsel; at 39 was appointed Solicitor-General, in which capacity he showed great ability and eloquence; at 47 became Attorney-General, and now reaches the highest judicial position in Great Britain at 49. He has faithfully fought and fairly won his way to this distinguished honor.

—Our principal admiral, FARRAGUT, has had a very gracious reception from the Pope. The throned monarchs of the Old World have given FARRAGUT such receptions and honors as were never before given to the most distinguished of sailor-men.

—For the especial delectation of our lady readers we copy the following description of what was worn by Queen VICTORIA at the first drawing-room (March 12) she has held since the death of Prince ALBERT:

"The Queen wore a black moiré antique dress with train trimmed with crape and jet, and a diadem of opals and diamonds over a long white crape lisse veil. Her Majesty also wore a necklace and brooch of opals and diamonds, the Riband and Star of the Order of the Garter, and the Orders of Victoria and Albert and Louise of Prussia.

"Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales wore a petticoat of white silk, with bouffants of tulle veiled in silver and fastened with knots of black and gold edged with silver fringe; a tunique Marie Antoinette, and corsage of white poul de soie, trimmed with silver and volant of fine Brussels lace; a train of black poul de soie edged with gold and silver fringe; head-dress, diamonds, feathers, and veil; ornaments, pearls, and diamonds, the Victoria and Albert Order, the Order of Catherine of Prussia, and the Danish Order."

—The pleasantest "personal" is that which records the good deed of a good woman, such a woman as Mrs. HIRAM SIBLEY of Rochester, who has given $18,000 to the Episcopal Church of North Adams, Massachusetts; or such a one as Miss LOCKWOOD, of Betchworth, England, who has given $140,000 to the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.

—JOHN G. SAXE, who writes and says more witty things than any other American poet, is about to have the honor of a new and complete edition of his poems published by TICKNOR & FIELDS—something of the style of the Farringford TENNYSON. It will contain several lyrics of a kind in which Mr. SAXE excels; also certain serious pieces, exhibiting, if that be possible, greater merit than is shown in his humorous and satirical writings. It is pleasing to know that Governor S. is enjoying capital health. He is spoken of as a possible candidate for the vacant mission to Russia. It is to be hoped he will decline. ROSS BROWNE is going to China, and we couldn't get along nicely with both away.

—ADELINA PATTI seems to be singing in Paris and the provinces with greater applause than ever. The quadrances have ceased to gossip about her marriage with the Marquis DE CATX, which, the Bazar can tell them, is only postponed, not off.

—BADGER, a Boston artist, has received a veritable compliment. A picture he had painted of one of those incredibly opulent men who are only found in Boston was taken home and placed against the wall. The Newfoundland dog came in, saw his master's portrait, gazed at it a moment, wagged his tail with an expression of recognition and delight, and then walked up and kissed the "counterfeit presentment."

—There are three prominent gentlemen each engaged in preparing a Life of General GRANT—Mr. C. A. DANA, of the Sun; Mr. ALBERT D. RICHARDSON, and the Hon. H. C. DEMING, of Connecticut, who, when in Congress, was very influential in procuring the passage of the bill creating the office of General. Those who have seen his manuscript speak of it as being written with great power. Meanwhile, Colonel ADAM BADEAU's "Life" of the General has what the horse-people call a fine "send-off," and is rapidly finding its way to the people.

—Mr. DICKENS is of opinion that his audience at New Haven was the most appreciative he has read to in America.

—There is one gentleman who has been a member of the House of Commons for 48 years consecutively—Lord HOTHAM. He is, therefore, the "father," if not the grandfather, of "the House."

—LOLA MONTEZ, who rests from "life's fitful fever" in Greenwood, where a plain marble stone in which "ELIZA GILBERT" is cut gives her real name, has a son, who has just resigned a distinguished position in the Bavarian army, having inherited a considerable fortune—from the ex-King of Bavaria, perhaps.

—ARTHUR HELPS, the gentleman who helps the Queen in her literary work, is a widower, fifty-four, short and spare, and has one daughter; is an opulent gentleman, having much mine and land in Wales. Good old family, etc.

—The lady-readers of the Bazar will certainly vote Mr. DISRAELI a model Prime Minister. One of his very first official acts was to confer a pension of $1000 per annum on Lady BREWSTER, the widow of the eminent philosopher.

—King THEODORE, who is giving the English so much trouble in Abyssinia, is not a reputable person, so far as the use of stimulants is concerned. He keeps tolerably erect and mild until about noon; then the man begins to drink and soon gets into such a muddle and passion as to make himself quite disgusting to every body about him. He is intelligent, courageous, and has great force of character; but he will indulge in the too frequent crooking of the elbow.

—Madrid is anxious to hear Miss KELLOGG, at the rate of $400 per night, which she declined, on account of the weather, not the figures. She is now visiting among duchesses and gilt-edged people of that style.

—Mr. J. STUART MILL abates nothing of his determination to promote, in the British Parliament, the rights of women. He has recently written to a lady in Michigan, that he has done his best, by every influence he possessed, to promote the admission of women, not only to political, but to all other rights, on the same conditions as men, and that he intends to persevere in so doing.

—An American gentleman who recently visited the great English philosopher, JOHN STUART MILL, at his country residence in Avignon, France, thus describes that personage as he appeared in the modest little cottage where most of his time is spent:

"I found myself in what seemed to serve as a library to the owner of the house. In an arm-chair in front of the fire-place, in which some coals were still burning, notwithstanding the warm Spring sunshine without, there sat, with a cat purring at his feet, the well-known form of Mr. MILL. He rose as I entered, welcomed me by a cordial shake of the hand, and invited me to be seated. Mr. MILL's figure is of more than the average height, but he could hardly be called tall. His form is decidedly slender. His head impresses one at once as the seat of intelligence of the highest order and the highest activity. The upper portion is very broad, but below the splendid high forehead the face becomes narrow-featured. His eyes are grayish, and not large, but of a most genial expression. His nose is thin and straight, and well proportioned. The features run out into a very sharp chin. The complexion of the clean-shaved face is rosy, and clearly indicative of good health. His voice is not strong, but of great clearness, notwithstanding the delicate and almost womanly gentleness of its tones. Mr. MILL is a rather hesitating public speaker. His ordinary conversation discloses the same defect, which is probably the result of a long habit of weighing words before committing himself to them."

—Earl DERBY declines to be made a Duke, but Mr. GATHORNE HARDY is to be created a peer of high degree. The Speaker of the House of Commons will claim his peerage at the close of the present session. Mr. DISRAELI will continue plain Mister to the end of his days, glorying, as he does, in his ancient lineage, and boasting, in a gentlemanly way, that he is the only Cabinet Minister, or Premier, England has known who ignores a coat of arms.

—That good man, GEORGE AUGUSTUS SALA, says that more pretty women promenaded Broadway from Canal to Fourteenth Street, than can be found on any similar feminine parade ground all the world over. That is so.

—No woman in France has been so much written about as the Empress, yet here is another little sketch, deftly done, that we dare say will not be unacceptable to our lady readers:

"Unlike the French women—who are short and dumpy, especially in middle life—the Empress is queenly in form, tall, slim, and stately. Unlike the French women, whose complexions are dark, sallow, and even dingy, the Empress's face is as white as alabaster. Her eye is clear but piercing; her smile captivating; her brow gracious. Arrayed in her regal robes she is simply magnificent. Every thing about her is in keeping. Her taste is unequalled. Every thing is in proportion, and one part is suited to the other. She knows what will agree with her complexion to the exact shade of ribbon. You can suggest no alteration in her dress. On state occasions when she greets the public eye she wears every thing regal and stately that becomes her station. On ordinary occasions her dress is very plain, very simple, yet very taking. Her hat seems to be the central point of her dress. If it is brown or blue, green or crimson, her gloves, scarf, ornaments, and apparel correspond. Her spirits are exuberant, her disposition joyous, and she seems disposed to enjoy her position. On her last visit to England she was the guest of the Queen. A review was held in St. James's Park in her honor, which she beheld from the balcony of Buckingham Palace, in company with Victoria and Napoleon. She was joyous as a school-girl. She clasped her hands and shouted in her French style like a little girl at the grand display. Her buoyancy and gleefulness of manner, not to say frivolity, shocked the dignified and sober Queen of England; and more than once Victoria laid her hand on the shoulder of her fair visitor, and reminded her that while such outbursts of feeling were perfectly natural, they were not regal!"

Court-Plaster Case.

This little case, in the form of an envelope, is used for holding court-plaster, postage-stamps, etc., and possesses the advantage of being small enough to be carried in the porte-monnaie. Take a piece of ribbon an inch wide and four inches and a half long, double it in the middle, and work a double row of button-hole stitch in white silk across the ends and the lower part. For the part that turns over, double button-hole stitch a piece of ribbon, of a corresponding size, on the back of the upper part of the case thus formed, cut it out in the shape of an envelope, and button-hole stitch the edge; also simulating the folds of an envelope on the case itself with a row of double button-hole stitch, in the manner shown in the illustration. Finish with a button on the case and a loop on the part that folds over.

Crochet Apron for Girl from two to three Years old.

This apron is worked in fine white knitting cotton. The pretty design of the foundation and of the lace may also be used for antimacassars and the like. The pattern is given in Fig. 67 of the Supplement.

Begin the apron on the under side with a foundation of suitable length, and work on this, paying close attention to the shape, as follows:

1st round.—Alternately 1 dc. (double crochet), 1 ch. (chain stitch) passing over one foundation stitch.

2d round.—1 sc. (single crochet) in the next ch. of the last round; * 5 ch. 1 dc. figure as follows: in the second following ch. of the last round 1 dc., which is to be left half finished, also one finished dc.—this leaves now two loops on the needle; then in the next ch., two half-finished dc., which are worked off together with the last of the two loops which remained on the needle; then work together the two loops still remaining on the needle; this finishes the dc. figure; now 5 ch. 1 sc. in the second following ch. of the last round. From * repeat to the end of the round.

3d round.—In the second of the 5 ch. at the beginning of the last round 2 dc., of which the first is only half worked, and then worked together with the second finished stitch; * 5 ch., 1 sc. between the twice two dc. of the next dc.—figure 5 ch., a dc.—figure as in the second round, but in this round crochet the first 2 dc. in the ch. before the last, of the five lying before the next sc. of the last round, and the other 2 dc. in the second ch. after this sc. Repeat from *. The accompanying illustration shows a part of the foundation with insertion and lace of the full size.

Having finished the foundation in the given design, work around the sides and upper edge, one round sc., working in the loose threads remaining from the foundation work. Then work the following insertion: First, a round in open-work dc. like those on the under border, widening on the corners as required by the rounding. Work the following rossette-round: Begin on one of the upper corners of the foundation and crochet * in the next 3 stitches of the open-work dc. round, 3 stc. (short treble crochet), 2 ch. passing over the next 2 stitches of the former round; 1 stc. in the following stitch of the last round; 3 ch., passing over the next 3 stitches; 1 stc. in the following stitch of the last round. Now around the stc. just made work three times alternating 5 ch., 1 sc., then 5 ch., and, going backward, 1 sc. in each of the 2 ch. which are separated by a dc. of the round before the last, and join the stc. just worked around in scallops with the stc. lying immediately before it; between each of these sc. 5 ch., then again 5 ch., and also on this next stc., alternately three times 1 sc., 5 ch.; finally, on the 3 ch. which were-worked between the two stc., 2 sc. separated by 5 ch.;

this finishes a rosette of the insertion. Now crochet 2 ch., passing over 2 stitches, and repeat from * till the apron is bordered by a round of such rosettes. On this work an open-work dc. round as before. Finish around the neck with a narrow, and the other edges with a wide lace. The narrow is worked as follows: in every ch. of the open-work dc.-round 1 sc. between every 2 sc. a picot composed of 5 ch. and 1 sc. in the first of these 5 ch.

The wider lace for the remaining part of the edge is made in two rounds as follows: 1st round.—Alternately, 1 sc. in the next 7 stitches of the last round; 5 ch. passing over 3 stitches of the last round. 2d round.—1 sc. in the first sc. of the last round, * 3 ch., 2 sc. separated by 5 ch. in the middle one of the 7 sc.; 3 ch., 4 sc., each separated by 9 ch. around the ch.-scallop of the former round, 3 ch., 1 sc. in the middle ch. of the open-work dc. round which lies between each 7 sc.; 3 ch., 3 sc. each separated by 5 ch. around the ch.-scallop of the first round, and each sc. must come between two of the sc. which were first worked around the ch.-scallop; 1 sc. in the last sc. which was worked in the ch.-scallop. Repeat from *.

The pocket-flaps are composed of the before-mentioned insertion, which consists of a row of rosettes surrounded by an open-work dc. row. On one side of these flaps finish with the narrow, on the other side the wide lace.

Then run a colored velvet ribbon through the rosette insertion of the pocket-flaps and of the border of the apron; sew on the flaps, and finish with a bow of the ribbon as shown in the pattern.

The shoulder-straps are made of the same insertion bordered with the wide lace. They are run through with the velvet ribbon, and sewed on the upper edge of the apron, then buttoned on the sides, on which buttons are sewed in the points designated by *.

Knitting-Needle Pocket.

This pocket, which is intended for holding knitting-needles, is of brown reps, and is bordered with red silk ribbon. The original is eight inches in length by three in width. For making such a pocket take a piece of stuff ten inches in length by three and a half inches in breadth, and a piece of black silk of the same dimensions for the lining. Both are laid together smoothly, and the ends are cross-stitched together with red silk. Lay the stuff over one end the width of an inch, and stitch it in rows one-third of an inch apart with red silk, thus forming little pockets, in which the needles are placed. In the same manner add three bands, as shown in the illustration, which are also stitched on lengthwise at the distance of one-third of an inch between the rows of stitching. The stuff is laid over at the upper end at the width of three-fourths of an inch, thus forming a cover, and is stitched with red silk, and furnished with button-hole stitched loops. Finish the long sides with a ribbon binding, and sew on small buttons whereby to fasten the pocket.

Arrangement for Looping up Paletots, Dresses, etc.

Long cloaks are now often looped up in order to show more of the dress; and paletots and dresses are looped up in the same manner. The accompanying illustrations show a simple and

CLOAK TRIMMINGS.

WE give a great variety of the hand-made trimmings now so fashionable, and which are easily executed with a little time and patience.

Rosettes and Bows.

Figs. 1 and 2 are especially adapted for trimming pocket lapels, sleeves, and epaulets of cloaks, dresses, etc., and can be made of black or colored silk, or of the same material as the garment. Fig. 1 is of black silk reps. It consists of six loops, each three inches wide, edged with satin piping and a bias fold a quarter of an inch wide. These are laid in two pleats at the end, and arranged on a piece of stiff lace, in the manner shown in the illustration.

easy way of doing this by means of buttons. In sewing up the seams which join the breadths of the dress-skirt or paletot, leave open a portion of the seam in order to form the button-holes, and afterward open the seam and stitch it down on the right side. Then sew on the required buttons as shown in the illustration, so that two button-holes shall lie under each button. In buttoning up the dress, put the button marked I backward through the button-hole marked 1 and forward through the button-hole marked 2. In the same ton is set on each end. A large satin button confines the loops in the centre, and the edge of the rosette is finished with small satin points.

Fig. 5.—This rosette is made of black silk-twist and bugles, and may be used for trimming sashes, dresses, jackets, etc. [The manner of crocheting it has been described in Harper's Bazar, No. 18, p. 280 and 281, Black Satin Sash with Crochet Rosette.] The centre of this rosette is formed by a small wheel which, after the crochet work is finished, is sewed over with black silk, as shown in the illustration.

Loops, Pippings, Folds, etc.

Figs. 6-11 are specially adapted to sleeves, pockets, standing-collars, etc.

Fig. 6.—This simple and elegant trimming consists of upright loops of satin ribbon a quarter of an inch wide, the setting on of which is concealed by silk cord wound round them in the manner shown in the illustration.

Fig. 7.—This trimming is made of small bias folds of satin, the ends of which are folded crosswise, so as to form points. They are then sewed together at the bottom, and a bias fold of satin is stitched over the seam.

Figs. 16 and 17 show the manner of preparing loops by which to hang up cloaks and dresses, the material of which is often torn or injured for the want of them. Fold a bias strip of cloth, an inch wide, lengthwise, sew a braid along the middle of the strip thus folded together, and hem the edges over this braid as shown in Fig. 17; then turn the ends over at the distance of one-sixth of an inch and sew them fast, as seen in the illustration.

SPRING THOUGHTS.

PRIMROSES beneath the trees
Fling their scent upon the breeze;
Rooks are calling in the air;
Birds make music ev'ry where.

Swallows come from far away,
Lambs in ev'ry field at play,
Hawthorn hedges dress'd in white,
Corn-crakes chirp from morn to night.

Meadows bright with golden hue,
Woods are carpeted with blue,
Cattle grazing in the mead,
There a sower sows his seed.

Searching for a rose-bud here,
Cuckoo's notes upon the ear,
Fledgelings flutter as they sing,
There a bee is on the wing.

Shadows on the mountains cast,
Light appearing then as fast,
Pheasant crying in its flight,
Orchards full of blossoms white.

Life and joy are ev'ry where;
Lurks a thought of sadness there?
Yes—for grief must linger here;
First a smile and then a tear.

Sunshine hours must pass away,
Flowers can not bloom alway;
Songs that make the green-woods ring
Shall we hear them after Spring?—

Hear the lark who sings above,
Rapturous notes of joy and love—
As I hear sad thoughts take wing;
Heaven is bright, and still 'tis Spring.

LADY DENZIL.

IN FOUR CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

THE Denzils were the chief people at Dinglefield Green. Their house was by much the most considerable-looking house, and the grounds were beautiful. I say the most considerable-looking, for my own impression is that Dinglewood, which was afterward bought by the stock-broker whose coming convulsed the whole Green, was in reality larger than the Lodge; but the Lodge, when Sir Thomas Denzil was in it, was all the same the centre of every thing. It was like Windsor Castle to us neighbors, or perhaps in reality it was more what her Majesty's actual royal habitation is to the dwellers within her castle gates. We were the poor knights, the canons, the musical and ecclesiastical people who cluster about that mingled strong-hold of the State and Church—but to the Lodge was it given to bestow distinction upon us. Those of us who visited Lady Denzil entered into all the privileges of rank; those who did not receive that honor fell into the cold shade—and a very uncomfortable shade it must have been. I speak, you will say, at my ease; for my people had known the Denzils ages before, and Sir Thomas most kindly sent his wife to call, almost before I had settled down into my cottage; but I remember how very sore Mrs. Wood felt about it, though it surprised me at the time. "I have been here five years, and have met them every where; but she has never found the way to my door. Not that I care in the least," she said, with a flush on her cheek. She was a clergyman's widow, and very sensitive about her "position," poor thing—and almost found fault with me, as if I was to blame for having known the Denzils in my youth.

Lady Denzil, who had so much weight among us, was a very small personage. She would have been tiny and insignificant had she not been so stately and imposing. I don't know how she did it. She was not far from sixty at the time I speak of. Whatever the fashion was she always wore long, flowing dresses, which swept the ground for a yard behind her, and cloaks ample and graceful; always large, always full, and always made of black silk. Even in winter, though her carriage would be piled with heaps of furs, she wore upon her little majestic person nothing but silk. Such silk! You should have touched it to know what it was. The very sound of it, as it rustled softly after her over the summer lawn or the winter carpet, was totally different from the frôlement of ordinary robes. Some people said she had it made for herself express at Lyons. I don't know how that might be, but I know I never saw any thing like it. I believe she had every variety in her wardrobe that heart of woman could desire. Indian shawls worth a fortune I know were among her possessions; but she never wore any thing but that matchless silk—long dresses of it, and long, large ample cloaks to correspond. Her hair was quite white, like silver. She had the brightest dark eyes shining out from under brows which were curved and lined as finely as when she was eighteen. Her color was as fresh as a rose. I think there never was a more lovely old lady. Eighteen, indeed! It has its charms, that pleasant age. It is sweet to the eye, especially of man. Perhaps a woman, who has oftenest to lecture the creature, instead of falling down to worship, may not see so well the witchery which lies in the period; but find me any face of eighteen that could match Lady Denzil's. It had wrinkles, yes; but these were crossed by lines of thought, and lighted up by that soft breath of experience and forbearance which comes only with the years. Lady Denzil's eyes saw things that other eyes could not see. She knew by instinct when things were amiss. You could tell it by the charitable absence of all questioning, by a calm taking-for-granted the most unlikely explanations. Some people supposed they deceived her; but they never deceived her. And some people spoke of her extraordinary insight, and eyes that could see through a millstone. I believe her eyes were clear; but it was experience, only experience—long knowledge of the world, acquaintance with herself and human nature, and all the chances that befall us on our way through this life. That it was, and not any mere intuition or sharpness, that put insight into Lady Denzil's eyes.

The curious thing, however, was that she had never had any troubles of her own. She had lived with Sir Thomas in the Lodge since a period dating far beyond my knowledge. It was a thing which was never mentioned among us, chiefly, I have no doubt, because of her beautiful manners, and stately look, though it came to be spoken of afterward, as such things will; but the truth is, that nobody knew very clearly who Lady Denzil was. Sir Thomas's first wife was from Lancashire, of one of the best old families in the county; and it was not an unusual thing for new-comers to get confused about this, and identify the present Lady Denzil with her predecessor; but I am not aware that any one really knew the rights of it or could tell who she was. I have heard the mistake made, and I remember distinctly the gracious and unsatisfactory way with which she put it aside. "The first Lady Denzil was a Lancashire woman," she said. "She was one of the Tunstalls of Abbots-Tunstall, and a very beautiful and charming person." This was all. She did not add, as any body else would have done, Leamshire or Blankshire is my county. It was very unsatisfactory; but it was fine all the same, and closed every body's mouth. There were always some connections on the Denzil side staying at the Lodge in the end of the year. Nothing could be kinder than she was to all Sir Thomas's young connections. But nobody belonging to Lady Denzil was ever seen among us. I don't think it was remarked at the time, but it came to be noted afterward, and it certainly was very strange.

I never saw more perfect devotion than that which old Sir Thomas showed to his wife. He was about ten years older than she—a hale handsome old man, nearly seventy. Had he been twenty-five and she eighteen he could not have been more tender, more careful of her. Often have I looked at her and wondered, with the peaceful life she led, with the love and reverence and tender care which surrounded her, how she had ever come to know the darker side of life, and understand other people's feelings. No trouble seemed ever to have come to her. She put down her dainty little foot only to walk over soft carpets or through bright gardens; she never went any where where those long silken robes might not sweep, safe even from the summer dust, which all the rest of us have to brave by times. Lady Denzil never braved it. I have seen her sometimes—very seldom—with her dress gathered up in her arms in great billows, on the sheltered sunny lime-walk which was at one side of the Lodge, taking a little gentle exercise; but this was quite an unusual circumstance, and meant that the roads were too heavy or too slippery for her horses. On these rare occasions Sir Thomas would be at her side, like a courtly old gallant as he was. He was as deferential to his wife as if she had been a princess and he dependent on her favor, and at the same time there was a grace of old love in his reverence which was like a poem. It was a curious little Paradise that one looked into over the ha-ha across the verdant lawns that encircled the Lodge. The two were old and childless, and sometimes solitary; but I don't think, though they opened their house liberally to kith, kin, and connections, that they ever felt less lonely than when they were alone. Two, where the two are one, is enough. To be sure the two in Eden were young. Yet it does but confer a certain tender pathos upon that companionship when they are old. I thought of the purest romance I knew, of the softest creations of poetry, when I used to see old Sir Thomas in the lime-walk with his old wife.

But I am sorry she had not called on poor Mrs. Wood. It would have been of real consequence to that good woman if Lady Denzil had called. She was only a clergyman's widow, and a clergyman's widow may be any thing, as every body knows; she may be such a person as will be an acquisition any where, or she may be quite the reverse. It was because Mrs. Wood belonged to this indefinite class that Lady Denzil's visit would have been of such use. Her position was doubtful, poor soul. She was very respectable and very good in her way, and her daughters were nice girls, but there was nothing in themselves individually to raise them out of mediocrity. I took the liberty to say so one day when I was at the Lodge, but Lady Denzil did not see it somehow; and what could I do? And, on the other hand, it was gall and wormwood to poor Mrs. Wood every time she saw the carriage with the two bays stop at my door.

"I saw Lady Denzil here to-day," she would say. "You ought to feel yourself honored. I must say I don't see why people should give in to her so. In my poor husband's time the Duchess never came into the parish without calling. It need not be any object to me to be noticed by a bit of a baronet's wife."

"No, indeed!" said I, being a coward and afraid to stand to my guns; "I am sure it is not worth your while. And she is old, poor lady—and I am an old friend—and indeed I don't know that Lady Denzil professes to visit."

I went on faltering, with a sense of getting deeper and deeper into the mud.

"Oh, pray don't say so to spare my feelings," said Mrs. Wood, with asperity. "It is nothing to me whether she calls or not, but you must know, Mrs. Mulgrave, that Lady Denzil does make a point of calling on every one she thinks worth her while. I am sure she is quite at liberty to do as she pleases so far as I am concerned." Here she stopped and relieved herself, drawing a long breath and fanning with her handkerchief her cheeks, which were crimson. "But if I were to say I was connected with the peerage, or to talk about the titled people I do know," she added, with a look of spite, "she would very soon find out where I lived: oh, trust her for that!"

"I think you must have taken up a mistaken idea," I said, meekly. I had not courage enough to stand up in my friend's defense. Not that I am exactly a coward by nature, but I knew that Mrs. Wood was a dangerous person to deal with; and I was sorry in the present instance, and felt that the grievance was a real one. "I don't think Lady Denzil cares very much about the peerage. She is an old woman and has her fancies, I suppose."

"Oh, you are a favorite!" said Mrs. Wood, tossing her head, as if it was my fault. "You have the entrée, and we are spiteful who are left out, you know," she added, with pretended playfulness. It was a very affected little laugh, however, to which she gave utterance, and her cheeks flamed crimson. I was very sorry—I did not know what to say to make things smooth again. If I had been Lady Denzil's keeper I should have taken her to call at Rose Cottage next day. But I was not Lady Denzil's keeper. It was great kindness of her to visit me: how could I force her against her will to visit other people? A woman of Mrs. Wood's age, who surely could not have got so far through the world without a little understanding of how things are managed, ought to have known that it could do her very little good to quarrel with me.

And then the girls would come to me when there was any thing going on at the Lodge. "We met the Miss Llewellyns the other day," Adelaide said on one occasion. "We thought them very nice. They are staying with Lady Denzil, you know. I wish you would make Lady Denzil call on mamma, Mrs. Mulgrave. It is so hard to come and settle in a place and be shut out from all the best parties. Until you have been at the Lodge you are considered nobody on the Green."

"The Lodge can't make us different from what we are," said Nora, the other sister, who was of a different temper. "I should be ashamed to think it mattered whether Lady Denzil called or not."

"But it does matter a great deal when they are going to give a ball," said Adelaide, very solemnly. "The best balls going, some of the officers told me; and every body will be there—except Nora and me," said the poor girl. "Oh, Mrs. Mulgrave, I wish you would make Lady Denzil call!"

"But, my dear, I can't make Lady Denzil do any thing," I said; "I have no power over her. She comes to see me sometimes, but we are not intimate, and I have no influence. She comes because my people knew the Denzils long ago. She has her own ways. I could not make her do one thing or another. It is wrong to speak so to me."

"But you could if you would try," said Adelaide: as she spoke we could hear the sound of the croquet balls from the Lodge, and voices and laughter. We were all three walking along the road, under shelter of the trees. She gave such a wistful look when she heard that it went to my heart. It was not a very serious trouble, it is true. But still, to feel one's self shut out from any thing, is hard when one is twenty. I had to hurry past the gate to restrain the inclination I had to brave every thing, and take them in with me, as my friends, to join the croquet party. I know very well what would have happened had I done so. Lady Denzil would have been perfectly sweet and gracious, and sent them away delighted with her; but she would never have crossed my threshold again. And what good would that have done them? The fact was, they had nothing in particular to recommend them; no special qualities of their own to make up for their want of birth and connection; and this being the case, what could any one say?

It gave one a very different impression of Lady Denzil to see how she behaved when poor Mrs. Stoke was in such trouble about her youngest boy. I had been with her calling, and Mrs. Stoke had told us a whole long story about him: how good-hearted he was, and how generous, spending his money upon every body. It was a very hard matter for me to keep my countenance, for of course I knew Everard Stoke, and what kind of a boy he was. But Lady Denzil took it all with the greatest attention and sympathy. I could not but speak of it when we came out. "Poor Mrs. Stoke!" said I; "it is strange how she can deceive herself so—and she must have known we knew better. You who have seen poor Everard grow up, Lady Denzil—"

"Yes, my dear," she said, "you are right; and yet, do you know, I think you are wrong too. She is not deceived. She knows a great deal better than we do. But then she is on the other side of the scene, and she sees into the boy's heart a little. I hope she sees into his heart."

"I fear it is a very bad heart; I should not think it was any pleasure to look into it," said I, in my haste. Lady Denzil gave me a soft, half-reproachful look. "Well," she said, and gave a sigh, "it has always been one of my great fancies, that God was more merciful than man, because He saw fully what was in all our hearts. What we meant, poor creatures that we are, not what we did. We never have any confidence in Him for that. We think He will forgive and save, but we don't think He understands, and sees every thing, and knows that nothing is so bad as it seems. Perhaps it is dangerous doctrine; at least the vicar would think so, I fear."

"In the case of Everard Stoke," said I, stupidly, coming back to the starting-point.

"My dear," said Lady Denzil with a little impatience, "the older one grows the less one feels inclined to judge any one. Indeed, when one grows quite old," she went on after a pause, smiling a little, as if it were at the thought that she, whom no doubt she could remember so thoughtless and young, was quite old, "one comes to judge not at all. Poor Everard, he never was a good boy—but I dare say his mother knows him best, and he is better than is thought."

"At least it was a comfort to her to see you look as if you believed her," said I, not quite entering into the argument. Lady Denzil took no notice of this speech. It was a beautiful bright day, and it was but a step from Mrs. Stoke's cottage to the Lodge gates, which we were just about entering. But at that moment there was a little party of soldiers marching along the high-road, at right angles from where we stood. It is not far from the Green to the barracks, and their red coats were not uncommon features in the landscape. These men, however, were marching in a business like way, not lingering on the road, and among them was a man in a shooting-coat, handcuffed, poor fellow. It was a deserter they were taking back to the punishment that awaited him. I made some meaningless exclamation or other, and stood still, looking after them for a moment. Then I suppose my interest failed, as they went on, at their rapid, steady pace, turning their backs upon us. I came back to Lady Denzil, as it were; but when I looked at her there was something in her face that struck me with the deepest wonder. She had not come back to me. She was standing absorbed, watching them: the color all gone out of her soft old cheeks, and the saddest wistful, longing gaze in her eyes. It was not pity—it was something mightier, more intense. She did not breathe or move, but stood gazing, gazing after them. When they had disappeared she came to herself; her hands, which had been clasped tightly, fell loose at her sides; she gave a long, deep sigh, and then she became conscious of my eyes upon her, and the color came back with a rush to her face.

"I am always interested about soldiers," she said, faintly, turning as she spoke to open the gate. That was all the notice she took of it. But the incident struck me more than my account of it may seem to justify. If such a thing had been possible as that the deserter could have been her husband or her brother, one could have understood it. Had I seen such a look on Mrs. Stoke's face I should have known it was Everard. But here was Lady Denzil, a contented childless woman, without any body to disturb her peace. Sympathy must indeed have become perfect before such a wistfulness could come into any woman's eyes.

Often since I have recalled that scene to my mind, and wondered over it: the quick march of the soldiers on the road; the man in the midst with death envying him all round, and most likely despair in his heart; and that one face looking on, wistful as love, sad as death—and yet with no cause either for her sadness or her love. It did not last long, it is true; but it was one of the strangest scenes I ever witnessed in my life.

It even appeared to me next day as if Lady Denzil had been a little shaken, either by her visit to Mrs. Stoke, or by this strange little episode which nobody knew of. She had taken to me, which I confess I felt as a great compliment. And Sir Thomas came to ask me to go to her next afternoon. "My lady has a headache," he said, in a quaint way, he had of speaking of her. I think he would have liked to call her my queen or my princess—when he said my lady there was something chivalric, something romantic in his very tone. When I went into the drawing-room at the Lodge the great green blind was drawn over the window on the west side, and the trees gave the same green effect to the daylight at the other end. The east windows looked out upon the lime-walk, and the light came in softly, green and shadowy, through the silken leaves. She was lying on the sofa, which was not usual with her. As soon as I entered the room she called me to come and sit by her—and of course she did not say a word about yesterday. We went on talking for an hour and more about the trees and the sunset; about what news there was; girls going to be married, and babies coming, and other such domestic incidents. And sometimes the conversation would languish for a moment, and I did think once there was something strange in her eyes when she looked at me, as if she had something to tell, and was looking into my face to see whether she might or might not do it. But it never went any further; we began to speak of Molly Jackson, and that was an interminable subject. Molly was a widow in the village, and she gave us all a great deal of trouble. She had a quantity of little children, to whom the people on the Green were very kind; and she was a good-natured soft soul, always falling into some scrape or other. This time was the worst of all; it was when the talk got up about Thomas Short. People said that Molly was going to marry him. It would have been very foolish for them both, of course. He was poor and he was getting old, and would rather have hindered than helped her with her children. We gentlefolks may, or may not, be sentimental about our own concerns. But we see things in their true light when they take place among our poor neighbors. As for the two being a comfort to each other we never entered into that question; there were more important matters concerned.

"I don't know what would become of the poor children," said I. "The man would never put up with them, and indeed it could not be expected; and they have no friends to go to. But I don't think Molly would be so wicked. She may be a fool, but she has a mother's heart."

Lady Denzil gave a faint smile, and turned on her sofa as if something hurt her. She did not answer me all at once; and as I sat for a minute silent in that soft obscurity, Molly Jackson, I acknowledge, went out of my head. Then all at once, when I had gone on to something else, she spoke; and her return to the subject startled me, I could not have told how.

"There are different ways of touching a mother's heart," she said. "She might think it would be for their good. I don't think it could be, for my part. I don't think it ever is. A woman is deceived, or she deceives herself; and then when it is too late—"

"What is too late?" said Sir Thomas behind us. He had come in at the great window, and we had not noticed. I thought Lady Denzil gave a little start, but there was no sign of it in her face.

"We were talking of Molly Jackson," she said. "Nothing is ever too late here, thanks to your precise habits, you old soldier. Molly must be talked to, Mrs. Mulgrave," she said, turning to me.

"Oh yes, she will be talked to," said I. "I know the rector and his wife have both called; and last time I saw her Mrs. Wood—"

"You are not one of the universal advisers," said Lady Denzil, patting my arm with her white hand. It was no virtue on my part, but she spoke as if she meant it for a compliment. And then we had to tell the whole story over again to Sir Thomas, who was very fond of a little gossip like all the gentlemen, but had to have every thing explained to him, and never knew what was coming next. He chuckled and laughed as men do over it. "Old fool!" he said. "A woman with half a dozen children." It was not Molly but Thomas Short that he thought would be a fool; and on our side, it is true that we had not been thinking of him.

Molly Jackson has not much to do with this story, but yet it may be as well to say that she listened to reason, and did not do any thing so absurd. It was a relief to all our minds when Thomas went to live in Langham parish the spring after, and married somebody there. I believe it was a girl out of the work-house, who might have been his daughter, and led him a very sad life. But still in respect to Molly it was a relief to our minds. I hope she was of the same way of thinking. I know for one thing that she lost her temper, the only time I ever saw her do it—and was very indignant about the young wife. "Old fool!" she said, and again it was Thomas that was meant. We had a way of talking a good deal about the village folks, and we all did a great deal for them—perhaps, on the whole, we did too much. When any thing happened to be wanting among them, instead of making an effort to get it for themselves, it was always the ladies on the Green they came to. And, of course, we interfered in our turn.

CHAPTER II.

It was in the spring of the following year that little Mary first came to the Lodge. Sir Thomas had been absent for some time, on business, Lady Denzil said, and it was he who brought the child home. It is all impressed on my mind by the fact that I was there when they arrived. He was not expected until the evening, and I had gone to spend an hour with Lady Denzil in the afternoon. It was a bright spring day, as warm as summer; one of those sweet surprises that come upon us in England in intervals between the gray east wind and the rain. The sunshine had called out a perfect crowd of golden crocuses along the borders. They had all blown out quite suddenly, as if it had been an actual voice that called them, and God's innocent creatures had rushed forth to answer to their names. And there were heaps of violets about the Lodge which made the air sweet. And there is something in that first exquisite touch of spring which moves all hearts. Lady Denzil had come out with me to the lawn. I thought she was quieter than usual, with the air of a woman listening for something. Every thing was very still, and yet in the sunshine one felt as if one could hear the buds unfolding, the young grass and leaflets thrilling with their new life. But it did not seem to me that Lady Denzil was listening to these. I said, "Do you expect Sir Thomas now?" with a kind of vague curiosity; and she looked in my face with a sudden quick glance of something like suspicion which I could not understand.

"Do I look as if I expected something?" she said. "Yes—I expect some news that probably I shall not like. But it does not matter, my dear. It is nothing that affects me."

She said these words with a smile that was rather dreary to see. It was not like Lady Denzil. It was like saying, "So long as it does not affect me you know I don't care"—which was so very, very far from my opinion of her. I did not know what to answer. Her tone somehow disturbed the spring feeling, and the harmony of the flowers.

"I wish Sir Thomas had been here on such a lovely day," she said, after a while; "he enjoys it so. Peace is very pleasant, my dear, when you are old. You don't quite appreciate it yet, as we do." And then she paused again, and seemed to listen, and permitted herself the faintest little sigh.

"I think I am older than you, Lady Denzil," I said.

Then she laughed in her natural, soft way. "I dare say you are," she said. "That is the difference between your restless middle age and our oldness. You feel old because you feel young. That's how it is; whereas, being really old, we can afford to be young again—sometimes," she added, softly. The last word was said under her breath. I don't suppose she thought I heard it; but I did, being very quick of hearing, and very fond of her, and feeling there was something underneath which I did not know.

Just then there came a sound of wheels upon the road, and Lady Denzil started slightly. "You have put it into my head that Sir Thomas might come by the three o'clock train," she said. "It would be about time for it now." She had scarcely stopped speaking, and we had just turned toward the gate, when a carriage entered. I saw at once that it was one of the common flies that are to be had at the station, and that it was Sir Thomas who put his head out at the window. A moment after it stopped. He had seen Lady Denzil on the lawn. He got out with that slight hesitation which betrays an old man; and then he turned and lifted something out of the carriage. For the first moment one could not tell what it was—he made a long stride on to the soft green sward, with his eyes fixed upon Lady Denzil, and then he put down the child on the lawn. "Go to that lady," he said. For my part I stood and stared, knowing nothing of the feelings that might lie underneath. The child stood still, with her little serious face, and looked at us both for a moment, and then she walked steadily up to Lady Denzil, who had not moved. I was quite unprepared for what followed. Lady Denzil fell down on her knees on the grass—she took the child to her, into her arms, close to her breast. All at once she fell into a passion of tears. And yet that does not express what I saw. It was silent; there were no cries nor sobs, such as a young woman might have uttered. The tears fell as if they had been pent up all her life, as if all her life she had been waiting for this moment; while Sir Thomas stood looking on, half sad, half satisfied. It seemed a revelation to him, as it was to me. All this time, when she had looked so serene and had been so sweet, had she been carrying those tears in her heart? I think that must have been what was passing through Sir Thomas's mind. I had stood and stared, as one does when one is unexpectedly made the spectator of a crisis in another life. When I came to myself I was ashamed of spying as it were upon Lady Denzil's feelings. I hastened away, shaking hands with Sir Thomas as I passed him. And so entirely was his mind absorbed in the scene before him that I scarcely think he knew who I was.

After this it may be supposed I took a very great interest in little Mary. At first I was embarrassed and did not quite know what to do—whether I should go back next day and ask for the child, and give Lady Denzil an opportunity of getting over any confusion she might feel at the recollection that I had been present—or whether I should stay away; but it turned out that Lady Denzil was not half so sensitive as I was on the subject. I staid away for one whole day, thinking about little else—and the next day I went, lest they should think it strange. It seemed quite curious to me to be received as if nothing had happened. There was no appearance of any thing out of the ordinary course. When I went in Lady Denzil held out her hand to me as usual without rising from her chair. "What has become of you?" she said, and made me sit down by her, as she always did. After we had talked a while she rang the bell. "I have something to show you," she said, smiling. And then little Mary came in, in her little brown Holland overall, as if it was the most natural thing in the world. She was the most lovely child I ever saw. I know when I say this that every body will immediately think of a golden-haired, blue-eyed darling. But she was not of that description. Her hair was brown—not dark, but of the shade which grows dark with years; and it was very fine silky hair, not frizzy and rough as is the fashion nowadays. Her eyes were brown, too, of that tender, wistful kind which are out of fashion like the hair. Every look the child gave was an appeal. There are some children's eyes that look at you with perfect trust, believing in every body; and these are sweet eyes. But little Mary's were sweeter still, for they told you she believed in you. "Take care of me: be good to me—I trust you," was what they said; "not every body, but you." This was the expression in them; and I never knew any body who could resist that look. Then she had the true child's beauty of a lovely complexion, pure red and white. She came up to me, and looked at me with those tender, serious eyes, and then slid her soft little hand into mine. Even when I had ceased talking to her and petting her, she never took her eyes away from my face. It was the creature's way of judging of the new people among whom she had been brought—for she was only about six, too young to draw much insight from words. I was glad to bend my head over her, to kiss her sweet little face and smooth her pretty hair by way of hiding a certain embarrassment I felt. But I was the only one of the three that was embarrassed. Lady Denzil sat and looked at the child with eyes that seemed to run over with content. "She is going to stay with me, and take care of me," she said, with a smile of absolute happiness; "are not you, little Mary?"

"Yes, my lady," said the little thing, turning serious as a judge, to the old lady. I could not help giving a little start as I looked from one to the other, and saw the two pairs of eyes meet. Lady Denzil was near sixty, and little Mary was but six; but it was the same face; I felt quite confused after I had made this discovery, and sat silent and heard them talk to each other. Even in the little voice there was a certain trill which was like Lady Denzil's. Then the whole scene rushed before me. Lady Denzil on her knees, and her tears pouring forth and the child clasped in her arms. What did it mean? My lady was childless—and even had it been otherwise, that baby never could have been her child—who was she? I was so bewildered and surprised that it took from me the very power of speech.

After this strange introduction the child settled down as an inmate of the Lodge, and was seen and admired by every body. And every one discovered the resemblance. The neighbors on the Green all found it out, and as there was no reason we know of why she should not be Lady Denzil's relation, we all stated our opinion plainly—except perhaps myself. I had seen more than the rest, though that was almost nothing. I had a feeling that there was an unknown story beneath, and somehow I had not the courage to say to Lady Denzil as I sat there alone with her, perhaps, at a disadvantage, "How like the child is to you!" But other people were not so cowardly. Not long after, two or three of us met at the Lodge, at the hour of afternoon tea, which was an invention of the time which Lady Denzil had taken to very kindly. Among the rest was young Mrs. Plymley, who was not precisely one of us. She was one of the Herons of Marshfield, and she and her husband had taken Willowbrook for the summer. She was a pleasant little woman, but she was fond of talking—nobody could deny that. And she had children of her own, and made a great fuss over little Mary the moment she saw her. The child was too much a little lady to be disagreeable, but I could see she did not like to be lifted up on a stranger's knee, and admired and chattered over. "I wish my Ada was half as pretty," Mrs. Plymley said; "but Ada is so like her poor dear papa," and here she pretended to sigh. "I am so fond of pretty children. It is hard upon me to have mine so plain. Oh, you little darling! Mary What? you have not told me half your name. Lady Denzil, one can see in a moment she belongs to you."

Lady Denzil at the moment was pouring out tea. All at once the silver tea-pot in her hand seemed to give a jerk, as if it were a living creature, and some great big boiling drops fell on her black dress. It was only for a single second, and she had presence of mind to set it down, and smile and say she was awkward, and it was nothing. "My arm is always shaky when I hold any thing heavy," she said; "ever since I had the rheumatism in it." Then she turned to Mrs. Plymley, whose injudicious suggestion we had all forgotten in our fright. Perhaps Lady Denzil had lost her self-possession a little. Perhaps it was only that she thought it best to reply at once, so that every body might hear, "Belongs to me?" she said with her clear voice. And somehow we all felt immediately that something silly and uncalled-for had been said.

"I mean your side of the house," said poor Mrs. Plymley, abashed. She was young and nervous, and felt, like all the rest of us, that she was for the moment the culprit at the bar.

"She belongs to neither side of the house," said Lady Denzil, with even unnecessary distinctness. "Sir Thomas knows her people, and in his kindness he thought a change would be good for her. She is no—connection; nothing at all to us."

"Oh, I am sure I beg your pardon," said Mrs. Plymley; and she let little Mary slide down from her lap, and looked very uncomfortable. None of us indeed were at our ease, for we had all been saying it in private. Only little Mary, standing in the middle, looked wistful round upon us, questioning, yet undisturbed. And Lady Denzil, too, stood and looked. At that moment the likeness was stronger than ever.

"It is very droll," said Mrs. Damerel, the rector's wife, whose eye was caught by it, like mine. "She is very like you, Lady Denzil; I never saw an accidental likeness so strong."

"Poor little Mary! do you think she is like me?" said Lady Denzil, with a curious quiver in her voice; and she bent over the child all at once, and kissed her. Sir Thomas had been at the other end of the room, quite out of hearing. I don't know by what magnetism he could have known that something agitating was going on—I did not even see him approach or look; but all at once, just as his wife betrayed that strange thrill of feeling, Sir Thomas was at her elbow. He touched her arm quite lightly as he stood by her side.

"I should like some tea," he said. She stood up and looked at him for a moment, as if she did not understand. And then she turned to the tea-table with something like a blush of shame on her face. Then he drew forward a chair, and sat down by Mrs. Plymley and began to talk. He was a very good talker when he pleased, and in two seconds we had all wandered away to our several subjects, and were in full conversation again. But it was some time before Lady Denzil took any part in it. She was a long while pouring out those cups of tea. Little Mary, as if moved by some strange, unconscious touch of sympathy, stole away with her doll into a corner. It was as if the two had been made out of the same material and thrilled to the same touch—they both turned their backs upon us for the moment. I don't suppose any body but myself noticed this; and to be sure it was simply because I had seen the meeting between them, and knew there was something in it more than the ordinary visit to the parents' friends of a little delicate child.

Besides, the child never looked like a little visitor; she had brought no maid with her, and she spoke very rarely of her home. I don't know how she might be dressed under those brown Holland overalls, but these were the only outside garb she ever wore. I don't mean to say they were ugly or wanting in neatness; they were such things as the children at the Rectory wore in summer, when they lived in the garden and the fields. But they did not look suitable for the atmosphere of the Lodge. By-and-by these outer garments disappeared. The little creature blossomed out, as it were, out of her brown husk, and put forth new flowers. After the first few weeks she wore nothing but dainty white frocks, rich with needle-work. I recognized Lady Denzil's taste in every thing she put on. It was clear that her little wardrobe was being silently renewed, and every pretty thing which a child of her age could fitly wear was being added to it. This could never have been done to a little visitor who had come for change of air. Then a maid was got for her, whom Lady Denzil was very particular about; and no one ever spoke of the time when little Mary should be going away. By degrees she grew to belong to the place, to be associated with every thing in it. When you approached the house, which had always been so silent, perhaps it was a burst of sweet childish laughter that met your ears; perhaps a little song, or the pleasant sound of her little feet on the gravel in the sunny lime-walk. The servants were all utterly under her sway. They spoke of little Miss Mary as they might have spoken of a little princess whose word was law. As for Sir Thomas, I think he was the first subject in her realm. She took to patronizing and ordering him about before she had been a month at the Lodge. "Sir Thomas," she would say, in her clear little voice, "come and walk;" and the old gentleman would get up and go out with her, and hold wonderful conversations, as we could see, looking after them from the window. Lady Denzil did not seem either to pet her, or to devote herself to her, as all the rest of the house did. But there was something in her face when she looked at the child which passes description. It was a sort of ineffable content and satisfaction, as if she had all that heart could desire, and asked no more. Little Mary watched her eye whenever they were together with a curious sympathy more extraordinary still. She seemed to know by intuition when my lady wanted her. "Es, my lady," the child would say, watching with her sweet eyes. It was the only little divergence she made from correctness of speech, and somehow it pleased my ear. I suppose she said "My lady" because Sir Thomas did, and that I liked, too. To an old lady like Lady Denzil it is such a pretty title; I fell into it myself without being aware.

FRENCH DRESS-MAKERS.

IT would seem from the following anecdote that the complaint of exorbitant prices is not applicable to American modistes alone:

The other day, we understand, the Empress gave a select dinner-party to a few of her intimate lady friends. The conversation very naturally turned on fashions, and the guests set about criticising the prices of certain dress-makers, among others of the man-dress-maker so much in vogue.

"Oh, as to that I quite agree with you, ladies," said the Empress, smiling. "I will tell you of an experience which I have just had with him. I sent him some very rich material for a dress the other day, and you never can guess what he asked for making it up. What do you suppose his bill was?"

"A thousand francs," answered the lady to whom the question seemed addressed.

A shake of the head was the answer. "Fifteen hundred francs!" exclaimed another. The same reply was given. The guesses rose from one five hundred francs to another, until finally the ladies stopped at three thousand francs, not daring to go higher.

"Three thousand six hundred francs!" exclaimed the Empress. "I ordered him to be paid on the spot," she continued, in a stern tone, "and to be informed that it was the last thing he would make for me, for I was not rich enough to give him my custom any longer."

CAUTION AGAINST FIRE.

THE following rules, if borne in mind and acted on, will be sure to diminish accidental fires:

Never leave a candle burning at your bedside on a table when you go to bed.

If a light is required in a bedroom let it be a rush, wax, or floating light, placed in a basin on the floor, at a considerable distance from curtains or drapery of any kind; on the hearth is the best place.

If a piece of burning paper is used to light a candle see that it is properly extinguished before leaving it, as it will sometimes burst out on fire when it is supposed to be trampled out.

Chimneys should frequently be thoroughly swept. Soot will accumulate quickly, and much quicker with some sorts of coal than with others. Many a house has been burned down by the chimney catching fire.

If a chimney take fire the readiest means of extinguishing it is to apply a wet table-cloth, cover, or blanket to the whole front of the grate, from the mantle-piece down to the floor, and hold or pin it close into or against the jambs; when, if the bottom be lifted up sufficiently high to enable water to be thrown on the fire, to create a good cloud of steam to ascend the chimney, the fire will either be extinguished or very much reduced; and if a pistol be then fired up the chimney it will fetch down the soot in a very short time, and thus prevent any serious damage.

To extinguish a chimney on fire, throw upon the fire the contents of the kitchen salt-box or jar, and in a few seconds the flames will be extinguished; or throw into the fire-place one handful after another of flour of sulphur, which will paralyze, or in effect destroy, the flame.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

THE theatre just now is absorbing the attention of the elegant world. The announcement was made simultaneously of the representation of a new opera, which is always a great event to Parisians; the first appearance of a play at the Théâtre au Châtelet, which it was rumored would give rise to a political demonstration; and the début of two celebrated artists at the Théâtre Italien, so much frequented by our dilettanti.

I will begin with the opera—a grand opera by Ambroise Thomas, the successful author of the Midsommer Night's Dream, who having been once already happily inspired by Shakespeare, has again had recourse to this incomparable genius, and this time has attacked his master-piece, Hamlet. What boldness! Has the attempt been crowned with success? I might answer in the affirmative, did I judge by the applause; but justice requires me to add that the enthusiasm inspired by the piece on the first night was called forth in great part by the interpretation of the admirable artists, Mademoiselle Nilsson (Ophelia) and M. Faure (Hamlet). The success of Mademoiselle Nilsson exceeded every thing that has been seen for the last twenty-five years at the opera. We must go back to the début of Duprez and Mademoiselle Falcon to find any thing approaching this unheard-of ovation. Bouquets, wreaths, encores, cries of admiration—nothing was lacking the young songstress who had suddenly revealed herself a new Malibran. This creation of Ophelia has placed Mademoiselle Nilsson on a triumphal height in the estimation of many; in her presence Patti falls to the second rank. This praise is perhaps exaggerated, but it is fitting to make mention of it in order to give an idea of the prodigious effect produced by her début. Our best tenor, Faure, was worthy of this perfect Ophelia; he sang admirably, and well enacted his difficult part.

I do not consider this opera a master-piece. There are weak and tedious passages in the score, which seems to me to have exhausted the genius of M. Thomas. Nevertheless, a work of such importance needs to be heard several times before being judged irrevocably.

The government has contributed largely to the expense of producing the opera, which is brought out sumptuously. The costumes are magnificent, as a single detail will show: the lace alone (old point de Venise) with which the black velvet suit of the Prince of Denmark is trimmed cost the management seven hundred francs.

The auditorium was magnificent. Both the city and the court were there; the queens of all classes of society, even to the notabilities of the demi-monde. In a box between the pillars glittered, like a jeweler's window, the pink satin corsage of Madame Musard, literally covered with diamonds so fine and so large that whenever she moved their sparkle forcibly attracted all eyes. Not far from this exhibition the Princess Metternich presented a striking contrast with her black gros grain dress and her Marie Antoinette fichu of black tulle, trimmed with lace, and confined in the middle by a simple satin bow. It is true that the Princess, who possesses even finer jewels than Madame Musard, has other opportunities of displaying them than those afforded by a place of public amusement.

The Pompadour was the reigning style in all the dresses. A few young girls, however, wore corsages à l'Italienne or à la Raphaël; the first very low, and composed of a plastron, with bretelles of the same stuff as the dress, with a half-high under-waist, the whole skirted all round.

The under-waist is of white muslin or gauze. The Raphaël corsage is in the same style, except that the plastron is cut square instead of curving upward like the preceding. The distinctive character of these Italian corsages is that they always have long sleeves.

Two beautiful sisters, who are foreigners by birth, but who have become Parisians by visiting Paris every winter, completed this costume; they wore, with bretelle dresses of green gros grain and white muslin corsages trimmed with guipure, a sort of white veil, placed square on the top of the head, like the mezzaro of the Genoese women. The veil was finished with large gold-headed hair-pins, and around their neck they wore a necklace of large gold beads.

In general there were many black dresses, many white ones, and some of the changeable silks adopted by the élite of the fashionable world. A few women were lightly powdered, and almost all a little rouged. A great number wore excessively long curls behind.

The first representation of the play at the Châtelet presented a different kind of interest. The piece was taken from an historical event, the heroic defense of the ship Le Vengeur in the time of the first republic, and was said to contain political allusions that would be welcomed with acclamations by the opposition to the Government. It had long been kept back by the censorship, and the management had been ordered to suppress the cry of the crew at the moment when the ship goes down—"Long live the Republic!" It appears that it was through the intervention of the Emperor himself that this historic cry was finally authorized. The young men were eager to witness this representation, at which it was expected would be seen a political demonstration of the democracy. It was doubtless for this reason that few ladies were seen in the immense crowd which crowded the theatre. Two very beautiful personages of the official world, the Baroness de Bourgoing and the wife of General Henry, nevertheless bravely appeared in a front-box. As to the men, they were nearly all there: the officials, the Opposition, journalists, artists, etc. All these expectations were disappointed. The piece of MM. Bresebarre and Blum was tiresome, the allusions had disappeared, and the famous cry was lost in the hubbub of the discharge of cannon and the noise of the spectators. It must be added that the audience, in haste to reach the celebrated scene of the sinking ship, paid little attention to what preceded it, but shouted and groaned, while the spectators in the upper tiers hummed the Chant du départ, and chancing to spy Thérèse, the popular singer, in the hall, loudly called on her to sing the Marseillaise. The prima donna of our estaminets airily blew kisses from the tips of her fingers to her turbulent admirers; it was extricating herself gracefully from a difficult position. On the whole the evening may be styled, like Shakespeare's play, Much Ado about Nothing. The only result will be the fall of the piece, which certainly can not run long.

Lastly, at the Théâtre Italien was to be seen Mathilde de Shabran, one of the first operas of Rossini, which has been laid aside for several years. This revival was made in honor of the Tiberinis, who had come to Paris, preceded by a celebrity won in Italy. Here the hall was magnificent and the dresses extremely brilliant. Mademoiselle Patti, modestly placed in the third row of the proscenium boxes, several times applauded Madame Tiberini, who played and sang her rôle of Mathilde like an excellent cantatrice and a charming actress. Her success was complete, and she was encored and showered with bouquets. Her husband, M. Tiberini, sang very well, and with remarkable flexibility and method; but his voice is far from possessing the charm of that of his wife, and he did not obtain the same applause.

Madame Tiberini possesses the art of costumeing to a high degree; she wore in the last act the dress of a lady of the time of Charles VIII., which would make an exquisite disguise, and which resembles the present styles closely enough to be easily imitated. It was composed of a first short skirt of orange satin, trimmed with bands of chestnut velvet, bound with gold. The second skirt was of chestnut poul de soie, looped at the sides and behind, and adorned with chestnut and gold fringe. The high adjusted corsage was likewise of chestnut poul de soie, with large basque fronts, sharply pointed and bordered with chestnut and gold fringe. The sleeves were close, with velvet epaulets forming a bouffant around the arm. A small mantle of chestnut velvet lined with orange satin was adjusted behind on the shoulders; to this were attached revers with chestnut and gold passementerie. Her hair was curled, and on the front of her head, a little at the side, was set a little round hat of black velvet with a black aigrette. The dress was finished with a scarf of orange silk fastened on both shoulders.

Since I have pronounced the word epaulet I recur to it to say that epaulets, epaulières, jockeys, and all kinds of ornaments placed on the shoulder will be much in vogue. All dresses are already made à la Récamier, à l'Empire, à la Médici, etc. These styles, however, require detailed explanations, and will find a place in my next letter, in which I shall treat of the spring fashions.

ELIANE DE MARST.

ART IN COMMON THINGS.

PICTURE-FRAMES AND PAPER-HANGINGS.

IN all countries and all ages—even the most rude and barbarous—there appears to have existed in the human mind a powerful innate love for the exercise of ornamental art; and in proportion to the advancement of civilization, so does it become embodied in a deep religious and poetical feeling, bestowing an undefinable charm, which, though impossible for words to convey, the hand of the painter or sculptor, when guided by the poet's inspiration, can diffuse throughout all his works. Pure ideas, love, and devotion are thus beautifully revealed, and exhibit, in the loftiest sense, the paramount utility of art. Descending to a lower sphere, and taking a more business-like view of the question, it must be allowed that there are but few branches of trade in which the practical knowledge of drawing or modeling is not found more or less useful. The artisan who is deficient in such acquirements may manage to get over his work after a fashion; and the employer who is alike ignorant can convey but a very indefinite idea of whatever design he may desire to have carried out; whereas, if each were educated in the principles of ornamental art, a better understanding and more mutual feelings, conducive to the interests of both, would naturally exist.

That to have good taste is to have an expensive one is a very prevalent but mistaken notion. Any person who is supposed to possess that vague attribute is at once regarded as one who has at least the will, if not the means, to indulge in a lavish and foolish expenditure in order to surround himself with eye-pleasing forms and pleasant luxuries. The idea springs, as so many other false ideas spring, from our general and perverse misunderstanding of what art is, and our persistence in thinking that by wealth only can its objects be produced and the fine arts cherished.

True, the more elaborate manifestation of artistic excellence can not be produced without the aid of the liberal paymaster. But art is not necessarily confined to the production of these costly works. Its mission extends to many other things which come in the ordinary life of each one of us. And it is in these "common things"—things which we see wherever we go, and among which we live and have our being, that art ought to be, and may be constantly manifested, making all the familiar objects around us beautiful and good, and at once a pleasure to the eye and an enjoyment to the mind.

There is, indeed, in the present day, craving enough for ornament; but it is unfortunately an appetite which is utterly without discrimination, and which will accept any offer in the place of good food, even with thankfulness. So long as any object has a certain sort of gaudy richness about it, and is but marked over with a sufficient intricacy of line to confuse the eye, the ornament-buying public will purchase, and in reality admire it, by virtue of some extraordinary and inexplicable faculty. Indeed, so universal is the love of, and craving for embellishment, that people do not stop to consider whether the decoration they are purchasing is good; all they desire is that there be plenty of it. Thus we find even the commonest articles in domestic use overloaded with imperfect ornaments, not one of which has been wrought out either thoroughly or well. And yet, there is nothing more calculated to destroy any glimmering of perception in art that ordinary observers may possess, than the carelessness of design and dull stupidity of workmanship presented so constantly to our view.

THE PICTURE-FRAME

presents a good illustration of our poverty of thought in artistic matters. One year there is a rage for "neat" frames, and in some other season every body is buying "rich" ones; but, as a general rule, they are profusely ornamented, and such ornamentation is, as an equally general rule, meaningless and bad. The same frame which surrounds the picture of a martyr's death is chosen as the appropriate nimbus for the fashionable ballet-girl; and that which is considered as peculiarly fitted for a prize ox is thought quite as fitting to surround the record of some deed of love or heroism.

But frames are ordered according to their size and profusion of ornament, and not in accordance with the subjects they are intended to contain; and so the ornament bestowed upon them is seldom given with any other idea than that miserable one of producing an appearance of richness and money's worth. When we buy a good picture or engraving we might at least take a little trouble to insure its being framed appropriately. Buyers of gilt frames should see the frame before the gold is put upon it, for there is so great a charm in gilding that it may distort even a good judgment, and lead to choosing that for the sake of the gold which, without the brilliant covering, would at once have been rejected as vulgar and base. Now, as pictures generally insure careful attention, an appropriate degree of ornament about the frames would be sure to challenge observation, and the carver's or modeler's work would have a fair chance of being seen and admired. Frames are also peculiarly adapted for decoration on account of their size and general shape, and if we would but rightly use the faculties with which we are naturally endowed it surely would be seen what lovely and appropriate ornamentation might be introduced in this one small field.

But it is hopeless to expect any thing good from the producers of unnatural ornament. We require those who will feel that the highest praise their work can receive is when it is admired for its truth; those who will be content to hear but little of their own skill and dexterity, and find that the very highest class of work destroys the evidences of its own presence, and that the crown of toil is attained in the perfect naturalness of the design; those who will be content to lose their individuality for the sake of their art, and weigh as utterly nothing a little passing notoriety, compared with the cause and interests of truth. So much for picture-frames. Now for a few words about

PAPER-HANGINGS.

The public taste has made the choice of paper-hangings so much a matter of almost religious belief that the subject must be approached as tenderly as an affair of conscience. There is a law unalterable as that of the Medes and Persians, and obeyed as implicitly, which dictates the kind of paper that is right for one room and wrong for another; so that if you wake up any man or woman in the middle of the night, and by dint of shaking or any other method of mild persuasion make them conscious that you want some information about paper-hangings, they will murmur, "dark and warm for the dining-room, and very light for the parlor," and then fall pleasantly to sleep again. For that is our national belief in paper-hangings; we leave all the rest to the manufacturer.

Let us think, now, what are the uses of paper-hangings. They are threefold; and have either one, or two, or all these objects to fulfill: that is, they have either to decorate the walls, or to form a good ground for the pictures upon them, or to furnish a suitable back-ground to the occupants of the room.

The latter is seldom thought of, and yet, of all others, it is but reasonable to suppose that it should first be decided whether the walls or the inmates most demand attention; whether the walls are to detract from beauty or tend to heighten it, and in accordance with the decision so must be the tone of the paper chosen. It requires little observation to discover that modern sitting-rooms are generally furnished with the most reckless disregard of those who are likely to frequent them; and the universal light-colored paper is admirably adapted to that excellent end—the mortification of the flesh, although such is hardly the intention.

Unfortunately, people purchase paper-hangings as so many other things are purchased, for the sake of their own real or imaginary prettiness, and without sufficient consideration of the relative position they are ultimately to hold, and in forgetfulness that what in the store looks tasteful may wear a very different aspect when it comes to be mixed with other things as bright as itself and probably more prominent. Thus, many persons are puzzled to account for the fact that, pleased as they were with each separate thing as they purchased it, their acquisitions look any thing but admirable when placed in their respective positions.

Let the people study art for themselves; so will they learn how to discriminate between the false and the true; and thus will they secure appropriate design and legitimate treatment of both form and color in those "common things" which it is the province of art to decorate, but which, through the exercise of a depraved taste, art far too often carelessly ignores.

HOW TO FIND A HUSBAND.

DOUBLE blessedness is better than single; but blessedness of any sort is better than the double wretchedness of being the companion for life of a man who is unsuitable to you, or to whom you are unsuitable. Your proper study is to make yourself the best possible wife for your best possible husband, by educating your soul and mind and body to the best of your abilities. If you have not the good fortune to find a man whom you can love, respect, comfort, and be useful to, you will, at the worst, have put yourself in the way of being a more amiable, respectable, and comfortable old maid than you would be if you neglected so to educate yourself.

There are two main and typical methods in which "Cœlebs' wives set out in quest of lovers," which differ, toto cœlo, as well as toto cœlebi. The first method, the one to avoid, is the way to catch a fool; and, failing that happy result, to be a superannuated flirt, than which there is probably no more miserable and contemptible position on the face of the earth. It is done by concealing your ignorance instead of replacing it by knowledge; by arraying yourself in the smiles of flattery and the languishing airs and graces of a susceptibility too ready and too general to be quite modest; and by playing over and over again to a succession of heroes silly enough to play the fool with you, the stale and weary part of the jeune ingenuë, with gushing emotions and impulsive affections. The disadvantage of this performance is, that it is only pretty and interesting once in a lifetime—and that once at a rather tender age. It degenerates by repetition. It educates you to nothing, if it does not degrade you to something worse than nothing. It sinks you slowly in your own esteem, and very rapidly in every body else's. It creates in you a morbid want of admiration from the other sex, which, as it ebbs away from you, you will be tempted to lay yourself out for with less and less of maiden reserve; or, not to mince the matter, with more and more of brazen effrontery. In short, this is the way not to do it.

And now for the way to do it. The secret is very simple, but its application is as wide as truth. You must as much as in you lies strive to suppress your natural desire of making yourself an object of interest to others, and overlay this propensity with the faculty and the habit of taking a real interest in the thoughts and characters and experiences of your fellow-creatures.

There is something to learn from every human being with whom you come in contact. Make it your study to find what special knowledge, what generous sentiment, what noble aspiration there may be in the next person with whom you become acquainted. Tolerate this person's faults, repress your impulse to obstruct his egotism by the display of your own abilities; pass by opinions you could vigorously and perhaps successfully combat; wait till you can respond to something with which you cordially sympathize. Many a character which seems unsympathetic and unpromising at first, thaws in the absence of opposition, and in the presence of sympathy. When you have succeeded in a few crucial experiments of extracting useful knowledge and human interest out of persons whom, without this effort, you might have voted dull and disagreeable, you will find how much an analogous method of treatment will enhance the pleasure you derive from those whom, without any effort of self-suppression at all, you would have found clever and agreeable.

Let us suppose you are seated at a dinner-party next to a man who, without being deficient in such lively small talk as will keep an average commonplace young lady in pretty brisk conversation, you know to be of good capacity and well informed. The conversation glances on some topic of serious interest, on which you feel yourself to be so ignorant that you can not venture to discuss it on equal terms without a moral certainty of floundering out of your depth. There are three courses for you to pursue. If you are absolutely foolish, you will express some borrowed opinion, some crude formula of commonplace and stale wisdom, the best you have in your limited armory, in opposition to the view hinted at, and allow yourself to be drawn into a pert, superficial mock argument, in which your neighbor may amuse himself by drawing out your self-sufficient imbecility to the utmost; after which you will neither of you like one another the better. If you are half wise, you will slip out of the danger by some not too violent piece of colloquial legerdemain, giving the go-by to the topic. But if you are really wise, you will take the opportunity of putting a modest and intelligent question, which will show that you are neither too vain nor too stupid to desire to learn. Do not be afraid of being troublesome. No capable and instructed man finds it wearisome to communicate facts or theories which he has at the tip of his tongue to a nice young lady who takes an interest in listening to him.

Do not pretend, with a puzzled attempt at a perspicacious expression of countenance, to comprehend admirably an exposition which flies miles over your head. At all hazards learn something. Your friend will, at least, admire your candor, modesty, and courage, and appreciate your desire to learn. Every blank you fill will make it easier to you to take an interest in higher ranges of conversation, and fit you more and more for the society of higher classes of intelligence. The power of taking interest implies the gift of awakening interest. All progress is interesting. There are country gentlemen who can take an interest in looking over a gate day by day to observe the growth of turnips; that is but a low form of progress. A teachable child is more interesting than many turnip fields, and a teachable woman, with bright eyes, who "improves each shining hour," not only has many chances in the year of finding a sensible husband, but has many years to do it in. She grows old so much more slowly than the flit; her mind brightens as her complexion fades. Indeed, the power of mind over matter will go farther than this. I have known girls who were positively plain at twenty grow comparatively good-looking at thirty; but then they had been making themselves agreeable in the very best fashion all their lives.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

APRIL is a month which brings good luck to milliners and dress-makers, but plays a great many tricks with their customers. Many a gossamer bonnet which goes out for its walk gay and beautiful, returns in a ruined condition; and the dress that went forth crisp and spotless, comes home clinging in folds like a wet umbrella. If you prepare for rain in April, it will probably be fine; and if you put on any thing that can spoil, the showers will surely come. And yet April showers are not to be scolded about—in fact they are excellent things. If they happen inopportunely we can slip into a restaurant, and regale ourselves with an ice-cream or some other trifle, until the drops cease; but if they were omitted altogether from the programme of the month, we of the city would be smothered with the dust, which rises and falls, flies, floats, and settles, like a vast cloud of smoke, brooding over us during many days, which are thus made uncomfortable and unwholesome. It is really a great pity that during April, when every feeling and instinct prompts us to healthful exercise in the open air, the accumulated filth of the streets in winter should be suffered to permeate our skin, fill our eyes, penetrate our lungs, and render our garments generally uncomfortable and disagreeable. By the middle of May we hope to have streets and avenues cleaned and watered; but just at present every body who wants a comfortable promenade flocks into Fifth Avenue, which is swept and garnished and sprinkled.

April has plenty of work to do in the country, drying up the mud which the snow has left, quickening the sap in tree and shrub, unfolding the tender leaf-bud, and even bringing to sweet maturity that earliest of spring blossoms, the trailing arbutus. Have you never roamed among forest trees on a sunny April day, and coming to a sheltered southern slope, stooped and brushed away the dead leaves of last year to discover the fragrant pink and white blossoms hidden beneath? And how fresh and fair the tiny flowers look, nestling in their warm bed secure from rude winds and chilling frosts, yet ready to yield their perfume to the first invader of their retreat! No wonder they are called "Darlings of the Forest."

"Fringed with color faintly,
Like the morning sky;
Or more pale and saintly,
Wrapped in leaves ye lie,
Even as children sleep in faith's simplicity."

A Mormon elder, lecturing in the Salt Lake Tabernacle recently, thus discourages the practice of importing dress goods:

Let us inaugurate a system of fashions of our own. I do not care about the shape of our hats and bonnets, so long as they are of our own manufacture. I would just as soon a man should wear a bellows hat or a stove-pipe as any thing else, if it please him; but I say, encourage home manufactures. I do not care whether the ladies wear a bunch of flowers, a cabbage leaf, a squash, or a saucer on their heads, if it pleases them; but let it be made at home. I would recommend the brethren and sisters to establish societies for the promotion of home manufactures.

In a certain section of Paris there is a man of practical benevolence, whose singular life is not generally known. He has constituted himself the guardian of homeless canines and felines. Friendless pussies and dinnerless dogs leap for joy at his approach. About one o'clock in the morning, when it is high change among the bow-wows, and the cats are holding their balls, he comes forth loaded with such provisions as they like, calling them in his tenderest voice. They gather around him with frantic joy, meowing, pawing, leaping, flourishing their tails, and rubbing against him. When the benevolent man opens his bundle a scene begins which beggars description. This eccentric cat-and-dog feeder employs a cook in his house for the express purpose of preparing food for his wild pets.

At a recent ball in Paris it is related that an elegantly dressed lady found herself wearing only the string of her necklace, the delicate wax pearls having melted away in the heat. MORAL: Wear "wax pearls" only in cold weather and in cold rooms.

An ingenious device has been invented by which persons sitting inside their own houses can see every thing that is passing on the street for many squares in both directions. It is a simple arrangement of two mirrors placed at right angles to each other and set in a frame. Placed in the proper position it will even show who is at the front-door bell, a matter of no small convenience in these days of troublesome peddlers, importunate beggars, and intruders generally. But its most interesting employment is for the use of invalids who can not look out of the window, and who still would like the monotony of the sick-room to be relieved by a sight of what is going on in the street. For this use it is admirable. It is called the "window reflector," and is both simple in construction and inexpensive in cost.

Report says that the entire oratorio of the "Creation" was lately performed in the little town of Natick, Massachusetts, with great credit by the children of the place. That town probably has a greater amount of musical talent, in proportion to its population, than any other community in New England. A house without a piano is the exception rather than the rule. Musical associations have flourished there for many years.

Beauty is very much a matter of fashion after all—a great pity it is too. The Arabian ladies stain their fingers red, their eyebrows black, and their lips blue. In Persia they paint a black streak around the eyes, which doubtless is quite as ornamental as patches of court-plaster. Japanese ladies gild their teeth, and Indians paint them red. In Greenland women color their faces yellow and blue, while in Hindostan, if they desire to appear particularly lovely, they anoint themselves with a mixture of saffron, tumeric, and oil. In New Holland they cut themselves, keep the wounds open a long while, and deem the deep scars highly ornamental. In China small round eyes, as well as small feet, and immensely long finger-nails are the style. The Turks admire red hair, but the Persians can not endure it. In certain countries the nose and lips are pierced, and ornaments inserted—a custom akin to that of boring the ears. Among some nations mothers carefully flatten their daughters' noses, while other mothers subject the skulls of their young children to a continual pressure, thus to give them new beauty—neither of which practices are probably more unnatural than the application of tight corsets. And so the world goes. Every nation is inclined to regard the fashions of other nations, and their standard of beauty, as very strange and grotesque.

A Utica journal relates an incident which is much more piquant than probable. However, it is a very good story to tell, and the inventor of it deserves much credit. One Sunday evening—so the tale goes—at one of the most fashionable churches, while the sermon was being delivered, a lady deliberately removed her hat, and took down her back hair by the usual operation of removing the comb and taking out, one by one, seventy or eighty hair-pins. The raven locks then fell upon her shoulders, and the people, instead of attending to the sermon, looked for the next movement. It came in several quiet, satisfactory, enjoying movements of the comb down the back of the head and through the hair. The hair was then gathered in both hands, dextrously retwisted, the comb inserted, those seventy-five hair-pins replaced, one by one, the short hairs on the neck tucked under, and finally the hat was resumed, and then the lady turned her attention to the minister. Possible, but scarcely probable. And while on the subject of hair we may as well remark that somebody, who doubtless is posted on the subject, says that coloring the hair in streaks is the latest style out. It is called the Zebra mode, and one person's hair is made to exhibit regular stripes of red, golden, brown, flaxen, black, and so on, showing as many different hues as fancy can desire or ingenuity produce. Each fashionable woman will be rainbow-coiffured.

A recent writer on Italian society—Monsieur Taine—gives a sad picture of the prevailing ignorance in Italy. He remarks:

"Alongside of indolence, ignorance flourishes like thistles by the side of nettles. I am told of a noble family who live in two and let five rooms; from this they derive their income. Out of four daughters one only is able to write a note, and she is called 'the learned.' The father and son frequent a cafe, drink a glass of pure water, and read a newspaper; such is their life. The young man has no future; fortunate is he if he can obtain any situation which will bring him in six crowns a month. There is no commerce, no manufactures, no army; and the people dare not seek their fortunes outside their country, the police closing and locking the door on all who go out. In regard to young ladies, they are kept shut up, but are always trying to have liberty. Their life consists of quietly boasting of their lovers—that is to say, of some young man who is thinking about them, who courts them, who stations himself under their window, and so on. This tickles their imagination and supplies the place of a romance; instead of reading novels they act them. In this way they undergo five or six love experiences before marriage."

When Henry Ward Beecher becomes Pope he proposes to issue a bull which will embrace many important and stringent regulations. We will only quote a couple of them, which really seem to be the beginning and ending of the whole:

"First—Every man shall be married by the age of twenty-five, or show good cause for neglect of duty.
"Fourth—It shall be the duty of every young married man to read aloud to his wife at least one hour a day for the first ten years after his marriage. But this shall not be construed to the prejudice of the wife's right to read, speak, lecture, etc."

A gentleman of Baltimore has been experimenting on potatoes, with reference to preserving them nice and fresh for an indefinite time. It seems that nobody before ever thought of drying potatoes as we dry apples, peaches, and sundry other eatables. And the sweet potato, especially, very soon loses its best qualities, and is unfit for use. But this gentleman to whom we allude says he has succeeded in preserving the potato simply by drying it, so that a dish of the best quality can be had at any period of the year, as fresh and dry and sweet as though newly dug. He proposes to introduce his plan of curing and drying the sweet potato into the South.

A couple of curious incidences recently occurred in churches. One was in Connecticut, where the young people of a certain town gave an amateur dramatic exhibition in their church representing the tragedy of David and Goliath. Goliath could readily be distinguished from David by his first lieutenant's uniform, while David could in turn be recognized by being taller than the Philistine giant by about three inches. The curtain was drawn to allow the shepherd lad to sling his antagonist, but receded in time for the spectators to see the prostrate form of the Philistine borne from the arena by sundry Israelites in dress coats. The other incident occurred on a Sunday, when an Illinois clergyman opened the morning services by reading at length a very full and correct local price-current—how much flour, butter, meat, lard, eggs, etc., were worth, and the price of shoes, cloth, prints, and muslins. He read the report without explanation or comment. But the congregation took the hint, and responded with a liberal donation.

CORD AND CREESE;

OR,

THE BRANDON MYSTERY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB."

CHAPTER XLV.

BEATRICE'S JOURNAL CONCLUDED.

September 7, 1849.—[This part begins with a long account of her escape, her fortunes at Holby and London, and her recapture, which is here omitted, as it would be to a large extent a repetition of what has already been stated.]—After Brandon left me my heart still throbbed with the fierce impulse which he had imparted to it. For the remainder of the day I was upheld by a sort of consciousness of his presence. I felt as though he had only left me in person and had surrounded me in some way with his mysterious protection.

Night came, and with the night came gloom. What availed his promise? Could he prevent what I feared? What power could he possibly have in this house? I felt deserted, and my old despair returned.

In the morning I happened to cross the hall to go to Mrs. Compton's room, when, to my amazement, I saw standing outside the Hindu Asgeelo. Had I seen Brandon himself I could scarcely have been more amazed or overjoyed. He looked at me with a warning gesture.

"How did you get here?" I whispered.

"My master sent me."

A thrill passed through my veins.

"Do not fear," he said, and walked mysteriously away.

I asked Mrs. Compton who he was, and she said he was a new servant whom He had just hired. She knew nothing more of him.

September 12.—A week has passed. Thus far I have been left alone. Perhaps they do not know what to do with me. Perhaps they are busy arranging some dark plan.

Can I trust? Oh, Help of the helpless, save me!

Asgeelo is here—but what can one man do? At best he can only report to his master my agony or my death. May that Death soon come. Kindly will I welcome him.

September 15.—Things are certainly different here from what they used to be. The servants take pains to put themselves in my way, so as to show me profound respect. What is the meaning of this? Once or twice I have met them in the hall and have marked their humble bearing. Is it mockery? Or is it intended to entrap me? I will not trust any of them. Is it possible that this can be Brandon's mysterious power?

Impossible. It is rather a trick to win my confidence. But if so, why? They do not need to trick me. I am at their mercy.

I am at their mercy, and am without defense. What will become of me? What is to be my fate?

Philips has been as devoted as ever. He leaves me flowers every day. He tries to show sympathy. At least I have two friends here—Philips and Asgeelo. But Philips is timid, and Asgeelo is only one against a crowd. There is Vijal—but I have not seen him.

September 25.—To-day in my closet I found a number of bottles of different kinds of medicine, used while I was sick. Two of these attracted my attention. One was labeled "Laudanum," another was labeled "Hydrocyanic Acid—Poison." I suppose they used these drugs for my benefit at that time. The sight of them gave me more joy than any thing else that I could have found.

When the time comes which I dread I shall not be without resource. These shall save me.

October 3.—They leave me unmolested. They are waiting for some crushing blow, no doubt. Asgeelo sometimes meets me, and makes signs of encouragement.

To-day Philips met me and said: "Don't fear—the crisis is coming." I asked what he meant. As usual he looked frightened and hurried away.

What does he mean? What crisis? The only crisis that I can think of is one which fills me with dread. When that comes I will meet it firmly.

October 10.—Mrs. Compton told me to-day that Philips had gone to London on business. The poor old thing looked very much troubled. I urged her to tell me what was the matter, but she only looked the more terrified. Why she should feel alarm about the departure of Philips for London I can not imagine. Has it anything to do with me? No. How can it? My fate, whatever it is, must be wrought out here in this place.

October 14.—The dreaded crisis has come at last. Will not this be my last entry? How can I longer avoid the fate that impends?

This afternoon He sent for me to come down. I went to the dining-room expecting some horror, and I was not disappointed. The three were sitting there as they had sat before, and I thought that there was trouble upon their faces. It was only two o'clock, and they had just finished lunch.

John was the first to speak. He addressed me in a mocking tone.

"I have the honor to inform you," said he, "that the time has arrived when you are to be taken down."

I paid no attention whatever to these words. I felt calm. The old sense of superiority came over me, and I looked at Him without a tremor.

My tyrant glanced at me with a dark scowl. "After your behavior, girl, you ought to bless your lucky stars that you got off as you did. If I had done right, I'd have made you pay up well for the trouble you've given. But I've spared you. At the same time I wouldn't have done so long. I was just arranging a nice little plan for your benefit when this gentleman"—nodding his head to Clark—"this gentleman saved me the trouble."

I said nothing.

"Come, Clark, speak up—it's your affair—"

"Oh, you manage it," said Clark. "You've got the 'gift of gab.' I never had it."

"I never in all my born days saw so bold a man as timid with a girl as you are."

"He's doin' what I shouldn't like to try on," said John.

"See here," said my tyrant, sternly, "this gentleman has very kindly consented to take charge of you. He has even gone so far as to consent to marry you. He will actually make you his wife. In my opinion he's crazy, but he's got his own ideas. He has promised to give you a tip-top wedding. If it had been left to me," he went on, sternly, "I'd have let you have something very different, but he's a soft-hearted fellow, and is going to do a foolish thing. It's lucky for you though. You'd have had a precious hard time of it with me, I tell you. You've got to be grateful to him; so come up here, and give him a kiss, and thank him."

So prepared was I for any horror that this did not surprise me.

"Do you hear?" he cried, as I stood motionless. I said nothing.

"Do as I say, d—n you, or I'll make you."

"Come," said Clark, "don't make a fuss about the wench now—it'll be all right. She'll like kissing well enough, and be only too glad to give me one before a week."

"Yes, but she ought to be made to do it now."

"Not necessary, Johnnie; all in good time."

My master was silent for some moments. At last he spoke again:

"Girl," said he. "You are to be married to-morrow. There won't be any invited guests, but you needn't mind that. You'll have your husband, and that's more than you deserve. You don't want any new dresses. Your ball dress will do."

"Come, I won't stand that," said Clark.

"She's got to be dressed up in tip-top style. I'll stand the damage."

"Oh, d—n the damage. If you want that sort of thing, it shall be done. But there won't be time."

"Oh well, let her fix up the best way she can."

At this I turned and left the room. None of them tried to prevent me. I went up to my chamber, and sat down thinking. The hour had come.

This is my last entry. My only refuge from horror unspeakable is the Poison.

Perhaps one day some one will find my journal where it is concealed. Let them learn from it what anguish may be endured by the innocent.

May God have mercy upon my soul! Amen.

October 14, 11 o'clock.—Hope!

Mrs. Compton came to me a few minutes since. She had received a letter from Philips by Asgeelo. She said the Hindu wished to see me. He was at my door. I went there. He told me that I was to fly from Brandon Hall at two o'clock in the morning. He would take care of me. Mrs. Compton said she was to go with me. A place had been found where we could get shelter.

Oh my God, I thank thee! Already when I heard this I was mixing the draught. Two o'clock was the hour on which I had decided for a different kind of flight.

Oh God! deliver the captive. Save me, as I put my trust in thee! Amen.

CHAPTER XLVI.

THE LAST ESCAPE.

THE hour which Beatrice had mentioned in her diary was awaited by her with feverish impatience. She had confidence in Asgeelo, and this confidence was heightened by the fact that Mrs. Compton was going to accompany her. The very timidity of this poor old creature would have prevented her from thinking of escape on any ordinary occasion; but now the latter showed no fear. She evinced a strange exultation. He showed Philips's letter to Beatrice, and made her read it over and over again. It contained only a few words.

"The time has come at last. I will keep my word to you, dear old woman. Be ready to-night to leave Brandon Hall and those devils forever. The Hindu will help you."

"EDGAR."

Mrs. Compton seemed to think far more of the letter than of escaping. The fact that she had a letter seemed to absorb all her faculties, and no other idea entered her mind. Beatrice had but few preparations to make; a small parcel contained all with which she dared to encumber herself. Hastily making it up she waited in extreme impatience for the time.

At last two o'clock came. Mrs. Compton was in her room. There was a faint tap at the door. Beatrice opened it. It was Asgeelo. The Hindu stood with his finger on his lips, and then moved away slowly and stealthily. They followed.

The Hindu led the way, carrying a small lantern. He did not show any very great caution, but moved with a quiet step, thinking it sufficient if he made no noise. Beatrice followed, and Mrs. Compton came last, carrying nothing but the note from Philips, which she clutched in her hand as though she esteemed it the only thing of value which she possessed.

In spite of Beatrice's confidence in Asgeelo she felt her heart sink with dread as she passed through the hall and down the great stairway. But no sound disturbed them. The lights were all out, and the house was still. The door of the dining-room was open, but no light shone through. Asgeelo led the way to the north door. They went on quietly without any interruption, and at last reached it. Asgeelo turned the key and held the door half open for a moment. Then he turned and whispered to them to go out.

Beatrice took two or three steps forward, when suddenly a dark figure emerged from the stairway that led to the servants' hall and with a sudden spring advanced to Asgeelo.

The latter dropped the lamp, which fell with a rattle on the floor but still continued burning. He drew a long, keen knife from his breast, and seized the other by the throat.

Beatrice started back. By the light that flickered on the floor she saw it all. The gigantic figure of Asgeelo stood erect, one arm clutching the throat of his assailant, and the other holding the knife aloft.

Beatrice rushed forward and caught the up-lifted arm.

"Spare him!" she said, in a low whisper. "He is my friend. He helped me to escape once before."

She had recognized Vijal.

The Hindu dropped his arm and released his hold. The Malay staggered back and looked earnestly at Beatrice. Recognizing her, he fell on his knees and kissed her hand.

"I will keep your secret," he murmured.

Beatrice hurried out, and the others followed. They heard the key turn in the door after them. Vijal had locked it from the inside.

Asgeelo led the way with a swift step. They went down the main avenue, and at length reached the gate without any interruption. The gates were shut.

Beatrice looked around in some dread for fear of being discovered. Asgeelo said nothing, but tapped at the door of the porter's lodge. The door soon opened, and the porter came out. He said nothing, but opened the gates in silence.

They went out. The huge gates shut behind them. They heard the key turn in the lock. In her excitement Beatrice wondered at this, and saw that the porter must also be in the secret. Was this the work of Brandon?

They passed down the road a little distance, and at length reached a place where there were two coaches and some men.

One of these came up and took Mrs. Compton. "Come, old woman," said he; "you and I are to go in this coach." It was too dark to see who it was; but the voice sounded like that of Philip. He led her into the coach and jumped in after her.

There was another figure there. He advanced in silence, and motioned to the coach without a word. Beatrice followed; the coach door was opened, and she entered. Asgeelo mounted the box. The stranger entered the coach and shut the door.

Beatrice had not seen the face of this man; but at the sight of the outline of his figure a strange, wild thought came to her mind. As he seated himself by her side a thrill passed through every nerve. Not a word was spoken.

He reached out one hand, and caught hers in a close and fervid clasp. He threw his arm about her waist, and drew her toward him. Her head sank in a delicious languor upon his breast; and she felt the fast throbbing of his heart as she lay there. He held her pressed closely for a long while, drawing quick and heavy breaths, and not speaking a word. Then he smoothed her brow, stroked her hair, and caressed her cheek. Every touch of his made her blood tingle.

"Do you know who I am?" said at last a well-known voice.

She made no answer, but pressed his hand and nestled more closely to his heart.

The carriages rushed on swiftly. They went through the village, passed the inn, and soon entered the open country. Beatrice, in that moment of ecstasy, knew not and cared not whither they were going. Enough that she was with him.

"You have saved me from a fate of horror," said she, tremulously; "or rather, you have prevented me from saving myself."

"How could you have saved yourself?"

"I found poison."

She felt the shudder that passed through his frame. He pressed her again to his heart, and sat for a long time in silence.

"How had you the heart to let me go back when you could get me away so easily?" said she, after a time, in a reproachful tone.

"I could not save you then," answered he, "without open violence. I wished to defer that for the accomplishment of a purpose which you know. But I secured your safety, for all the servants at Brandon Hall are in my pay."

"What! Vijal too?"

"No, not Vijal; he was incorruptible; but all the others. They would have obeyed your slightest wish in any respect. They would have shed their blood for you, for the simple reason that I had promised to pay each man an enormous sum if he saved you from any trouble. They were all on the look out. You never were so watched in your life. If you had chosen to run off every man of them would have helped you, and would have rejoiced at the chance of making themselves rich at the expense of Potts. Under these circumstances I thought you were safe."

"And why did you not tell me?"

"Ah! love, there are many things which I must not tell you."

He sighed. His sombre tone brought back her senses which had been wandering. She struggled to get away. He would not release her.

"Let me go!" said she. "I am of the accursed brood—the impure ones! You are polluted by my touch!"

"I will not let you go," returned he, in a tone of infinite sweetness. "Not now. This may be our last interview. How can I let you go?"

"I am pollution."

"You are angelic. Oh, let us not think of other things. Let us banish from our minds the thought of that barrier which rises between us. While we are here let us forget every thing except that we love one another. To-morrow will come, and our joy will be at an end forever. But you, darling, will be saved! I will guard you to my life's end, even though I can not come near you."

Tears fell from Beatrice's eyes. He felt them hot upon his hand. He sighed deeply.

"I am of the accursed brood!—the accursed!—the accursed! You dishonor your name by touching me."

Brandon clung to her. He would not let her go. She wept there upon his breast, and still murmured the words, "Accursed! accursed!"

Their carriage rolled on; behind them came the other; on for mile after mile, round the bays and creeks of the sea, until at last they reached a village.

"This is our destination," said Brandon.

"Where are we?" sighed Beatrice.

"It is Denton," he replied.

The coach stopped before a little cottage. Asgeelo opened the door. Brandon pressed Beatrice to his heart.

"For the last time, darling," he murmured.

She said nothing. He helped her out, catching her in his arms as she descended, and lifting her to the ground. Mrs. Compton was already waiting, having descended first. Lights were burning in the cottage window.

"This is your home for the present," said Brandon. "Here you are safe. You will find every thing that you want, and the servants are faithful. You may trust them."

"THE GIGANTIC FIGURE OF ASGELO STOOD ERECT, ONE ARM CLUTCHING THE THROAT OF HIS ASSAILANT, AND THE OTHER HOLDING THE KNIFE ALOFT."

He shook hands with Mrs. Compton, pressed the hand of Beatrice, and leaped into the coach. "Good-by," he called, as Asgeelo whipped the horses.

"Good-by forever," murmured Beatrice through her tears.

CHAPTER XLVII. ROUSED AT LAST.

ABOUT this time Despard received a call from Langhetti. "I am going away," said the latter, after the preliminary greetings. "I am well enough now to resume my search after Beatrice."

"Beatrice?"

"Yes."

"What can you do?"

"I haven't an idea; but I mean to try to do something."

Langhetti certainly did not look like a man who was capable of doing very much, especially against one like Potts. Thin, pale, fragile, and emaciated, his slender form seemed ready to yield to the pressure of the first fatigue which he might encounter. Yet his resolution was strong, and he spoke confidently of being able in some mysterious way to effect the escape of Beatrice. He had no idea how he could do it. He had exerted his strongest influence, and had come away discomfited. Still he had confidence in himself and trust in God, and with these he determined to set out once more, and to succeed or perish in the attempt.

After he had left Despard sat moodily in his study for some hours. At last a visitor was announced. He was a man whom Despard had never seen before, and who gave his name as Wheeler.

The stranger on entering regarded Despard for some time with an earnest glance in silence. At last he spoke:

"You are the son of Lionel Despard, are you not?"

"Yes," said Despard, in some surprise.

"Excuse me for alluding to so sad an event; but you are, of course, aware of the common story of his death."

"Yes," replied Despard, in still greater surprise.

"That story is known to the world," said the stranger. "His case was publicly tried at Manila, and a Malay was executed for the crime."

"I know that," returned Despard, "and I know, also, that there were some, and that there still are some, who suspect that the Malay was innocent."

"Who suspected this?"

"My uncle Henry Despard and myself."

"Will you allow me to ask you if your suspicions pointed at any one?"

"My uncle hinted at one person, but he had nothing more than suspicions."

"Who was the man?"

"A man who was my father's valet, or agent, who accompanied him on that voyage, and took an active part in the conviction of the Malay."

"What was his name?"

"John Potts."

"Where does he live now?"

"In Brandon."

which goes by the name of Coffin Island. It is so called on account of a rock of peculiar shape at the eastern extremity. I was coming from the East, on my way to England, when a violent storm arose, and I was cast ashore alone upon that island. This may seem extraordinary to you, but what I have to tell is still more extraordinary. I found food and water there, and lived for some time. At last another hurricane came and blew away all the sand from a mound at the western end. This mound had been piled about a wrecked vessel—a vessel wrecked twenty years ago, twenty years ago," he repeated, with startling emphasis, "and the name of that vessel was the Vishnu."

"The Vishnu!" cried Despard, starting to his feet, while his whole frame was shaken by emotion at this strange narrative. "The Vishnu!"

"Yes, the Vishnu!" continued the stranger. "You know what that means. For many years that vessel had lain there, entombed amidst the sands, until at last I—on that lonely isle—saw the sands swept away and the buried ship revealed. I went on board. I entered the cabin. I passed through it. At last I entered a room at one corner. A skeleton lay there. Do you know whose it was?"

"Whose?" cried Despard, in a frenzy of excitement.

"Your father's!" said the stranger, in an awful voice.

"God in heaven!" exclaimed Despard, and he sank back into his seat.

"In his hand he held a manuscript, which was his last message to his friends. It was inclosed in a bottle. The storm had prevented him from throwing it overboard. He held it there as though waiting for some one to take it. I was the one appointed to that task. I took it. I read it, and now that I have arrived in England I have brought it to you."

"Where is it?" cried Despard, in wild excitement.

"Here," said the stranger, and he laid a package upon the table.

Despard seized it, and tore open the coverings. At the first sight he recognized the handwriting of his father, familiar to him from old letters written to him when he was a child—letters which he had always preserved, and every turn of which was impressed upon his memory. The first glance was sufficient to impress upon his mind the conviction that the stranger's tale was true.

Without another word he began to read it. And as he read all his soul became associated with that lonely man, drifting in his drifting ship. There he read the villainy of the miscreant who had compassed his death, and the despair of the cast-away.

That suffering man was his own father. It was this that gave intensity to his thoughts as he read. The dying man bequeathed his vengeance to Ralph Brandon, and his blessing to his son.

Despard read over the manuscript many times. It was his father's words to himself.

"I am in haste," said the stranger. "The manuscript is yours. I have made inquiries for Ralph Brandon, and find that he is dead. It is for you to do as seems good. You are a clergyman, but you are also a man; and a father's wrongs cry to Heaven for vengeance."

"And they shall be avenged!" exclaimed Despard, striking his clenched hand upon the table.

"I have something more before I go," continued the stranger, mournfully—"something which you will prize more than life. It was worn next your father's heart till he died. I found it there."

Saying this he handed to Despard a miniature, painted on enamel, representing a beautiful woman, whose features were like his own.

"My mother!" cried Despard, passionately, and he covered the miniature with kisses.

"I buried your father," said the stranger, after a long pause. "His remains now lie on Coffin Island, in their last resting-place."

"And who are you? What are you? How did you find me out? What is your object?" cried Despard, eagerly.

"I am Mr. Wheeler," said the stranger, calmly; "and I come to give you these things in order to fulfill my duty to the dead. It remains for you to fulfill yours."

"That duty shall be fulfilled!" exclaimed Despard. "The law does not help me: I will help myself. I know some of these men at least. I will do the duty of a son."

The stranger bowed and withdrew. Despard paced the room for hours. A fierce thirst for vengeance had taken possession of him. Again and again he read the manuscript, and after each reading his vengeful feeling became stronger.

At last he had a purpose. He was no longer the imbecile—the crushed—the hopeless. In the full knowledge of his father's misery his own became endurable.

In the morning he saw Langhetti and told him all.

"But who is the stranger?" Despard asked in wonder.

"It can only be one person," said Langhetti, solemnly.

"Who?"

"Louis Brandon. He and no other. Who else could thus have been chosen to find the dead? He has his wrongs also to avenge."

Despard was silent. Overwhelming thoughts crowded upon him. Was this man Louis Brandon?

"We must find him," said he. "We must gain his help in our work. We must also tell him about Edith."

"Yes," replied Langhetti. "But no doubt he has his own work before him: and this is but part of his plan, to rouse you from inaction to vengeance."

THE FAREWELL.

SWEET were the days we've spent together,
Sad must the hour of our parting be;
Through the broad meadows in summer weather,
Pleasant the path that is waiting for thee;
In the red west, where the sun is sinking,
Deep through the shadows lies my way;
And I must onward with step unshrinking—
Thou knowest all that my heart would say.

What shall I give thee for farewell token?
How shall I speed thee, with love or with care?
Think of the words that we have spoken,
Take them for wishes, and count them for prayer;
Oh! be thou wise when life, caressing,
Would woo thee to linger, would win thee to stay;
Keep in thy soul its earliest blessing—
Thou knowest all that my heart would say.

Oh! o'er my soul will a sudden yearning
Bring back the days we are leaving behind,
Bring me thy footstep, no longer returning,
Bring me thy greeting, so gay and so kind;
How shall I bless thee? No longer beside thee,
I can but love thee, and lose thee, and pray;
Yet will God love thee, and keep thee, and guide thee—
Thou knowest all that my heart would say!

THE GIANT'S PALACE.

A HINDOO FAIRY LEGEND.

ONCE upon a time there lived a king who was left a widower with two little daughters. Not very long after his first wife died he married again, and his second wife did not care for her step-children, and was often unkind to them; and the king, and his father, never troubled himself to look after them, but allowed his wife to treat them as she liked. This made the poor girls very miserable, and one day one of them said to the other, "Don't let us remain any longer here; come away into the jungle, for nobody here cares whether we go or stay." So they both walked off into the jungle, and lived for many days on the jungle fruits. At last, after they had wandered on for a long while, they came to a fine palace which belonged to a giant, but both the giant and his wife were out when they got there. Then one of the Princesses said to the other, "This fine palace, in the midst of the jungle, can belong to no one but a giant; but the owner has evidently gone out; let us go in and see if we can find any thing to eat." So they went into the giant's house, and finding some rice, boiled and ate it. Then they swept the room, and arranged all the furniture in the house tidily. But hardly had they finished doing so when the giant and his wife returned home. Then the two Princesses were so frightened that they ran up to the top of the house, and hid themselves on the flat roof, from whence they could look down on one side into the inner court-yard of the house, and from the other could see the open country. The house-top was a favorite resort of the giant and his wife. Here they would sit upon the hot summer evenings; here they winnowed the grain, and hung out the clothes to dry; and the two Princesses found a sufficient shelter behind some sheaves of corn that were waiting to be thrashed. When the giant came into the house he looked round, and said to his wife, "Somebody has been arranging the house, every thing in it is so clean and tidy. Wife, did you do this?" "No," she said; "I don't know who can have done all this." "Some one, also, has been sweeping the court-yard," continued the giant. "Wife, did you sweep the court-yard?"

"No," she answered, "I did not do it. I don't know who did." Then the giant walked round and round several times, with his nose up in the air, saying, "Some one is here now. I smell flesh and blood! Where can they be?" "Stuff and nonsense," cried his wife. "You smell flesh and blood, indeed! Why you have just been killing and eating a hundred thousand people. I should wonder if you didn't still smell flesh and blood!" They went on quarreling thus until the giant said, "Well, never mind, I don't know how it is, but I'm very thirsty; let's come and drink some water." So both the giant and his wife went to a well which was close to the house, and began letting down jars into it, and drawing up the water, and drinking it. And the Princesses, who were on the top of the house, saw them. Now, the youngest of the two Princesses was a very wise girl, and when she saw the giant and his wife by the well she said to her sister, "I will do something now that will be good for us both;" and, running down quickly from the top of the house, she crept close behind the giant and his wife, as they stood on tip-toe more than half over the side of the well, and, catching hold of one of the giant's heels, and one of his wife's, gave each a little push, and down they both tumbled into the well and were drowned, the giant and the giant's wife. The Princess then returned to her sister, and said, "I have killed the giant." "What, both?" cried her sister. "Yes, both," she said. "Won't they come back?" said her sister. "No; never," answered she.

The giant being thus killed, the two Princesses took possession of the house, and lived there very happily for a long time. In it they found heaps and heaps of rich clothes, and jewels, and gold and silver, which the giant had taken from people he had murdered; and all round the house were folds for the flocks, and sheds for the herds of cattle which the giant owned. Every morning the youngest Princess used to drive out the flocks and herds to pasture, and return home with them every night, while the eldest staid at home, cooked the dinner, and kept the house; and the youngest Princess, who was the cleverest, would often say to her sister on going away for the day, "Take care if you see any stranger (be it man, woman, or child) come by the house, to hide, if possible, that nobody may know of our living here; and if any one should call out and ask for a drink of water, or any poor beggar pray for food, before you give it them be sure you put on ragged clothes, and cover your face with charcoal, and make yourself look as ugly as possible, lest, seeing how fair you are, they should steal you away; and we never meet again." "Very well," the other Princess would answer, "I will do as you advise."

But a long time passed, and no one ever came by that way. At last one day, after the youngest Princess had gone out, a young Prince, the son of a neighboring king, who had been hunting with his attendants for many days in the jungles, came near the place when searching for water (for he and his people were tired with hunting, and had been seeking all through the jungle for a stream of water, but could find none). When the Prince saw the fine palace, standing all by itself, he was very much astonished, and said, "It is a strange thing that any one should have built such a house as this in the depths of the forest! Let us go in; the owners will doubtless give us a drink of water." "No, no, do not go," cried his attendants; "this is most likely the house of a giant." "We can but see," answered the Prince. "I should scarcely think any thing very terrible lived here, for there is not a sound stirring, nor a living creature to be seen." So he began tapping at the door, which was bolted, and crying, "Will whoever owns this house give me and my people some water to drink, for the sake of kind charity?" But nobody answered, for the Princess, who heard him, was busy up in her room, blacking her face with charcoal, and covering her rich dress with rags. Then the Prince got impatient, and shook the door, saying, angrily, "Let me in, whoever you are! If you don't I'll force the door open." At this the poor little Princess got dreadfully frightened; and, having blacked her face, and made herself look as ugly as possible, she ran down stairs with a pitcher of water, and unbolted the door, gave the Prince the pitcher to drink from; but she did not speak, for she was afraid. Now the Prince was a very clever man, and as he raised the pitcher to his mouth to drink the water, he thought to himself, "This is a very strange-looking creature who has brought me this jug of water. She would be pretty, but that her face seems to want washing, and her dress also is very untidy. What can that black stuff be on her face and hands? it looks very unnatural." And so thinking to himself, instead of drinking the water, he threw it in the Princess's face! The Princess started back with a little cry, while the water, trickling down her face, washed off the charcoal, and showed her delicate features and beautiful fair complexion. The Prince caught hold of her hand, and said, "Now tell me true, who are you? where do you come from? Who are your father and mother? and why are you here alone by yourself in the jungle? Answer me, or I'll cut your head off." And he made as if he would draw his sword. The Princess was so terrified she could hardly speak, but as best she could, she told how she was the daughter of a king, and had run away into the jungle because of her cruel step-mother, and finding the house had lived there ever since; and, having finished her story, she began to cry. Then the Prince said to her, "Pretty lady, forgive me for my roughness; do not fear; I will take you home with me, and you shall be my wife." But the more he spoke to her the more frightened she got. So frightened that she did not understand what he said, and could do nothing but cry. Now she had said nothing to the Prince about her sister, nor even told him that she had one, for she thought, "This man says he will kill me; if he hears that I have a sister, they will kill her too." So the Prince, who was really kind-hearted, and would never have thought of separating the two little sisters who had been together so long, knew nothing at all of the matter, and only seeing she was too much alarmed even to understand gentle words, said to his servants, "Place this lady in one of the palanquins, and let us set off home." And they did so. When the Princess found herself shut up in the palanquin, and being carried she knew not where, she thought how terrible it would be for her sister to return home and find her gone, and determined, if possible, to leave some sign to show her which way she had been taken. Round her neck were many strings of pearls. She untied them, and tearing her dress into little bits, tied one pearl in each piece of the dress, that it might be heavy enough to fall straight to the ground; and so she went on, dropping one pearl and then another, and another, and another, all the way she went along, until they reached the palace gate. The old king and queen were delighted to see the beautiful Princess their son had brought home; and when they heard her story they said, "Ah, poor thing! what a sad story; but now she has come to live with us, we will do all we can to make her happy." And they married her to their son with great pomp and ceremony, and gave her rich dresses and jewels, and were very kind to her. But the Princess remained sad and unhappy, for she was always thinking about her sister, and yet she could not summon courage to beg the Prince or his father to send and fetch her to the palace.

Meantime the youngest Princess, who had been out with her flocks and herds when the Prince took her sister away, had returned home. When she came back she found the door wide open, and no one standing there. She thought it very odd, for her sister always came every night to the door, to meet her on her return. She went up stairs; her sister was not there; the whole house was empty and deserted. There she must stay all alone, for the evening had closed in, and it was impossible to go outside and seek her with any hope of success. So all the night long she waited, crying, "Some one has been here, and they have stolen her away; they have stolen my darling away. Oh sister! sister!" Next morning, very early, going out to continue the search, she found one of the pearls belonging to her sister's necklace tied up in a small piece of a dress; a little further on lay another, and yet another, all along the road the Prince had gone. Then the Princess understood that her sister had left this clue to guide her on her way, and she at once set off to find her again. Very, very far she went—a six months' journey through the jungle—for she could not travel fast, the many days' walking tired her so much, and sometimes it took her two or three days to find the next piece of the dress with the pearl. At last she came near a large town, to which it was evident her sister had been taken. Now this young Princess was very beautiful indeed—as beautiful as she was wise—and when she got near the town she thought to herself, "If people see me they may steal me away as they did my sister, and then I shall never find her again. I will therefore disguise myself." As she was thus thinking she saw by the side of the road the skeleton of a poor old beggar woman, who had evidently died from want and poverty. The body was shriveled up, and nothing of it remained but the skin and bones. The Princess took the skin and washed it, and drew it on over her own lovely face and neck, as one draws a glove on one's hand. Then she took a long stick and began hobbling along, leaning on it, toward the town. The old woman's skin was all crumpled and withered, and people who passed by only thought, "What an ugly old woman!" and never dreamed of the false skin and the beautiful, handsome girl inside. So on she went, picking up the pearls—one here, one there—until she found the last pearl just in front of the palace gate. Then she felt certain her sister must be somewhere near, but where she did not know. She longed to go in to the palace and ask for her, but no guards would have let such a wretched-looking old woman enter, and she did not dare offer them any of the pearls she had with her lest they should think she was a thief. So she determined merely to remain as close to the palace as possible, and wait till fortune favored her with the means of learning something further about her sister. Just opposite the palace was a small house belonging to a farmer, and the Princess went up to it and stood by the door. The farmer's wife saw her and said, "Poor old woman, who are you? what do you want? why are you here? Have you no friends?" "Alas, no!" answered the Princess. "I am a poor old woman and have neither father nor mother, son nor daughter, sister nor brother, to take care of me; all are gone! and I can only beg my bread from door to door."

"Do not grieve, good mother," answered the farmer's wife, kindly. "You may sleep in the shelter of our porch, and I will give you some food." So the Princess staid there for that night and for many more; and every day the good farmer's wife gave her food. But all this time she could learn nothing of her sister.

Now there was a large tank near the palace, on which grew some fine lotus plants, covered with rich crimson lotuses—the royal flower—and of these the king was very fond indeed, and prized them very much. To this tank (because it was the nearest to the farmer's house) the Princess used to go every morning, very early, almost before it was light, at about three o'clock, and take off the old woman's skin and wash it, and hang it out to dry; and wash her face and hands and bathe her feet in the cool water, and comb her beautiful hair. Then she would gather a lotus flower (such as she had been accustomed to wear in her hair from a child) and put it on, so as to feel for a few minutes like herself again! Thus she would amuse herself. Afterward, as soon as the wind had dried the old woman's skin, she put it on again, threw away the lotus flower, and hobbled back to the farmer's door, before the sun was up.

After a time the king discovered that some one had plucked some of his favorite lotus flowers. People were set to watch, and all the wise men in the kingdom put their heads together to try and discover the thief, but without avail. At last, the excitement about this matter being very great, the king's second son, a brave and noble young Prince (brother to him who had found the eldest Princess in the forest) said, "I will certainly discover this thief." It chanced that several fine trees grew round the tank. Into one of these the young Prince climbed one evening (having made a sort of light thatched roof across two of the boughs, to keep off the heavy dew), and there he watched all the night through, but with no more success than his predecessors. There lay the lotus plants, still in the moonlight, without so much as a thieving wind coming by to break off one of the flowers. The Prince began to get very sleepy, and thought the delinquent, whoever he might be, could not intend to return, when, in the very early morning, before it was light, who should come down to the tank but an old woman he had often seen near the palace gate. "Aha!" thought the Prince, "this then is the thief; but what can this queer old woman want with lotus flowers?" Imagine his astonishment when the old woman sat down on the steps of the tank and began pulling the skin off her face and arms! and from underneath the shriveled yellow skin came the loveliest face he had ever beheld! So fair, so fresh, so young, so gloriously beautiful, that appearing thus suddenly it dazzled the Prince's eyes like a flash of golden lightning! "Ah," thought he, "can this be a woman or a spirit? a devil or an angel in disguise?"

The Princess twisted up her glossy black hair; and plucking a red lotus, placed it in it, and dabbled her feet in the water, and amused herself by putting round her neck a string of the pearls that had been her sister's necklace. Then, as the sun was rising, she threw away the lotus, and covering her face and arms again with the withered skin, went hastily away. When the Prince got home the first thing he said to his parents was, "Father, mother; I should like to marry that old woman who stands all day at the farmer's gate just opposite." "What!" cried they, "the boy is mad! Marry that skinny old thing? You can not—you are a king's son. Are there not enough queens and princesses in the world that you should wish to marry a wretched old beggar woman?" But he answered, "Above all things I should like to marry that old woman. You know that I have ever been a dutiful and obedient son. In this matter, I pray you, grant me my desire." Then, seeing he was really in earnest about the matter, and that nothing they could say would alter his mind, they listened to his urgent entreaties; not, however, without much grief and vexation, and sent out the guards, who fetched the old woman (who was really the Princess in disguise) to the palace, where she was married to the Prince as privately and with as little ceremony as possible, for the family were ashamed of the match.

As soon as the wedding was over, the Prince said to his wife, "Gentle wife, tell me how much longer you intend to wear that old skin? You had better take it off; do be so kind." The Princess wondered how he knew of her disguise, or whether it was only a guess of his; and she thought, "If I take this ugly skin off my husband will think me pretty, and shut me up in the palace and never let me go away, so that I shall not be able to find my sister again. No, I had better not take it off." So she answered, "I don't know what you mean. I am as all these years have made me; nobody can change their skin." Then the Prince pretended to be very angry, and said, "Take off that hideous disguise this instant, or I'll kill you." But she only bowed her head, saying, "Kill me then, but nobody can change their skin." And all this she mumbled as if she were a very old woman indeed, and had lost all her teeth and could not speak plain. At this the Prince laughed very much to himself, and thought, "I'll wait and see how long this freak lasts." But the Princess continued to keep on the old woman's skin; only every morning, at about three o'clock, before it was light, she would get up and wash it and put it on again. Then some time afterward the Prince, having found this out, got up softly one morning early, and followed her to the next room, where she had washed the skin and placed it on the floor to dry, and stealing it, he ran away with it and threw it on the fire. So the Princess, having no old woman's skin to put on, was obliged to appear in her own likeness. As she walked forth, very sad at missing her disguise, her husband ran to meet her, smiling and saying, "How do you do, my dear? Where is your skin now? Can't you take it off, dear?" Soon the whole palace had heard the joyful news of the beautiful young wife that the Prince had won; and all the people, when they saw her, cried, "Why she is exactly like the beautiful Princess our young king married, the jungle lady." The old king and queen were prouder than all of their daughter-in-law, and took her to introduce her to their eldest son's wife. Then no sooner did the Princess enter her sister-in-law's room, than she saw that in her she had found her lost sister, and they ran into each other's arms. Great then was the joy of all, but the happiest of all these happy people were the two Princesses; and they lived together in peace and joy their whole lives long.

JAPANESE FOOD.

JAPANESE dinners are not very tempting to European tastes, consisting so much of what we are apt to term "messes." Beef, mutton, and pork, the substantial viands to which we are accustomed, are not eaten by the Japanese. The ocean, which surrounds and intersects their islands in every direction, is their store-house, and fish is their principal article of food. When presents are sent from one friend to another a small piece of dried or salted fish, and some seaweed, accompanies them, tied with a red and white string, and wrapped in a paper, on which is written a sentence that, translated, means, "Happy those who never depart from the wisdom of their ancestors." This is done to keep them in remembrance of their origin from a race of fishermen, and their dependence on the ocean for their daily food.

The dinner-service consists of lacquered or china bowls and plates, on which the dainties are placed. The dining-table is not more than nine inches high, and the guests sit round it on their heels, using chop-sticks to convey the food to their mouths. Dried fish, prawns on a kind of sweetmeat resembling toffee, rock-leeches, pickled eggs, salted ginger, boiled rice, yams, pears, a kind of wild raspberry and radish, with capsi-cums, are among the principal dishes at a Japanese repast. Bread is represented by a sweet sponge-cake, and saki or rice wine, in great variety, is the invariable accompaniment. Tea is also largely drunk. A very delicate kind, used only on special occasions, is made from an infusion of dried peach-blossoms.

The coarse brown flesh of the whale is eaten by this nation of fishermen and women. Sharks' fins are particularly sought after. Bêche de mer, cray fish, dried shrimps, salmon fresh and dried—in fact, almost every kind of inhabitant of the waters; pay tribute to the dwellers on land. Even seaweed is compelled to furnish a nutritious food. Rice is the staple grain; the flour of millet makes nice little cakes; the lotus-seed (a kind of nut) is much appreciated. The Japanese raise a great variety of vegetables, but they are coarse and without flavor. Beans, pease, lettuce, cabbage, etc., grow well on their fertile soil. Potatoes, also, are successfully cultivated on the hill-sides. Large quantities are exported to the neighboring Chinese coast, where they form a grateful addition to the tables of our countrymen and women in the Far East. Some other vegetables have also been introduced into Japan since it was opened to Western intercourse. The cauliflower in particular has been most successfully acclimatized. Some seeds were obtained from England, and planted in the European gardens on the bluff, near Yokohama, and the result was somewhat startling; for the stems attained the height of five or six feet, and one head was sufficient to supply a large dinner party.

The native vegetables are wanting in flavor, and the people seem to have no delicacy of palate. Many fruits flourish, but the fruit is not permitted to ripen, being gathered before it has attained maturity; thus all their peaches are rendered valueless to foreigners; pomegranates and persimmons are also wasted. Grapes are better appreciated; they are grown on some of the Daimios' estates, and are said to belong to the ladies, who, if so, certainly bestow much care upon them. This fruit is occasionally sent great distances, carefully packed in boxes of arrow-root, which effectually secure it from the light and air, and when taken out it is perfectly fresh, with even the delicate bloom untouched, though it may have been transported some thousand miles.

The tender shoots of the bamboo are boiled as an esculent; it has a woody, but not disagreeable flavor; preserved as a sweetmeat it is very nice.

The stimulating drinks of the Japanese are prepared from rice, and are generally known to foreigners under the name of saki. They vary much in strength and flavor, probably to as great an extent as our wines. Saki is usually drunk warm. Some kinds resemble pale sherry in color, and are by no means disagreeable; others are very strong, and their effect is soon seen on the people, numbers of whom are, unhappily, addicted to drinking—even the women indulging in this vicious habit. So general is this practice of drinking to excess, that toward evening the streets of a Japanese town become dangerous for quiet people, many two-sworded men, or Yacoinins, frequenting them, who, when under the influence of saki, become peculiarly quarrelsome, more especially toward foreigners; and murders have several times been committed in consequence.

We have already mentioned a delicate drink made from an infusion of peach-blossoms, which is offered to favored guests. The leaves of the tea-shrub afford the most common, as well as the most refreshing drink. It is taken without either milk or sugar. Milk is not in any form an article of diet, cattle being kept for agricultural purposes only, such as plowing, irrigation, etc. Some very choice delicate kinds of tea grow in Japan, the sandy-hill sides being well adapted for the successful cultivation of this useful species of camellia. It is a pretty plant, having dark-green shiny leaves with serrated edges, and white blossoms, somewhat like our small dog-rose. The fresh leaf, when eaten, leaves a delicious flavor on the palate, and the odor which pervades the building where tea is being fired or dried resembles the delicate perfume of a hay-field on a dewy summer evening.

Our sisters in Japan are largely engaged in the manufacture of tea. The female hand is well suited to the delicate process of gathering the choice tender leaves of the early crops; and it is women who manipulate the tea in iron pans over charcoal fires, when preparing it for the foreign market. The tea used in Japan is merely picked and sun-dried, and does not require any further preparation. The firing and preparing tea for shipment give employment to large numbers of very poor women, whose appearance becomes exceedingly unattractive after they have been occupied for some time in the warm and dusty rooms, their complexions assuming a greenish hue from the light particles of the tea floating in the air and settling on them.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

BESSIE E.—A neat way of making a black silk walking suit is with gored under-skirt; fuller upper-skirt, with bands inserted in each seam, to which each width but the front is sewn after having been gathered lengthwise. This gives a full puffed appearance, which is now very fashionable. The band is an inch and a half wide, cut bias, and may be trimmed with pipings of the silk with tiny buttons between, or inserted points of satin, or with a pleated rouleau. The sleeveless tight jacket cut short behind with long lapped points, and worn with a sash, is a good accompaniment.

METTERNICH GREEN.—A yellow tint of green would suit a fair, rosy complexion with dark hair.

Consumers can save from 50 cents to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St., (Post-Office Box 5643,) N. Y.

To give our readers an idea of the profits which have been made in the Tea Trade (previous to the establishment of the GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,) we will start with the American Houses, leaving out of the account entirely the profits of the Chinese factors.

First. The American House in China or Japan makes large profits on their sales or shipments—and some of the richest retired merchants in this country have made their immense fortunes through their houses in China.

Second. The Banker makes large profits upon the foreign exchange used in the purchase of Teas.

Third. The Importer makes a profit of 30 to 50 per cent. in many cases.

Fourth. On its arrival here it is sold by the cargo, and the Purchaser sells it to the Speculator in invoices of 1000 to 2000 packages, at an average profit of about 10 per cent.

Fifth. The Speculator sells it to the Wholesale Tea Dealer in lines at a profit of 10 to 15 per cent.

Sixth. The Wholesale Tea Dealer sells it to the Wholesale Grocer in lots to suit his trade at a profit of about 10 per cent.

Seventh. The Wholesale Grocer sells it to the Retail Dealer at a profit of 15 to 25 per cent.

Eighth. The Retailer sells it to the Consumer for ALL THE PROFIT HE CAN GET.

When you have added to these EIGHT profits as many brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, and add the original cost of the Tea, it will be perceived what the consumer has to pay. And now we propose to show why we can sell so very much lower than small dealers.

We propose to do away with all these various profits and brokerages, cartages, storages, cooperages, and waste, with the exception of a small commission paid for purchasing to our correspondents in China and Japan, one cartage, and a small profit to ourselves—which, on our large sales, will amply pay us.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city. Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a Club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a Club say how much Tea or Coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price-List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete, send it to us by mail. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost—so that there need be no confusion in their distribution: each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the Club can divide equally among themselves.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

We send no complimentary package for clubs of less than thirty dollars.

COUNTRY CLUBS, Hand and Wagon Peddlers, and small stores (of which class we are supplying many thousands, all of which are doing well), can have their orders promptly and faithfully filled, and, in case of Clubs, can have each party's name marked on their package and directed, by sending their orders to Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey street.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than thirty dollars had better send post-office drafts, or money, with their orders, to save the expense of collecting by express; but larger orders we will send by express, to collect on delivery.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the Custom-House stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third by sending directly to

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

Beware of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are

Bogus or Imitations.

We have no branches, and do not in any case authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

VOLUME XXXVI.

EIGHTEEN YEARS AGO the Publishers of this Magazine announced that it would be their aim "to seek to combine entertainment with instruction, and to enforce, through channels which attract rather than repel attention and favor, the best and most important lessons of morality and of practical life." They promised also "to spare neither labor nor expense in any department of the work," trusting thereby to give to the Magazine "a popular circulation unequalled by that of any similar periodical ever published in the world."

After the lapse of eighteen years the same Publishers renew these assurances with increased confidence. What was then an untried experiment has become an accomplished fact. The Magazine, conducted under their constant care and supervision, soon reached, and has ever maintained, "a circulation unequalled by that of any similar periodical ever published in the world." This circulation has not been lessened by the subsequent establishment among us of other periodicals of somewhat similar scope. With these Conductors of Harper's Magazine have no rivalry except a generous emulation as to who shall furnish the periodical most suited to the wants of cultivated American readers. With the results of this kindly emulation the Publishers of Harper's Magazine are fully satisfied: at no period more fully than at the present. Harper's Magazine has now more readers than at any former time. It is read by certainly not less than a million of persons each month. Not to speak of its American contemporaries, its regular monthly circulation exceeds that of any ten of the leading British periodicals of a somewhat similar character.

While due space has been devoted to imaginative literature—whether embodied in continued tales of Bulwer, Collins, Dickens, Lever, Mulock, Reade, Thackeray, and other leading British novelists of the day, or in stories and poems by American writers—it has been the constant aim of the Conductors to give a permanent value to the Magazine by articles upon history and biography; voyages, travels, and adventure; popular science, art, and industry; moral, social, and political economy, and the practical duties of life. The leading object has been to produce a Magazine which should set forth the aspects of the time. For this the Editors, each in his appropriate sphere, have wrought. One in the "Monthly Record of Current Events" has endeavored to narrate the leading incidents in the history of the times; another in the "Easy Chair" to comment upon topics of current interest; another in the "Drawer" to present the anecdotes, reminiscences, and facetiae, which, quite as really as more formal things, indicate the character of our actual life; while others have striven, either in careful analyses or in more brief "Literary Notices," to give the substance and scope of the more notable books, which indicate the direction of the literary activity of the age. That the effort in this direction has not been misapplied is evinced by the fact that the Publishers are in continual receipt of orders from public and private libraries for complete sets of the Magazine from its commencement.

As an Illustrated Magazine Harper's Monthly has confessedly no rival upon either continent. Its purpose from the outset has been to call into requisition the pencil of the artist wherever it could in any way aid or supplement the pen of the writer. How far this purpose has been accomplished, the illustrations—more than ten thousand in number—which have been furnished will show.

In reviewing the Two Hundred and Sixteen Numbers of the Magazine already published, each containing more matter than an ordinary volume, the conductors feel warranted in the conviction that the increased experience and ever-widening facilities which years have brought them have not been misapplied. They believe that no previous volume of the Magazine exceeds in the value or interest of its contents this which is now brought to a close.

While thanking the Press and the Public for the generous encouragement by which they have for so many years been cheered, the Conductors—whether Publishers or Editors—renew their assurance that nothing on their part which can be achieved by earnest labor or free expenditure shall be wanting to hold for Harper's Magazine the high position which it early secured, and has so long successfully maintained.

DR. J. W. POLAND'S

WHITE PINE COMPOUND

Is now offered to the afflicted throughout the country, after having been proved by the test of twelve years in the New England States, where its merits have become as well known as the tree from which, in part, it derives its virtues.

THE WHITE PINE COMPOUND

CURES

Sore Throat, Colds, Coughs, Diphtheria, Bronchitis, Spitting of Blood, and Pulmonary Affections generally. It is a remarkable Remedy for Kidney Complaints.

This medicine is free from any thing deleterious, pleasant to the taste, safe, yet sure and effective in its action.

From the Boston Journal.

Boston, January 20, 1866.

POLAND'S WHITE PINE COMPOUND.—After having given it a thorough trial, we can confidently recommend Poland's White Pine Compound as a very valuable article for the cure of colds, coughs, and pulmonary complaints generally. In several cases we have known it to give prompt relief when all other remedies which had been tried had failed. It is an article which, in a climate so promotive of sudden and severe colds as is that of New England, ought to be in every family; and we are sure that those who once obtain it and give it a fair trial will not thereafter be willing to be without it.

A VALUABLE MEDICINE.—Dr. Poland's White Pine Compound, advertised in our columns, is a successful attempt to combine and apply the medicinal virtues of the White Pine bark. It has been thoroughly tested by people in this city and vicinity, and the proprietor has testimonials to its value from persons well known to our citizens. We recommend its trial in all these cases of disease to which it is adapted. It is for sale by all our druggists.—Independent.

The White Pine Compound is now sold in every part of the United States and British Provinces.

THE LADIES' EXCHANGE.

THE accompanying poem and cut strikingly illustrate the result of the exchange of articles proposed in the columns of an English journal:

Miss Echo drops in at the Ladies' Exchange:
Draw, artist, the scene in thy daintiest fashion!
Here beauties their varying caprices arrange,
Being weary to-day of what once was a passion.

That bull-dog was doubtless a marvelous pet,
And visitors treated his mistress with deference:
Now Lucy the lovely prefers a layette,
And really I think it's a rational preference.

The Spanish guitar loved LANTHE to touch;
A surfeit of serenades seems to have cloyed her:
She'll change for a pet of a petticoat, such
As delicate fingers delight to embroider.

Is CLARIBEL tired of her Opera stall?
Will she never again use her Voigtlander glass in it?
Does she think that a melody sweeter than all
Is an infantile laugh from the depths of a bassinette?

The touch of Love's myrtle, as every one knows,
Brings to sensitive natures a singular smart with it.
But that rare statuette of immortal EROS—
Ah, maiden! 'tis surely unlucky to part with it.

When the ladies develop their mode of exchange
Until it takes rank among sound and complete arts,
No doubt they will manage a plan to arrange
Of meeting together and bartering sweet-hearts.

Then lovers will change by their whiskers and hair,
And the soldier be swopped for the quiet civilian:
Or a poet, a cottage, sound wine and plain fare,
Will you give, AMOEBE, for a muff and a million?

FACETIÆ.

A FOND parent, anxious that his infant son should be sharp in his wits and profound in his thoughts, has sent him to sea—so that he may be "rocked in the cradle of the deep."

Dr. X—paid a visit one day to a patient whom he had neglected to see for a couple of days. The sick man, who probably liked to attend to his business himself, had died in the mean time, and was on the point of being carried to the cemetery. At the sight of the funeral trappings the doctor had a presentiment of something wrong, and said, inquiringly, to the servant, "Can I go up to see Mr. Z—?" "It isn't worth while for you to go up; he is just coming down," was the answer.

A NOTE ON COOKERY.—"A greedy boy" is informed, in answer to his question, that "Cabinet Pudding" is not made with "Furniture Paste."

CAT OR DOG.—An English merchant was dining with a Chinese mandarin, when it struck him that perhaps the dish which he had eaten of so heartily might have been stewed cats, for he heard that they ate cats in China. The Chinaman didn't know English, so his guest, anxiously pointing to the dish, inquired, "Miow, miow?" "No, no," said the mandarin, "bow-wow."

Our grandmothers, Whiffler remarks, patronized coal-scuttle bonnets. Our sweet-hearts beat this—their bonnets have scuttled off altogether.

VERY UNLIKE A BIRD.—A bachelor acquaintance of ours remarks that ladies dress now with such exquisite taste that the pop-inettes remind him forcibly of pop-injays.

When was beef-tea first made?
—When Henry VIII. dissolved the Pope's bull.

The man who "can not find words enough to express his gratitude," is advised to purchase copies of Webster's and Worcester's Dictionaries.

What is the most becoming dress for bare earth—The skirt of a wood.

When the day breaks what becomes of the fragments?

"Owing to the peculiar arrangement of the programme no piece can be repeated," was the answer White received from his landlady, upon asking for a second piece of pie at dinner.

"Bridget, Bridget! why don't you bring up the lemonade?" said Mrs. S., on the Fourth of July, from the top of the kitchen stairs. "Why, marm," said Bridget, wiping the sweat from her red face with her checked apron, as she put her head round the staircase partition, "why, marm, you see the ice I put in the lemonade is so hard that it hasn't melted yet, though it's stirring it over the fire I've been for the last fifteen minutes or more."

When was beef-steak the highest? When the cow jumped over the moon.

You are quite welcome, as the empty pocket-book said to the greenbacks.

What kind of a ship has two mates and no captain?—Courtship. ¶

WHAT A LOVER WOULD DO.—"Amelia, for thee—yes, at thy command, I'd tear the eternal firmament into a thousand fragments—I'd gather the stars one by one as they tumble from the regions of ethereal space, and put them in my trowsers pockets; I'd pick the sun—that Oriental god of day that traverses the blue arch of heaven in such majestic splendor—I'd tear him from the sky, and quench its bright effulgence in the fountain of my eternal love for thee." AMELIA: "Don't, Henry, it would be so very dark."

CHOOSING A PROFESSION.—"What profession would you like?" said a friend to a boy who was learning Latin. "Please, Sir, when I am a man, I should like to be a sportsman."

There is a young lady so refined in her language that she never uses the word blackguard, but substitutes "African sentinel."

A stingy husband accounted for all the blame of the lawlessness of his children in company, by saying his wife always "gave them their own way." "Poor things, it's all I have to give them," was her prompt reply.
